REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

TUESDAY, JUNE 7, 1977

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:05 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Senator Edward M. Kennedy [acting chairman of the subcommittee] presiding.

Present: Senators Kennedy, Thurmond, and Hatch.

Staff present: Paul C. Summitt, chief counsel; D. Eric Hultman, minority counsel; Paul H. Robinson, counsel; Kenneth Feinberg, counsel to Senator Kennedy; and Mabel A. Downey, chief clerk.

Senator KENNEDY [acting chairman]. The committee will come to order.

At this point I will place in the record the statement of Senator McClellan, the chairman of the subcommittee, who is unable to be with us today.

OPENING STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN JOHN L. McCLELLAN

Senator McCLELLAN. Today we start another phase, and hopefully the final one, in the effort to enact a modern Federal Criminal Code. On May 2, 1977, I introduced, with Senator Kennedy as a cosponsor, S. 1437, a bill to codify, revise, and reform title 18 of the United States Code, and for other purposes. Today we begin hearings on that bill.

The Federal Criminal Code reform effort formally began on November 8, 1966, when Congress established the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws. Much of S. 1437 can trace its heritage to the final report of that Commission, called the "Brown Commission" after its distinguished Chairman, former Governor of California, Edmund G. "Pat" Brown. It is particularly appropriate, therefore, that we are honored today with the presence of Governor Brown. We are also pleased to have as witnesses the Staff Director of the Commission, Prof. Louis Schwartz, and a consultant to the Commission, Prof. Robert Blakey.

The Commission's work and final report have served as a work basis for legislative reform efforts. Within a month or two after their report, the subcommittee opened the first of a 4-year series of hearings on the Brown Commission work and on the whole question of criminal law codification and reform.

During the course of those hearings, testimony was received from judges, lawyers, bar associations, and from private citizens and groups of every political persuasion and point of view culminating in over 8,500 pages of testimony and exhibits in 15 volumes of printed hearings.

After several preliminary drafts were studied and analyzed, the Criminal Justice Reform Act of 1975 evolved and was introduced by me on January 15, 1975, with 10 cosponsors. It undertook to incorporate the best of the earlier versions and the recommendations made by those who submitted their views to the subcommittee.

Obviously, a bill of that nature, covering the whole spectrum of criminal law, could hardly be expected to receive unanimous acceptance and approval. It was not primarily drafted to please, nor did it reflect, the exclusive views, conclusions, or judgments of any one person—not of myself, or of any other individual Senator. We have always known that there would be honest differences of opinion about some of its provisions, and, in the spirit of compromise, that concessions, and accommodations would have to be made in order to achieve the goal of criminal law reform earnestly sought by so many for so long. With this objective and in this spirit of compromise, Senator Kennedy, the administration—particularly Attorney General Bell and his staff—and I, working from the compromise suggested last Congress by Senator Hruska and myself, have produced the bill now before us.

Given his important help in this effort, we are particularly pleased that Attorney General Bell is able to appear before the subcommittee today.

While most of the issues in S. 1437 have been examined at great length and in great detail during the extensive hearings on previous code reform bills, the sentencing system in the bill is significantly different from past bills. It adopts the use of sentencing guidelines and creates the potential for more determinant sentencing. It may be useful to insert in the record at this point a brief summary of the provisions of the proposed sentencing system.

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM ACT OF 1977—SENTENCING SYSTEM

The major reforms proposed in the sentencing area include adoption of a sentencing guideline system and a partial move toward determinant sentencing.

The bill would create a Sentencing Commission and direct it to establish guidelines to govern the imposition of sentences for all federal offenses, taking into consideration factors relating to the purposes of sentencing, the characteristics of the offender, and the aggravating and mitigating circumstances of the offense. If a judge considered the guideline range inappropriate for a particular case he would be free to sentence above or below the guideline range as long as he explained his reasons for doing so. If an offender were sentenced above the range specified in the guidelines he would be able to obtain appellate review of his sentence; if he were sentenced below the range specified in the guidelines the government would be able to obtain appellate review of the sentence. In addition to the guidelines, the Commission would be authorized to promulgate policy statements touching on many other aspects of sentencing, including the proper use of the guidelines.

A judge would be authorized to specify a term during which the offender would be ineligible for parole, but such a term could not extend into the last tenth of the sentence imposed. Guidelines for the imposition of terms of parole ineligibility would be promulgated by the Sentencing Commission. The Parole Commission and all recent reforms to the parole system would be retained. Maximum authorized terms of imprisonment would be modestly reduced.

The Sentencing Commission is proposed to be a permanent body which is a part of the Judicial Branch. Its members would be appointed by the Judicial Conference for fixed, staggered terms, and there would be no restrictions on who may be appointed a member. Guidelines promulgated by the Commission would become effective within 180 days unless vetoed by Congress before that time.

Other revisions include such things as the explicit recognition and statement of the purposes of sentencing (deterrence, protection of the public, assurance of just punishment, and rehabilitation). The maximum authorized fines are substantially increased; the special statutory provisions of current law for special dangerous offenders, youth offenders, and narcotics offenders are eliminated under the theory that the Sentencing Commission guidelines and policy statements can better provide appropriate sentencing in these cases; a provision is added to require notice to fraud victims in order to facilitate class actions for recovery of losses; a provision is added which permits an order of restitution to be part of any sentence; and the death penalty provisions are eliminated (except for the existing death penalty for aircraft hijacking which is retained in title 49 of the United States Code). Each offense in the Code is described as a certain grade of felony or misdemeanor, or as an infraction, a shorthand method, used in most modern state codes, of referring to the sentencing provisions which apply to the offense.

Senator McCLELLAN. The importance of the sentencing provisions and recent changes and advances in the philosophy and procedures for sentencing criminal offenders make it imperative that this subcommittee draw upon the expertise of authorities in the area to consider all aspects of the proposed sentencing reform.

In that respect this series of hearings will be historic. At a time when the need for some sentencing reform is apparent to all, and when many jurisdictions are considering reform, we will have the benefit of perhaps the most distinguished and comprehensive group of witnesses in the sentencing area ever assembled. Already scheduled to appear on the matter of sentencing reform are such noted authorities as: Judge Marvin E. Frankel, a Federal district court judge who is daily engaged in the sentencing business and is author of the book "Criminal Sentences: Law Without Order"; Prof. Ernest van den Haag, a practicing psychiatrist and author of the book "Punishing Criminals"; Mr. Andrew von Hirsch, author of the Report of the Committee for the Study of Incarceration, published as a book entitled "Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments"; Mr. Pierce O'Donnell, a practicing attorney and author of the book "Toward a Just and Effective Sentencing System"; Mr. Ronald L. Gainer, Acting Assistant Attorney General of the Office for Improvements in the Administration of Justice; Mr. Norman A. Carlson, Director of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons; Judge Harold R. Tyler, former Deputy Attorney General and now a practicing attorney who is Chairman of the Advisory Corrections Council (a body established by 18 U.S.C. 5002); Judge Gerald B. Tjoflat, Chairman of the Judicial Conference Committee on the Administration of the Probation System; Judge Alfonso J. Zirpoli, Chairman of the Judicial Conference Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law; Mr. Harold D. Koffsky, consultant to that committee; Judge William H. Webster of the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules; Judge Morris E. Lasker of the Southern District of New York; and Dean Don M. Gottfredson, Dean of the Rutgers School of Criminal Justice and codirector of the Criminal Justice Research Center in Albany, N.Y., which has done much significant research on sentencing guidelines and their feasibility.

These gentlemen will appear before this subcommittee tomorrow and the next day, June 8 and 9. At a later date we hope to hear from the U.S. Parole Commission; Prof. Alan M. Dershowitz, author of the report of the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Criminal Sentencing, published as a book entitled "Fair and Certain Punishment"; Dean Norval Morris of the University of Chicago Law School, author of the book "The Future of Imprisonment"; Prof. James Q. Wilson, author of "Thinking About Crime"; and others.

With this diverse group of distinguished authorities, I believe that the record we will produce here will serve as a classic source of invaluable information and expertise on sentencing reform, a record which will serve all legislatures that may undertake such a challenge.

While today's hearing will concern an overview of the Federal Criminal Code reform effort, with tomorrow's hearing beginning the series on sentencing reform, we are pleased to begin today's hearing with the appearance of three of my distinguished colleagues—Senators Bentson, Domenici, and Hart—who, as authors of sentencing bills now before this subcommittee, have a special interest in effective sentencing reform.

SENATOR KENNEDY. We open hearings this morning on S. 1437, the recodification of the Criminal Code, introduced by the chairman of this committee, Senator John McClellan and myself.

We commence these hearings with the high hope that we will be able to meet our responsibilities to the American people and finally succeed in recodifying the Federal Criminal Code.

There is no question that the Criminal Code, which has not been codified since the earliest days of this Republic is in dire need of codification. We see various criminal laws scattered throughout 50 titles, with endless differences and degrees of culpability. We have a criminal justice system which breeds inequity and unfairness; and, in many instances, we see a Criminal Code which allows those involved in the criminal justice system to effectively play the odds and avoid the sure and fair judgment of our criminal justice system.

It has been most unfortunate that, even though the issue of crime rouses great interest among the American people, it has been tied up with the political sloganeering and shibboleths of the past decade.

This country is facing an energy crisis. We cannot see a day go by when there is not a healthy debate and discussion on what the Congress, what the Executive, what local communities and local government subdivisions can do about the problem.

But when it comes to crime, we have silence. We have waited too long to address what I consider to be the most important Criminal Code improvement effort in the history of this country. I am hopeful that during the course of these hearings we can eliminate the sloganeering of the past and come to grips with the essential challenge of effective criminal justice in our society.

One of the very important aspects of this recodification effort is the chapter dealing with fairness and equity in sentencing and the establishing of a sentencing commission, which, hopefully, will report back to the Congress with guidelines for various Federal crimes. In addition, the bill requires written reasons be stated by the court at the time of sentence and provides for appellate review in cases where the sentence is above or below the prescribed guidelines. The bill thus deals with the critical problem of sentencing disparity. We will be insuring a greater sense of fairness and equity in the criminal justice system. This is an extremely important aspect of the recodification bill.

Another extremely important aspect of the recodification bill is the gradual phasing out of the Federal parole release function of our criminal justice system.

Parole release has not been administered evenhandedly in our Nation. It seems quite clear that the time has come in our society for determinate sentencing. We need fairness, both in terms of the prisoner and society. We need fairness in terms of public understanding as to how the criminal justice system works.

I think the American people have basic misconceptions as to how the system works in practice. When a sentence is given for 12 to 15 years or 4 to 8 years, a prisoner does not basically serve that term. In any review of the past, we can see in instance after instance the prevailing pattern of release after completion of one-third of the sentence.

In order for the public to understand what the actual sentence is going to be, as well as to provide more certainty in the system, I believe it is important to phase out the parole release function. We will have a chance to examine that in greater detail with the Attorney General here this morning.

I will insert into the record at this time the statement of Senator Thurmond and any statement that may be submitted by any other member of the subcommittee.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR STROM THURMOND

Mr. Chairman, today the Subcommittee commences another series of hearings on the revision of the Federal Criminal Code. In addition to S. 1437, which has already been referred to by the Chairman, there are a number of other bills on sentencing reform that have been introduced in this session of the Congress and referred to the Subcommittee.

The bill before us today, S. 1437, is the product of not only the efforts of the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws, but also a four-year series of hearings by the Subcommittee. The bill incorporates the best of earlier versions and recommendations that have been gleaned from hours and hours of testimony.

Mr. Chairman, a bill of this magnitude, covering the entire federal criminal law, could not possibly gain universal acceptance. There are provisions in the bill that I strongly support. There are other provisions that I do not support, but in the spirit of compromise and accommodation might accept if the overall bill would achieve the goal of reforming our Federal criminal law.

During this further set of hearings a number of witnesses with varying views will be heard from, particularly on the issue of sentencing reform. I am looking forward to hearing from these witnesses, especially Attorney General Bell and Governor Brown, and I want to welcome them to our hearings this morning.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator McClellan has been a tireless champion in the area of Criminal Code reform. He is strongly committed to this legislation. I am very hopeful that we will see early consideration of S. 1437 by the full committee and by the Senate.

Senator Bentsen?

Senator Bentsen, we are glad to have you here. You have been more than patient in listening to me when I appear before the Finance Committee.

We welcome you here. We know how interested you are with this subject matter.

STATEMENT OF HON. LLOYD BENTSEN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM TEXAS

Senator BENTSEN. Senator Kennedy, I appreciate the leadership that you and Senator McClellan have shown in this legislation.

I am delighted to appear in support of legislation I have long advocated: reform of sentencing and rape laws. I have to admit to you, Mr. Chairman, I have not read this whole bill yet but I expect to. I believe that the modernized Criminal Code, as proposed by you and Senator McClellan will rightfully win the broad support that it deserves.

It is indeed appropriate that when Attorney General Bell endorsed this effort he referred to the Roman Emperor Caligula, who deliberately posted the law in very fine print, at a high level where the populace would not be able to see it and understand it. Today, when regulations and laws often proliferate and complicate, a simplification and modernization is well in order.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the changes this bill would make in rape laws. In 1975, I first introduced legislation to restrict the use of evidence regarding the rape victim's sexual history: to allow cases to go before the jury without corroboration of the victim's testimony; and to eliminate the requirement of evidence of resistance.

Current rape laws often treat the victims in an unconscionable way at the very time we should be showing compassion and concern. What we find too often is the question of who is really on trial in these rape cases: Is it the attacker or is it the woman who has been violated in the instance?

Current laws discourage reporting of the crimes. They hinder the fair prosecution of the accused. I believe that the changes proposed in the code bill will be a step forward for the fair and effective administration of justice in these rape cases.

The second provision I want to support is sentencing reform. In recent years, the credibility of our criminal laws has come under attack from diverse sources. Indeterminate sentencing has lost respect. Our parole system has lost respect.

Citizens read of habitually violent criminals receiving little or no punishment. Charles Manson is now being considered for parole. As the Twentieth Century Fund report points out, when it comes to punishing, we have become a nation of extremes.

We see a situation where a judge in one part of the country gives them a tap on the wrist. In another part of the country, they may be sentenced for an exceedingly long period of time for, in effect, the same crime.

There is justifiable public anger when convicted criminals escape unpunished. One study found that 73 percent of convicted armed robbers with substantial prior records received no prison terms in Los Angeles in 1970. Other studies report varying findings; but, regardless of the numbers involved, current sentencing practices too often grant amnesty to the violent.

At the other extreme, the indeterminate sentence has led to different prison terms that are unfair and contrary to our notions of equal justice. Often these differences constitute injustice in the name of the law, and for that reason they are even more unacceptable.

Mr. Chairman, to eliminate the great and unguided discretion now vested in the judges and parole boards, I have introduced the Fair and Certain Punishment Act. This bill generally follows the format of the Twentieth Century Fund proposal and related works by others in the field, some of whom will testify before this committee. It will establish presumptive sentencing and provide standards to guide discretion.

Each crime would have a presumptive sentence. For first offenders, it should be short but certain, with prison for the dangerous and alternative punishment considered for the nondangerous. This presumptive sentence should increase for repeatedly violent offenders. For the most violent, the primary purpose of imprisonment should be detention of the guilty and protection of the public.

Judicial discretion should be structured but not eliminated. I agree with Alexander Hamilton in the "Federalist No. 78" that judicial discretion must be defined in order to be fairly exercised.

To allow discretion, besides the presumptive sentence itself, there should be two sentence ranges. One should be a small percentage variance, perhaps 20 or 30 percent above or below it.

The second should allow for a maximum sentence, or a suspended sentence, for extraordinary cases in which the presumptive sentence or range would not be fair.

Sentences that vary from the presumptive should be accompanied by a reasoned written opinion. Sentences that deviate from the small presumptive range should be subject to appellate review. I would limit review because to extend it further would create severe stresses on already overburdened courts.

A sentencing hearing should be held to determine the existence of aggravating or mitigating circumstances or extraordinary factors. To reduce the burden on courts, I would suggest provisions for stipulation of facts, reports by referees, and other means of expediting agreement between the parties.

Aggravating and mitigating circumstances, which under the code proposal would be delineated by the commission, should be spelled out and uniformly applied. They should relate to the conduct of the criminal and the seriousness of the crime. The prior record of criminal convictions should be a factor. Gun crimes should be considered aggravated.

I hope that offender characteristics would be very carefully applied. We are punishing for past conduct, violence, and crime. We are not punishing for predictions about the future, joblessness, or lack of education. We can rarely predict future criminal behavior; yet past violence is an important guide.

So, as we resolve to severely punish the most dangerous, we should insure that punishment looks to what the offender has done; for what we predict about the future is not his crime.

I would support the idea of a Sentencing Commission, with the hope that it would involve all three branches of government. Specifying sentencing laws is a legislative duty; applying them to convicted defendants is a judicial duty; parole and the administration of corrections is an executive duty.

I believe that some members could be appointed by the Judicial Conference, with others and perhaps the Executive Director chosen by the President. All would be approved by the Senate. This would insure full judicial participation, yet at the same time, it would provide a perspective including all three branches.

The time has come for a thorough review and overhaul of the parole system. This complicated topic alone is worthy of lengthy hearings. There should be some provision for early release in those cases where new evidence emerges that would be relevant to the sentencing decision.

Generally, inmates should not be released early except for good time allowances, which should be liberalized. Inmates should not remain in a state of agonizing uncertainty about the time of their release.

Perhaps there is a need for an increased postrelease service for those released from prison. They should be helped in finding jobs and furthering their education, in adjusting to lawful life.

Rehabilitation should play a role, after considerations of justice establish a fair term of imprisonment. We should not sentence to rehabilitate. After we sentence, we should try to rehabilitate. Those who participate in these programs should do so because they want to better their opportunities, to stake a claim in American life—not to seek early release.

We must also carefully consider prison capacity and needs. I join those of the National District Attorney's Association, who believe that humane prisons could provide increased protection for the public and law enforcement personnel.

No violent criminal should remain unpunished because of inadequate prisons. No criminal should be sent to a prison so inadequate and ineffective that it actually increases the likelihood of future criminal conduct.

William Shaffer of MIT, after an extensive analysis of the Massachusetts criminal justice system, concluded that of all variables, the shortage of prison capacity is the critical one affecting the ability of the system to lower crime rates. Chief Justice Burger has time and time gain urged a major improvement of prison conditions. Groups as diverse as the National Sheriff's Association and civil rights activists have called for upgraded corrections.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the sentencing reforms could go far in making justice more just and law enforcement more effective. We can balance the needs of our prisons with society's need to see that punishment is fair and certain, and that punishment of the highly dangerous is more severe.

I intend to follow these hearings closely, because I see you have some very excellent and distinguished witnesses. I want to commend the work of those who are involved. Certainly there is a lot yet to be done. It is not going to be easy; it is not going to yield to simple answers.

I do believe it provides this Congress and the Nation a real opportunity to walk one step further down the road to simple justice.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this very much.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to thank you, Senator, very much for your comments and your testimony.

There is very little that I find that I am not in strong agreement with. You establish in your own legislation the various criteria for sentencing; we set out such criteria for the Commission to consider in terms of making its recommendations. There is some difference in terms of approach, but I think we have a similar concern as to what should be done.

Certainty of punishment and limitations on parole are issues which I think are essential. You have outlined the reasons for these changes.

I think that at the time of sentencing it must be made clear to the defendant and to the public as to what the sentence imposed is actually going to be. That is an essential aspect of this recodification bill.

The Shaffer study makes one point very clear; when talking about our growing prison population, it points out that we have the wrong people in prison. The great majority of inmates in State prisons, in maximum security, should not actually be there. We have too many people that are being sentenced for victimless crimes, such as alcoholism, while the hardened criminal is placed on probation.

Senator BENTSEN. It really was an informative study.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes. And with the kind of approach spelled out in our bills, I think it would make an important difference in terms of the prison population.

I just want to thank you. We will keep you informed. We welcome any additional suggestions as we move along.

Senator BENTSEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Hatch?

Senator HATCH. I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Texas. Thank you for coming.

Senator BENTSEN. Thank you.

I congratulate you on this effort and this work.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much.

Senator Domenici, we are glad to welcome you here this morning.

STATEMENT OF HON. PETE V. DOMENICI, A U.S. SENATOR FROM NEW MEXICO

Senator DOMENICI. Mr. Chairman, it is my pleasure to appear before you and testify before this committee on a subject, you know better than I, needs serious attention. Our criminal sentencing system needs improvement. I believe that several of the bills that you will be considering during these hearings offer a positive probability for such improvement.

Lowering the crime rates in this country deserves a high priority by this Congress. As with many of our complex problems, this huge problem is extremely complex and encompasses many elements. We must not, in my opinion, be afraid of the issue just because it is an enormous problem and has some overall dimensions that we might not understand.

I believe that we can make positive progress towards solving the overall problem by considering and enacting into laws those proposals that offer incremental improvement to our current criminal justice system. The criminal sentencing element of the system certainly can stand improvement. I commend you, Mr. Chairman and the committee, for approaching that aspect of our judicial system. I believe you have before you several measures which offer a distinct possibility to improve it.

As you are aware, I am sponsor of one of the measures and cosponsor of two of the other measures now under consideration. I would like to begin with just a few brief thoughts on two bills that I have cosponsored and then conclude with an observation about one that I have authored myself.

Mr. Chairman, I have cosponsored S. 181, one of several bills before you which deals with the concept of sentencing guidelines. I certainly commend you, Mr. Chairman, for your efforts in that regard.

This type of bill focuses on the great disparity we now find in sentences imposed in criminal cases of a similar nature committed under similar circumstances. In some of these cases, sentences imposed are perceived by the public as unduly lenient. I believe that, when the public has little confidence in the impartiality and effectiveness of its criminal sentencing system, the respect for that system may be seriously compromised.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I will not dwell on the specific details of this measure or the others that are under consideration other than to say that the general concept has my wholehearted support. Obviously, care must be exercised in the specifics of the implementing legislation.

In this regard, I would urge specifically that careful consideration be given to the factors relating to the severity of sentences. While under this bill a sentencing commission would establish the guidelines, I would say, Mr. Chairman, that I am somewhat concerned that the specific guidelines not be too short.

I believe that a vast majority of the law-abiding public has the perception that convicted criminals are back on the street far too quickly after conviction. We must be careful if we adopt the guidelines approach because we can build up public confidence here, but we could cause that confidence to drop to an even lower level than it is today if we adopt this approach and then, through it, allow the resulting guidelines to impose sentences which are unduly lenient.

I am sure that we are all concerned about that possibility.

We must be particularly careful in this regard, and I urge the committee to focus on this aspect perhaps even to the extent of being specific in this regard in any legislation that you report out.

In concluding my remarks on this particular subject, I would note that I believe there is widespread support for this general concept. I would note that Chief Justice Burger, while not proposing any specific remedy, has joined the ranks of those concerned about the judicial system and the correction officials who deplore the substantially different sentences meted out to criminals charged with similar crimes and having similar records.

Lastly, but very important, Mr. Chairman, I would note that I believe this general concept will go a long way toward reducing the tensions that are very high and resentment that occurs among prisoners over widely differing sentences and the perceived vagaries in the parole operations.

Mr. Chairman, I am also cosponsoring—

Senator KENNEDY [acting chairman]. You would consider, then, abolishing parole?

Senator DOMENICI. Mr. Chairman, if the bill comes out with the notions that I have expressed here, where we can count on a judge having a very easily interpreted game plan from these guidelines, then I would think it has served its purpose.

As to S. 260, which is a proposed amendment to title 18 of the Federal Code, which would require the imposition of mandatory minimum terms with respect to certain criminal offenses, I am cosponsor of that, also. My only reservation about this specific bill is that specific minimum sentences imposed in section 4 through 7 may be too short.

As I have mentioned, with respect to S. 181, I would strongly urge the committee to carefully consider that issue.

Again, I believe we must be particularly careful not to undermine public confidence in our efforts by making sentences too lenient.

Section 3 of S. 260 is similar in concept to S. 31, which I introduced early this session. S. 31, is a measure to amend the Gun Control Act of 1968 to provide separate offenses and consecutive sentences in felonies involving the use of firearms. This is a concept which I introduced last year. I urge the committee's favorable consideration.

I am pleased that Senators Pell, Curtis, Stevens, Thurmond, and Schmitt have cosponsored my particular bill.

I would like to note that there is widespread interest, Mr. Chairman, in this bill in the House also. While there are several bills there that take different approaches to the problem, I would observe that one-fourth of the House Members have cosponsored Congressman Glenn Anderson's bill, H.R. 1559, which proposes this concept.

I believe that this type of legislation is not only ripe for passage, but is the type of legislation that will make a definite positive contribution towards improvement of our criminal justice system.

I believe that by imposing a minimum mandatory sentence for firearms-related offenses, a bill such as mine will make the certainty of punishment more of a reality. We are seeing more and more agreement as to the need for this type of legislation.

I agree with you, Mr. Chairman, on the introduction of S. 260, wherein you stated that such need is "to deter potential offenders from criminal conduct while at the same time keeping the violent offender in jail and off the street for at least a limited period of time."

The concept of the measure I have introduced is made up of several key elements. First, a specific minimum sentence is established for the first offense. I believe this minimum should be no less than 1 year, but the committee may find that a longer minimum is necessary.

Second, a provision must be made for a more severe mandatory minimum sentence for each succeeding offense after the first.

Last, there must be a provision that would mandate that the mandatory minimum sentences not be served concurrently with the substantive offense and that they not be suspended or should the sentenced individual be eligible for parole or probation during that mandatory term.

I would urge the committee to include these elements in any mandatory minimum sentencing legislation that they report out.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the soaring crime rate in this country, particularly those involving firearms-related crimes, mandate that we try this approach at this time.

I need not bore you with the statistics, some of which are outlined in the introduction to S. 31, so I will not repeat them. But I believe that the approach found in S. 31 is the most satisfactory of all those with which I am familiar. I believe that such an approach is the least controversial, both within the Congress and from the public's standpoint.

This type of legislation has been endorsed by groups spanning a wide range of political philosophy and ideology.

I believe penalties for firearms-related crimes should be placed on the wrongdoers. We should not punish the law-abiding parts of our society for the crimes of a few.

Mr. Chairman, I have only a few remaining remarks. I know of your busy schedule.

Only by putting the criminal on notice that his misdeeds will cost him dearly can we hope to correct this critical problem. Accordingly, I strongly urge this committee to act favorably on this type of measure.

I thank the chairman and members of the committee for giving me this opportunity. I commend you for the hearings.

The three areas I have covered I think are of extreme importance. They are not easy. They will take a lot of sensitivity and concern for the overall judicial system and people.

I just hope we will get something done this year, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much, Senator. We appreciate your interest and concern and your comments here this morning.

They are very much along the lines of the testimony heard earlier and Senator McClellan's and my own views.

Senator Hatch?

Senator HATCH. I would like to commend you for your viewpoints here this morning, Senator Domenici.

I would like to look over S. 181 and S. 260 and consider those personally. I would like to be listed at this time as a cosponsor on S. 31. I think that is an excellent approach. I think that puts a premium on not using a weapon in the commission of a crime.

Senator DOMENICI. Thank you, Senator Hatch.

Senator HATCH. I commend you as usual for your great perception here in the U.S. Senate.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Senator Domenici.

Senator DOMENICI. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Hart?

We welcome you here.

TESTIMONY OF SENATOR GARY HART

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, members of the subcommittee, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you to offer some thoughts on legislation to restructure our Federal criminal laws. The need for improving our system of criminal justice is apparent to anyone familiar with how the system operates. I am particularly concerned that we devise the means to provide clear standards for criminal sentencing.

Sentences imposed in criminal cases are often perceived by the public as unduly lenient or unduly severe. When the public has little confidence in the impartiality and general effectiveness of its judicial system, respect for the law is seriously compromised.

Together with Senator Jacob Javits, I introduced Senate bill 204, the Federal Sentencing Standards Act of 1977. The bill would apply a general definition of justice under which like cases are treated alike and unlike cases are treated proportionately to their differences.

I should note at the outset the numerous and invaluable contributions to this bill by Senator Javits and his staff. His role in helping to foster and develop this piece of legislation from its inception was irreplaceable, and he should be commended for continuing his long-standing interest in enhancing the quality of our judicial system.

The bill Senator Javits and I have offered contains four main elements. First, it would narrow the discretion which can be exercised by sentencing judges by employing the presumptive sentencing device. For each gradation of seriousness of criminal behavior, a definite penalty—the presumptive sentence—would be set. Individuals convicted of crimes of that degree of seriousness would receive the presumptive sentence, unless there were special, carefully defined circumstances of aggravation or mitigation. Under our bill, a second serious offense would automatically be considered an aggravating circumstance, requiring a more severe sentence than the presumptive sentence.

Second, the presumptive sentences and the permitted aggravating and mitigating circumstances would be prescribed by a Federal Sentencing Commission. The Commission's guidelines would take effect within 45 calendar days of issuance, unless both houses of Congress adopted a resolution of disapproval. The Federal Sentencing Commission would have an initial life of 6 years.

Third, the bill sets forth the rationale which the Commission must follow in prescribing its sentences: namely, a just deserts rationale. The severity of a sentence would have to be based on the seriousness of the individual's offense, rather than on his likelihood of recidivism or need for treatment. Imprisonment, as a severe penalty, would be restricted to serious crimes. For lesser offenses, penalties other than imprisonment would be prescribed, such as intermittent confinement, supervision in the community, fine or forfeiture, curfew or other travel restrictions, and community service.

Finally, since the sentence will be based on the seriousness of the offense, indeterminacy of sentence will be phased out. By insuring that the offender serves the sentence determined by the sentencing judge, the public and the offender are assured of both the certainty of punishment and the date of its completion.

This bill was based on the recommendation of the Report of the Committee for the Study of Incarceration, "Doing Justice, the Choice of Punishments." Prof. Andrew Von Hirsch, the principal author of "Doing Justice," aided substantially in the drafting of this legislation. The bill was also based in part on the work done by other experts in the field of crime and punishment, including Richard Singer, Alan Dershowitz, Marvin Frankel and Norval Morris, some of whom will be testifying before you in the next couple of days.

Mr. Chairman, the Hart-Javits bill—S. 204—is very similar to proposals put forth by Senator Bentsen and by Senators Kennedy and McClellan. I know that several members of this subcommittee are sponsors or cosponsors of proposals relating to criminal sentencing.

I am happy there is so much interest in this issue. Together, these various proposals provide an excellent framework within which to reevaluate the way we deal with those convicted of criminal conduct.

The major difference between our bill and Senator Bentsen's bill, S. 979, is that while the Bentsen bill incorporates the sentencing guidelines within the text of the bill, our bill—as well as the Kennedy-McClellan bill—delegates this task to a Federal Sentencing Commission.

The concept of a sentencing commission is a good one. Issues relating to criminal sentencing can best be considered in an orderly, dispassionate fashion by a group intimately familiar with crime and punishment and somewhat insulated from the politics of the situation. Both the Hart-Javits bill and the Kennedy-McClellan bill require the commission to hold public hearings and to insure an acceptable degree of public participation.

Traditionally, the promulgation of Federal sentencing standards has been the responsibility of the Congress. This has not changed. Under both the Hart-Javits bill and the Kennedy-McClellan bill, the sentencing guidelines suggested by Sentencing Commission would not go into effect if Congress disapproves.

There are three important points which distinguish the Hart-Javits bill, S. 204, and the sentencing provisions contained in the Kennedy-McClellan bills, S. 181 and S. 1437. The three basic differences are: (1) The way in which the standards are developed by the Commission; (2) how closely the sentencing judge must adhere to the Commission's standards; and (3) the mode of appointing members to the Sentencing Commission.

S. 204—the Hart-Javits bill—requires the Commission, in determining the presumptive sentences, to consider only the seriousness of the offense and factors which directly relate to how the offense was perpetrated. The Kennedy-McClellan bills, on the other hand, allow the Commission—and would allow sentencing judges—to consider not only the seriousness of the offense but also (quoting from page 303 of S. 1437), "age; education; vocational skills; mental and emotional condition . . . previous employment record; family ties and responsibilities; community ties; role in the offense; . . . prior criminal activity not resulting in convictions (emphasis added) . . . and degree of dependence upon criminal activity for a livelihood."

Mr. Chairman, I have serious reservations about these provisions. I am especially troubled by the idea of judges considering reports relating to an offender's past, apart from prior convictions. I fear certain of these provisions might compromise the foundation of our rules of courtroom procedure, the presumption of innocence. I am also concerned about the threat to civil liberties inherent in employing evaluations of an offender's "state of mind," "previous employment record," "need for treatment" or likelihood of recidivism in determining a sentence commensurate with the seriousness of the offense.

Under the provisions of the Hart-Javits bill, the discretion allowed sentencing judges is strictly defined by the presumptive sentences and permitted aggravating and mitigating circumstances. The Kennedy-McClellan bills would allow the sentencing judge to sentence outside the guidelines established by the Sentencing Commission. I have serious reservations about this provision. I realize many feel strongly that it is impossible to anticipate the circumstances surrounding criminal behavior enough to warrant reducing judicial discretion to the degree required by the Hart-Javits bill.

My support for the sentencing scheme outlined in S. 204 rests on the belief that the potential risk of harm to any one offender is more than offset by the potential harm to many under a more open-ended scheme as proposed by S. 181 or S. 1437, or by the harm done to many every day under the so-called "individualized" sentencing we have today.

I want to emphasize that our bill, by requiring that the severity of a sentence be commensurate with the seriousness of the offense, in no way ignores the importance of deterring crime or of meeting the offender's need for education or vocational training, medical care, or other correctional treatment.

S. 204 recognizes the need to protect the public. It reflects the judgment that this is best done by equalizing punishments for similar crimes and by ensuring that anyone convicted of a serious crime will in fact receive a term of imprisonment. The proposals offered by Senators Kennedy and McClellan do not provide this assurance. Under those bills, a sentencing judge is allowed to sentence outside the sentencing guidelines. While this is grounds for appeal, the fact remains that under such a scheme a serious offender may receive probation or a suspended sentence, while a non-serious offender may receive a lengthy term of incarceration.

It should be clear that there is a basic philosophical difference between the Kennedy-McClellan bill and the Hart-Javits bill. The sentencing provisions under the former allow an individual to be imprisoned for reasons unrelated to the seriousness of the offense. For example, a person could be imprisoned and forced to participate in educational or vocational programs as a condition of his or her release.

Under the Hart-Javits bill, no one would be imprisoned for a period of time beyond that which could be commensurate with the seriousness of the offense.

It is true that the sentencing scheme outlined in S. 204 might be viewed as a punitive model. But this does not mean the end of rehabilitative programs within prisons. It does not declare rehabilitation a failure. It does declare widespread judicial discretion—in the name of rehabilitation—a failure, and it declares that rehabilitation, as the primary purpose or justification for depriving someone of his or her civil liberties, is both inappropriate and unfair.

We should work to expand and improve rehabilitative programs within prisons. We need to do what we can to provide alternatives to imprisonment, and to understand the “why’s” of criminal behavior so we can attack the crime problem at its roots. But rehabilitative programs, generally speaking, should be voluntary. Tying a prisoner’s release to someone’s evaluation of his or her state of mind or likelihood of recidivism can be more cruel than a frankly punitive model for sentencing.

Mr. Chairman, rank-ordering crimes and assigning appropriate sentences is a difficult task which requires a good bit of subjective judgment and arbitrary line-drawing. My hope is that the subcommittee will carefully determine the right amount of flexibility to allow the Sentencing Commission—should the Congress choose to establish such a body—in carrying out its responsibilities.

The Commission will need to develop a coherent, internally-consistent set of sentencing standards. The members of the Commission should be given a clear direction to follow, but should not be hamstrung in their deliberations by too many constraints. I hope that the factors to be considered by the Commission suggested in S. 1437, for example, are for illustrative purposes, and that the Commission would not be required to account for the weight given each one in developing its standards.

The other major difference between S. 204 and the Kennedy-McClellan bills is the way the Sentencing Commission is established. S. 204 provides for the President to appoint its members, and envisions the Commission as an independent rulemaking agency, technically a part of the executive branch. S. 181 and S. 1437, by contrast, provide for the Judicial Conference of the United States to select Commission members and envisions the Commission as part of the judicial branch.

There might be some merit in placing this Commission more or less in the judiciary. But considering the importance of this issue, and the magnitude of the problems the Commission will confront, perhaps some of the Commission members should be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate. Certainly this question merits careful study.

Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that a society can best be judged by how it treats those who do not conform to its rules. We should recognize that, by any standard, the reality of our criminal justice systems falls far short of the values it is designed to promote. Recodifying the criminal code will not solve all of the problems, but it will go a long way toward simplifying the administration of justice and providing coherent standards by which it can be judged.

In so doing, the subcommittee, its staff and all who have contributed to the proposals you are now considering will have done much to restore respect for the law. You should be commended for the hard work that will go into holding these hearings and developing appropriate legislation.

The sentencing provisions of S. 204, S. 181, and S. 979—as well as the sentencing provisions of S. 1437, the “Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977”—are all a step in the right direction. They each narrow the discretion which can be exercised by sentencing judges. Surely reducing the disparity in sentences imposed in similar cases is an essential component of any meaningful reform in this area.

But there is a good deal of disagreement as to whether imprisonment is intended to punish, protect law-abiding citizens, rehabilitate criminals, or to accomplish a combination of these goals. We must address ourselves to these uncertainties in any new sentencing standards we might adopt, or else we will simply add to the confusion.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you again for the opportunity to appear before the subcommittee. I would be happy to answer any questions you might have, and I am eager, as I am sure my cosponsor, Senator Javits, to help the subcommittee in any way I can. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY [acting chairman]. Thank you very much.

We welcome Senator Javits, a former member of this committee. His interest in criminal justice continues. He has always been an active member in this field. We welcome your comments.

Obviously, the differences between your and our approach are important; but they are minimal. I think some of the points that you made here are important for us to think through. For example, you take the Presidential route in the formation of the Commission; we do it through the Judicial Conference. We will evaluate closely the reasons why you felt that variation was important. I do not think that is a serious difference. I would like to give some consideration to it. Also, concerning the presumptive sentences, in whatever is going to be recommended by the Commission, there will be some minor degree of flexibility. You would rather have a flat presumptive sentence, as I understand it, while we favor some additional flexibility.

It seems that we are certainly in the same ballpark, in terms of meeting the challenges.

Senator Javits?

STATEMENT OF HON. JACOB K. JAVITS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM NEW YORK

Senator JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my admiration for Senator Hart. I think he devoted himself to this measure in a very effective way.

Drawing on my own experience as attorney general of the State of New York, I was impelled to go on this bill, especially considering the grave difficulties we have had in the prisons in New York. At Attica we had a prime demonstration of what happens when frustration and despair have reached their end; terrible tragedy resulted.

Senator Hart has testified very ably on the details of the bill and the philosophy which animated it. I would like to make just two observations.

I am as interested as the chairman and Senator McClellan in rehabilitation and the reconstruction of a life. Our record, however, shows that the rate of recidivism is extremely high. An estimate of 75 percent is not excessive. Hence, the problem which inheres in that induced me to go with Senator Hart on this bill.

I believe that sentences are likely to be shorter when they are definite. The speculation and gamble about parole, once removed, will result in a much better administration of prisons and a much greater dedication by the prisoner and the authorities to the matter of rehabilitation, education, training, et cetera. That will be that. Every inmate will know that he must serve a definite sentence.

Today, we have a complete guessing game. No matter how long you sentence an individual for, the moment he goes to jail he is already speculating about what is going to be the outcome at the other end, how the parole commission is going to deal with him.

The second point is the confidence of the public. The public has lost a great deal of its faith in the American criminal justice system. This bill is designed in a very real way to firmly reestablish the public's faith in the criminal justice system.

I welcome, Senator Kennedy, your suggestion that the parameters between your bill and Senator Hart's and mine are relatively narrow. I, too, look forward to the reconciliation of those differences by the committee.

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, I would only support the points made by Senator Javits here and by the chairman.

The similarity and philosophy between the bills introduced by the subcommittee chairman Senator McClellan and Senator Kennedy and Senator Javits and myself are much greater than the dissimilarities. The dissimilarities are narrow but, I think, important. I am sure the subcommittee will keep those in mind in its deliberation.

I also want to thank Senator Javits again for his support of this measure. His long background and concern about the judicial system in this country and the system of crime and punishment is extremely important to the measure, and I think it adds considerable weight and merit.

I know the subcommittee will give this bill its consideration in the future.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much.

Senator Thurmond?

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join in welcoming Senator Hart and Senator Javits. We are very pleased to have you distinguished gentlemen come in and give us your opinion on the bills.

This criminal code is something that has been worked on for years and years. We thought we had it nailed down several times, and matters keep coming up.

We are very pleased to have your opinion. Thank you for coming.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I have got to leave in just a minute to go to the Foreign Relations Committee. We have a new ambassador to Saudi Arabia; he is from my State. I have to be over there. Also there is a conference committee meeting on the Armed Services bill.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Hatch?

Senator HATCH. I would just like to thank Senators Javits and Hart for their appearance here today.

Senator KENNEDY. We will be moving on this legislation, Senators, and we hope that you and your staffs will stay in close touch with us because we very much value your comments.

Thank you very much.

Senator JAVITS. Thank you.

Senator HART. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. Attorney General Bell?

We want to point out at the outset that this proposal has really moved as far and as fast because of your interest in working very closely with the members of this committee and obviously because of the President's interest.

I know you are very well aware, as all of us are, of the complexities of it and the very substantial amount of work that has been done prior to this latest effort.

We welcome you here and commend the efforts you have made to date.

STATEMENT OF HON. GRIFFIN B. BELL, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, ACCOMPANIED BY PETER FLAHERTY, DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL; AND RONALD L. GAINER, DIRECTOR, TASK FORCE ON CRIMINAL CODE REVISION

General BELL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am appearing here today with high expectations, expectations that the bill now before you, S. 1437, marks the final stage of the long effort to obtain a modern Federal Criminal Code, an effort that has the full support of this administration.

In 1962, the Model Penal Code of the American Law Institute pointed the general direction for reform of American criminal laws. Numerous States have since revised their laws accordingly.

In 1971, the Final Report of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws showed the way in which such reform could be adapted to the Federal criminal justice system. The Chairman of that Commission, former Gov. Pat Brown of California, and the Commission's staff director, Prof. Louis Schwartz of the University of Pennsylvania, deserve major credit for that innovative accomplishment.

After 6 years of further work, marked by the compilation of a hearing record exceeding 8,500 printed pages, there is now before you a detailed new Federal Criminal Code that is ready for enactment.

The Members of the Senate who have been the principal contributors to the shaping of this new code have been, of course, Senators McClellan and Kennedy, former Senator Hruska, and the late Senator Philip Hart. I am pleased to have participated with the Members of the Senate in the extensive reviews and negotiations that took place earlier this year and that led to the joint drafting of S. 1437.

Almost all of us in this hearing room know firsthand that existing Federal criminal laws are in serious need of revision. Their deficiencies are particularly apparent to those of us who must work with them on a daily basis. Two and a half centuries ago, an English judge noted that "an act of Parliament can do no wrong, though it may do several things which look pretty odd." We have some things which look "pretty odd" in our existing Federal statutes.

Side by side, we have statutes that are well drafted and statutes that are ambiguous; statutes that meet current needs and statutes that are outmoded; statutes that work as intended and statutes that are unenforceable. In some areas where there should be statutory coverage there is nothing; other areas are papered with overlapping and often inconsistent provisions.

The sentencing process is a prime example of an area that needs reform. Under present law the punishment levels for similar offenses vary irrationally, thus raising questions about the rationality of the Federal criminal justice system itself.

It is partly because of this confusing state of our law that so much attention is focused in individual cases upon attempting to unscramble and rationalize the law. This causes an expenditure of precious time on the part of judges and lawyers that would be unnecessary under a more modern criminal code.

It also introduces unfairness into our Federal criminal justice system—unfairness because of the delay caused by the confusion in the present system, and unfairness because the current law is almost incomprehensible to ordinary citizens.

By inadvertence rather than by design, we have almost reached the situation that existed in Rome at the time of the Emperor Caligula when the laws were deliberately posted on columns so far above eye level that the citizens could not read them.

S. 1437 provides a remedy for these problems by establishing for the first time an integrated code of virtually all statutes and rules concerning Federal crimes and the Federal criminal justice process. Probably its single most important contribution is in setting forth the law in a far more comprehensive, orderly, and simple manner than the statutes existing today.

This itself is a major, progressive step. It will make the law far more understandable to professionals and laymen alike. It incorporates most major areas of judge-developed law into associated statutory provisions, leaving uncodified only a few areas—such as defenses to prosecution—where compromise has made necessary, for the time being, the continuance of the practice of deferring to judges on the exceptions to criminal liability. Thus, the new code provides, with the exception of the statement of defenses, a single, basic source of Federal criminal law.

The new code's value goes far beyond its simplicity and comprehensiveness. It contains literally hundreds of improvements over the existing state of the law. Certainly it will make the criminal justice system more efficient, permitting the Department of Justice and the courts to respond to crime—from organized crime to white-collar crime—in a more effective manner.

Moreover, it will make the system more fair—more fair in providing clearer notice of what is considered criminal conduct, and more fair in providing for greater rationality and equity in sentencing. The code's sentencing system will apply guidelines to determine objectively what kind of sentence would be appropriate for a particular case and will grant appellate review of sentences outside the range specified in the applicable guidelines.

This system provides an ingenious means of assuring sentences that are not only fair to individual defendants but fair to the public as well.

As this committee proceeds with its work on the new code, one thing must be kept in mind. This bill is a compromise—a very good compromise. An editorial in the New York Times even referred to it as a “masterly” compromise. A tremendous amount of time on the part of the congressional sponsors and on the part of the Department of Justice has gone into the drafting of the bill.

I firmly believe that the result is as fair and workable a Federal criminal code as has yet been devised. It is a careful, yet progressive, balance; and care must be taken to assure that this is not upset by well-intended attempts to shift the code’s emphasis either toward the views of those who would emphasize the need of our communities for more effective law enforcement, or toward the views of those who would emphasize the equally important need for strong assurance of individual liberties.

Severable issues should be just that—severable. There will be time enough in the future to make further changes in individual provisions of the code when the need is sufficiently apparent to achieve a consensus.

S. 1437 has my strong personal support and the support of the Department of Justice. As I said earlier, it also has the support of the administration. It is now cleared through the Office of Management and Budget and all the offices that must approve of proposed legislation before the administration can be said to support it.

We will be pleased to be of further assistance during your continuing work on the bill. I look forward to its early passage.

Senator KENNEDY [acting chairman]. Thank you very much, General Bell, for your comments here and for your support for this comprehensive approach.

One of the most important, if not the most important, aspects of this legislation deals with the sentencing provisions. I think you would agree with me on that.

General BELL. I do agree.

Senator KENNEDY. One of the essential purposes of this bill’s sentencing provisions is the desire to eliminate disparity—the real as well as the apparent disparity—in sentencing.

We believe that, with the commission and the enactment of other provisions, that goal will be achieved.

But other disparity also exists. That is in the area of parole.

I wonder if you would agree with me—and I understand from your recent comments that you might—that it is also essential, because of past abuses and the promise of continued abuse, that we eliminate parole release and establish at the time of sentence the amount of time that individuals will spend in prison for given crimes.

General BELL. I do agree with that. I think it will follow, after we set up the sentencing system under S. 1437, that the parole authority ought to be removed prospectively. I do not know how we can do it retroactively for the people already in prison.

Several things would be accomplished by that. It would make the system more rational in the eyes of the public. It would restore the confidence of the public in the legal system. We see these aberrations of juries who sentence people to 1,433 years in Texas, for example, because they think they will have to serve longer before they can get out on parole.

I think it would be a deterrent to crime if a person knew that his sentence was going to be fair but that he would have to serve the sentence. He would still have the opportunity to earn good time in prison. Also, probation would still be a large part of the law for the first offender.

In the end, we are going to have to get away from the parole system; I agree with you.

Senator KENNEDY. Is it your sense that, in reviewing the current status of parole release and how it is used, that the record is clear that we really do a very poor job in being able to readily predict the rehabilitation of criminals?

General BELL. We do.

Senator KENNEDY. This is troublesome, in terms of both the appearance and the reality of injustice in our criminal justice system. In so many instances parole is based on factors which bear little relevance to whether or not the criminal has been rehabilitated.

Can one really coercively rehabilitate someone? I suppose that is the question.

General BELL. You cannot. You exacerbate the disparity through the parole system because one person will be paroled and another one will not be.

It has been necessary to set parole guidelines that indicate the factors which the parole commission is to consider in determining the parole release date. But there is still disparity.

I do not know how the parole release system rehabilitates anyone. In fact, I do not know of anyone that has really been rehabilitated by being put in prison. You rehabilitate people by putting them on probation. It might be, in a rare case, that somebody is rehabilitated by being in prison. But the American prison system is in such desperate shape that that will have to be a subject to be discussed with your committee later on, this fall, perhaps.

There is not much rehabilitation in the prison system; I will put it like that.

Senator KENNEDY. I think most would agree with that statement.

What we are really attempting, as I understand, in terms of sentencing is that we do not believe that a prison term should be based on the idea of rehabilitation. Rehabilitation is an important goal. It is an essential one, I believe. It is one that must have the support of Congress and the administration.

But what we are basically saying is that rehabilitation is not a purpose of sentencing. They have been blended in the past. What I am saying, what you are saying, and what this legislation is saying is that, when a sentence is declared by the judge, that is the sentence to be served.

General BELL. That is it, and that is the way it ought to be.

Senator KENNEDY. Under the current system, when you have a 12- to 15-year sentence—maybe some of the public thinks that the defendant is going to be in for 15 years. Yet he is paroled in 5 years. This the public cannot understand. They read about this.

All of those factors contribute to both injustice, unfairness, and misuse in terms of the individual as well as the public's perception of the criminal justice system.

General BELL. That is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. I would like to ask you about the marihuana provisions in the bill. There is great interest in the Congress and great concern by parents and by younger people.

I think it is important that your position be extremely clear. As I have heard it in the past, it is the belief that the most troublesome aspects of the drug issue in our society involve hard drugs such as heroin, and the trafficking in such hard drugs. The resources of the Federal Government ought to be devoted and targeted in these areas which cause such tragic damage to individuals, families, and our American society.

I think it is important that we understand clearly your position and that of the administration.

General BELL. The provision in S. 1437 essentially reflects the practice that we follow now. As I testified at the confirmation hearings, we devote Federal resources to apprehending traffickers. We do not devote Federal resources to apprehending people in possession of small amounts of marihuana. We leave that to the states.

We consider that to be essentially a state and local problem. So, this bill really codifies what our practice has been.

Senator KENNEDY. You think that makes a good deal of sense from a law enforcement point of view in dealing with that aspect of the drug trade which is the most dangerous to our society.

General BELL. Exactly.

Senator KENNEDY. Could you, General Bell, review very briefly why you think that this legislation is important from a law enforcement point of view?

General BELL. It is important to have a code of laws that the courts and law enforcement officials can understand. It is important from the standpoint of deterrence that the public understand what the law is.

We have a crazy quilt of laws now in many areas.

That is important. As you have noted, the sentencing part of the bill is very important. We certainly have got to bring some stability and rationality into the criminal justice system. We do not have that now.

The law now, in many ways, can be described as a nonsystem or nonset of laws because there is so much overlap. It is important to have a code of laws that makes sense and that the people can understand.

I think that that would be the best answer.

The fact that we are so far behind the states is something that is of great concern to me.

Senator KENNEDY. Thirty-five states have either completed or are working on this.

General BELL. They have codified the laws or are working on it. We in Georgia long ago recodified our criminal laws. Since then we have even recodified our criminal procedural law. The Federal Government is just out of step and behind; that is what it gets down to.

Senator KENNEDY. It seems to me that the public might get the impression that either we are not serious about improving and strengthening our criminal justice system or that we are indifferent about it.

You are satisfied that this bill also does add some important additional protections for the civil liberties of the American people?

General BELL. There is no question about that.

The best protection for individual liberties is to have specific laws. This does that. And it also improves civil rights, for example.

Getting back to the question before this, I think that this code will enable the Department of Justice to make better efforts in the area of organized crime and white-collar crime.

Senator KENNEDY. White-collar crime provisions have been added, as well as election offense provisions, extensions of the civil rights laws, and the provisions on rape.

General BELL. I think that is an improvement.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask this question. There have been those that say, well, this bill is too comprehensive, it is too all-inclusive. It is too vast and too complex. Why shouldn't we do this piecemeal? Why shouldn't we take this bit by bit? Every one of these provisions is complex. Why shouldn't we just take our time and do it bit by bit and not address this in a comprehensive way?

How do you answer that?

General BELL. There are two reasons.

One is that it is not that difficult to master this code. I thought the working draft was fairly long myself. But I had people working on it with me, and initially I spent about half a day with them going over it. I did further reading after that. We came up with a few things that we did not agree with and a great deal that we did. We found it easy to amend. It is not so difficult that it cannot be comprehended or managed.

The second and more important reason is that this is a comprehensive approach to recodifying the law. It really involves a balance. You get law out of balance if you change one part of the law without changing all of it.

I do not think it is a reasonable way to proceed to do just part of it now and some more next year and some more the year after next. I think it ought to be done at one time. You might end up with greater inconsistencies or greater irrationalities than you have now if we do it piecemeal.

Senator KENNEDY. You would agree that the interrelationship of the various titles is essential? It is difficult to do one title and perhaps not do the others in terms of definitions, reorganization and terms of culpability.

General BELL. Right.

Senator KENNEDY. If we are going to reduce the 80 different definitions of culpability to 4, which we are doing, it is important and essential that this be done throughout the criminal code. It would not make such sense to do one title here and one title there. It seems that we would just be adding again to the mishmash of current provisions.

General BELL. I think that it is especially important not to split off the sentencing provisions. I do not think you can set up this sentencing system unless you change the substantive law to go along with it.

Senator KENNEDY. They are really interrelated.

General BELL. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. In terms of equity and fairness both.

General BELL. I do not know any other way to proceed to recodify the law except by having a long bill. If the bill is not so long that it cannot be understood, then there is nothing wrong with that approach.

Senator KENNEDY. There is a vote on the floor on the Eagleton amendment.

Senator Hatch?

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to compliment you and your staff, General, for the leadership that you have taken in trying to formulate a better criminal code in the United States.

I think it is important to point out for the people here today that this bill does not decriminalize marihuana.

General BELL. Right.

Senator HATCH. What it does is put the emphasis on apprehending traffickers. As I read the bill, it does make a person guilty of various class felonies, for possessing 10 grams or more. Ten grams is a little more than a third of an ounce of marihuana.

It has been indicated in testimony here in the past that 65 to 75 marihuana cigarettes could be made from 1 ounce. So, I have to admit that I like this bill better than what has been advocated here in the past. I suspect you do, also.

General BELL. I am not familiar with that past testimony; I take my own position.

Senator HATCH. You bet.

Do you feel as I do, then, that marihuana is something for which repeated possession of substantial quantities should be categorized as something more than just a minor offense with a decriminalized penalty?

General BELL. I do take that position. We are not decriminalizing.

Senator HATCH. That is right.

General BELL. We are not making possession of a small amount a Federal crime. It is still a local crime or a State crime. We cannot enforce all the local laws on the Federal level.

Senator HATCH. I understand.

General BELL. We want to devote our resources to catching the traffickers in hard drugs and marihuana also.

Senator HATCH. I commend you for that.

I want again to say that I think you have provided some energetic leadership—you and your staff—in this particular area. I, for one, want to congratulate you for it.

General BELL. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. General, we will perhaps submit additional questions to you. We appreciate very much your presence here. I want to work very closely with you and the Administration in expediting this.

I note Mr. Flaherty's and Mr. Gainer's presence here. Mr. Gainer also has been very, very helpful to us.

General BELL. It is a pleasure for us to work with you. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you.

We are going to suspend now. I will not be here when we reconvene. Before we do suspend, I want to give a warm word of welcome to the former Governor of California, Governor Brown. He has probably been more concerned about this issue than any single individual.

It has been a long, hard, and persistent matter of interest and concern to Pat Brown. He has come all the way from Indonesia. He arrived just a few hours ago to be with us here this morning.

Governor, we are going to hear from you shortly when we reconvene. We are going to recess.

But I want to add a very warm personal welcome to you. Your very signal work in this area does not go unnoticed.

Senator HATCH. Likewise.

I will be back soon, Governor Brown, to begin your testimony.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH [acting chairman]. The subcommittee hearing will come to order.

Governor, welcome to our committee. We are happy to have you with us today and we thank you for the efforts which you have put forth with regard to this bill.

We are pleased to welcome you to our committee.

Mr. BROWN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I have asked Professor Schwartz, who is the executive officer of our commission, to sit beside me. He has studied all of these code revisions and has written several articles on them. I know he is going to testify after I testify.

Senator HATCH. We are happy to have you here also, Professor Schwartz. We welcome you.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF EDMUND G. BROWN, FORMER CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

Governor BROWN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of this committee.

I want to thank you for permitting me to testify. I am a member of the State bar of California and a partner in the law firm of Ball, Hunt, Hart, Brown, and Baerwitz. I am former Governor of California and former attorney general of California.

In 1966, President Johnson appointed me Chairman of the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws, and I served in that capacity until the Commission filed its report with the Congress and the President in 1971. Since then, I have continued my interest in the revision of title 18 of the United States Code. I am here today to urge the Senate Judiciary Committee to report favorably on the new bill, S. 1437, introduced by Senators McClellan and Kennedy. I believe that the broad subject matter embraced by this bill is of importance to the whole country and that Congress should address itself to the problem of revision with the least possible delay.

I had some reservations with regard to the wisdom of certain provisions contained in the former bill, S. 1, although I was convinced that a very substantial part of that bill constituted sound legislation and a great improvement over the existing provisions of title 18. Last year I urged Senators McClellan, Hruska, Kennedy, and Hart to adopt a compromise which would eliminate certain of the more controversial sections of the earlier bill and retain the existing law in place of those provisions. Senators Mansfield and Scott, then majority and minority leaders of the Senate, evidently thought well of the suggestions and urged the adoption of a compromise which might speed the legislation toward passage by the Senate. A prodigious effort was made by the four members of the committee toward that end, and substantial agreement was reached concerning elimination of the more controversial sections of the bill. While our hopes were not wholly fulfilled, the staff work on the legislation continued, and I sincerely congratulate Senators McClellan and Kennedy and their respective staffs on their ability to join in the introduction of S. 1437. I am particularly gratified that Attorney General Bell is lending his support to a bill that constitutes a balanced compromise and yet, at the same time, is progressive legislation.

I cannot claim total familiarity with all of the revisions of this new bill, but I believe that it incorporates many of the recommendations which the National Commission made to Congress 6 years ago.

When you consider that we took 3½ years to write the original recommendations that were presented in our report, it will take some time to go through this new bill and find the differences between the report that we made and the bill that was introduced. I am very proud of the work that our Commission accomplished, and I am glad to see that it is given recognition in this bill.

I recognize, of course, that before the enactment of comprehensive legislation such as that before this committee, some opposition will be encountered from those whose concern focuses primarily on strong law enforcement, and, likewise, from others whose approach to the problems of crime relate solely to the goal of protecting the civil liberties of our citizens. I have usually found myself within the ranks of the civil libertarian group. At this particular time, however, I would urge Members of Congress and all other protagonists for change in our criminal laws to set to one side their preoccupation with their own views as to all—and I emphasize “all”—needed change regardless of direction. Instead, I would urge that we join together and fix our sights on the vital and transcending need for a general revision of the law.

It is certainly unnecessary for me to enumerate the deficiencies of title 18 of the United States Code as it presently stands, since they have been thoroughly documented and are matters of which I am sure this committee is already fully aware.

Nor do I believe that there is any need for me to point out the unlikelihood that anyone will proclaim that the revisions of S. 1437 constitute the best criminal code that could be devised. No one has yet put together a document that could reach such a broad goal. I suspect that a bill of that nature would have so little chance of enactment that we would be wasting our time if we were discussing it today. A consensus could not be obtained.

I suggest that Congress has three possible courses which it might pursue in the modernization and revision of title 18.

First, it could make a serious and detailed attempt to deal with each section or chapter needing revision in separate bills. Parenthetically, I submit to you that every chapter ultimately needs such treatment. That course would have the advantage of educating the Congress and the public with regard to all the intricacies of the criminal law. But it would obviously take forever. One hundred years from now when the last chapter might be addressed, it would be time to start all over again. Meanwhile, an endless amount of effort would have taken the time of the Congress away from other important affairs.

A second course would be for Congress to seek a single, comprehensive revision of the whole code on a unified basis, embracing therewith a determination to settle all disputes with regard to every section. In the usual effort to update and amend the Federal laws in a particular area, that may seem the obvious solution. In a matter so packed with difficulties, honest disagreement and serious controversy as to the administration of the criminal laws, however, an attempt to iron out all disputes in a single piece of legislation would almost inevitably doom the revision to frustration and final defeat.

S. 1437 seems to me to follow the middle ground which is eminently sensible and pragmatic. There are certain broad areas in the scope of title 18 which can be revised on a modern and acceptable basis, without stirring deep controversy. The bill addresses itself to those broad areas. There are, however, certain additional areas which do arouse strong differences of opinion and controversy, but which might be resolved without jeopardizing the success of the whole revisionary effort. The proposals for decriminalization of marijuana possession and a modern sentencing structure might be cited as obvious examples. Immediate changes in those laws would seem to be imperative. One might realistically expect that differences in approach might be ironed out.

In other areas, however, the difficulties were too deepseated to have permitted joint sponsorship of this bill and any attempt to deal with them in broad legislation, such as S. 1437, would only have resulted in seriously jeopardizing any chance of passage of this much-needed legislation. Such matters as the secrecy provisions, which were contained in S. 1, gun registration and wire tapping, could only have been resolved after struggles which almost inevitably would have destroyed any chance of passage. I believe this was the primary difficulty faced by S. 1.

Separate bills addressing themselves to narrow, specific controversial problems, seem to me to be the obvious way of handling those matters. When enacted, they will, of course, become part of the new code.

I, therefore, urge all my friends in the American Civil Liberties Union, as well as those who are convinced that some form of more effective criminal justice is absolutely critical, to direct their efforts toward securing what is immediately possible and realistic in the way of revision and improvement in the criminal laws.

It is obvious that S. 1437 represents a delicate balance between the separate viewpoints of what might be termed conservatives and liberals. Any attempt to upset that balance by piling on the special concerns of one group or the other may doom the legislation to almost certain defeat. In my opinion, it should be pressed towards passage with its provisions virtually intact. Thereafter, there will be enough time to secure through separate bills all the changes that either group may deem desirable.

Thank you again for allowing me to testify.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Governor.

We will hear now from Professor Schwartz, and then I will have some questions for both of you.

STATEMENT OF PROF. LOUIS B. SCHWARTZ, FORMER DIRECTOR, NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Thank you, Senator.

There is very little left to say after what you have already heard this morning. I have said it in writing, and a copy has been filed.

SUMMARY OF TESTIMONY OF LOUIS B. SCHWARTZ, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN PROFESSOR OF LAW, UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA, AND DIRECTOR, NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

I am grateful for the opportunity to testify in favor of prompt reform of the Federal criminal code, and to support the McClellan-Kennedy bill, S. 1437. S. 1437 proposes numerous important improvements in existing law, following in the main the recommendations of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, hereinafter referred to as the "National Commission". It would enhance the effectiveness and fairness of law enforcement without undermining constitutional rights. It will help to make the law respectable, and thus promote respect for law. It has its shortcomings from my point of view; and some issues such as capital punishment, gun control, insanity and other defenses have been passed over as politically insoluble for the present. Some of my concerns are listed in an appendix to this summary, and many of my views are more completely stated in Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws: Issues, Tactics and Prospects, 1977 Duke Law Journal 173. But in a democracy all legislation must compromise among countending points of view. Insistence by any faction on complete adoption of its program is the surest way of blocking any progress.

ADVANCES OVER PRESENT FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAW

1. Organization; Simplification; Modernized Definitions of Crime; Elimination of Obsolete Offenses.

2. Sentencing—Introducing Order and Reason Into the Chaos of Sentencing.—There are two central aspects of any penal code: (i) what activity is penalized, and (ii) what punishments are authorized and how much discretion is allocated to judges, parole officials and others in relation to the imposition and service of sentences. Present Federal law is notoriously defective in the looseness with which sentencing is regulated. Prosecutors have enormous power over sentence although sentencing is generally thought to be a judicial function. They have this power because of virtually uncontrolled discretion in selecting the charges to bring against the accused, in bargaining to drop charges in exchange for pleas of guilty, and in making sentence recommendations which are often deferred to by the sentencing judge. The Federal prosecutor can cumulate charges arbitrarily, as in the notorious instance of mail fraud, where a single fraud can be treated by the prosecutor as one crime or as 10 or 20 crimes depending on how many letters the prosecutor decides to put into separate counts of the indictment. The judges have virtually uncontrolled discretion to fix a term of imprisonment anywhere within very broad maxima set by present Federal criminal laws or to impose no imprisonment whatever. Outrageous differences in treatment of similar offenses and offenders have been reported among different Federal judicial districts and among judges of the same district. The judge's discretion (and opportunities for arbitrary action) are enlarged by his freedom to choose between consecutive and concurrent sentencing when defendant has been convicted of a number of offenses. There is no existing provision for appellate review of arbitrary sentences. The Parole Commission's discretion, under indeterminate sentences with very long maxima, is virtually boundless, although, to its credit, the Commission has often used its discretion to temper the unjust discrepancies in judicially imposed sentences and, in recent years, has sought to put the exercise of discretion on a rational basis by formulating a set of Guidelines.

S. 1437 addresses itself to these problems constructively:

(1) Prosecutorial overcharging based on the technicalities of mail fraud and other Federal jurisdictional niceties is restrained by section 201(b): "Proof of more than one [Federal jurisdictional peg] does not increase the number of offenses that may be found to have been committed."

(2) Judicial discretion to give consecutive sentences is restrained by section 2304 permitting consecutive sentences to aggregate no more than (roughly) double the longest sentence for any one of the offenses.

(3) Sentencing arbitrariness will be notably restrained by providing for appeal from sentence. Section 3725.

(4) Parole discretion would be subjected to congressional guidance by specifying considerations to be taken into account, by limiting the duration of parole, by mandating parole for at least the final one-tenth of the prison term imposed, by providing for administrative appeals from denial or revocation of parole, and by regulation of parole procedure.

(5) An innovative proposal to develop a national sentencing policy is embodied in Part E of the bill, establishing a Sentencing Commission to develop Guidelines for the judges as well as the Parole Commission. Although the Federal judges would not be bound to sentence within the range suggested by the Commission's guidelines, they would have to state their reasons for not doing so, and sentences outside the guidelines would be appealable. One can admire the creative power of this proposal without being certain, at this stage, that it is preferable to or combinable with other options, e.g., intensification of the reform of parole.

3. The Rigidities of Mandatory Minimum Sentencing Are Avoided.—Where prior legislation has mandated prison sentences, e.g., for narcotics and weapons offenses, S. 1437 opens the gate to some guided exercise of judgement. Sections 1811, 1823. The commendable desire of Congress to express national penal policy is far better served by declaring policy preferences or guidelines than by seemingly absolute requirements which are easily evaded by prosecutors and others.

4. Offenses Are Reasonably Graded.—The principle that big thieves deserve harsher treatment than petty thieves is embodied not only in the provision on theft, but also in tax and other laws. A modernized treatment of arson gets away from grading (inherited from feudalism) that makes burning a dwelling or an "outhouse" thereof the most serious offense; section 1701 deals with burning or exploding "public facilities and structures", i.e. schools, theaters, office buildings, systems of communication, energy, water, sanitation, etc. Antique and perverse grading of homicide is eliminated. No longer will killing by an agonizing parent or spouse to end the tortures of a dying loved one be treated as "first degree" (potentially capital) murder—because it is "deliberate"—while a wanton slaying on impulse "for kicks" is second degree murder because it lacked "premeditation". No longer will a killing provoked by vile racist insults be treated more harshly than a killing provoked by a slap.

5. Civil Liberties Are Extended.—Perhaps the greatest extension of civil liberties inheres in the sentencing reforms mentioned above, insofar as they guard against arbitrary deprivation of liberty. Care has been taken to avoid penalizing "leaks" of information from the government, except in a few categories of vital defense secrets and private information furnished to the government in confidence. Discrimination based on sex becomes criminal. Section 1504. The Smith Act with its notorious threat to freedom of speech and membership in radical political organizations has been eliminated. Dropped also are the relic of World War I hysteria directed against circulating false rumors in wartime (18 U.S.C. sec. 2388), and the obsolete 18th century act purporting to restrain American citizens' contacts with other nations. Disobedience of a clearly invalid judicial injunction is excluded from punishable contempt (but that does not palliate the unfortunate upgrading of contempt to the level of felony). Section 1335. Sex offenses have been appropriately narrowed, e.g., by limiting criminality in both heterosexual and homosexual relationships to force and imposition on children; so-called statutory rape is relieved of some of its absurdities by excluding sexual incidents between juveniles of approximately the same age.

Probably a major target of the American Civil Liberties Union and others will be the obscenity law, which is indeed unsatisfactory (see Appendix) although not more unsatisfactory than present judge-made law.

6. Corporate Crime-Control Is Meaningfully Strengthened.—Officers are made responsible if their "reckless failure to supervise" contributes to corporate criminality, section 403(c). Convicted corporations may be required to advertise their disgrace. Section 2005. Restitution to "victims" may be ordered. Section 2006. Fines may go as high as twice the gain from the crime or the loss caused by the crime. Section 2201(c).

7. Minor Marijuana Offenses Are Decriminalized.—Possession of less than 10 grams is decriminalized in section 1813. This is a hopeful beginning in the dismantling of a widely disregarded system of controls that has failed as notoriously as liquor prohibition. S. 1437 does not go far enough in decriminalizing marijuana: to buy, transfer, possess with intent to transfer, or to grow—all these constitute felonious "trafficking", however petty the quantity involved and however free of commercialism. Section 1812. Nevertheless, S. 1437 marks progress.

The achievement of such gains would be magnificent progress, even if many of us would like to see additional reforms, including some mentioned in the following list of concerns which I still have about S. 1437.

APPENDIX

CONCERNS ABOUT S. 1437; AGENDA FOR FURTHER REFORMS

1. Scope of the Bill.—Public comprehension might be facilitated by splitting off the substantive code (plus a few items like appeal of sentence, parole, victim compensation, and sentencing commission) from the remainder of the bill. The substantive code would then amount to only 200 pages.

On the other hand it is vital not to yield to pressures to reform the code piecemeal. The code is integrated. One cannot define crimes without knowing what the general definitions are. One cannot set maximum terms of imprisonment except in the light of consecutive sentence provisions and parole arrangements. One cannot in grading tax offenses or property damage offenses disregard the grading of theft by amount stolen.

2. Defenses.—See sections 501, 502 ("common law"). The draftsmen have abandoned all attempt to define exculpatory insanity, self-defense, privilege to use force in law enforcement, etc. My reasons for opposing this are set forth in Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws: Issues, Tactics and Prospects, 1977 Duke Law Journal 173.

3. Harsh Sentence Maxima.—Although the statutory maxima are generally not higher than under existing law, they are effectively higher insofar as the parole period is added to the specified prison sentence, section 2303, 3834(b), whereas under present law and the National Commission's recommendations the parole period is deducted from the specified prison sentence. Restoring parole as a deductible would be a simple way to ameliorate the sentence structure of S. 1437. Examples of harsh maxima in S. 1437 include: (i) section 1611, "maiming", carrying 12 years imprisonment plus 3 years parole, and defined so loosely as to include cases where the victim lost the use of a finger or toe, or was slightly but permanently deafened by a slap on his ear. (ii) section 1612, "aggravated battery", carrying up to 6 years for a fist fight if one combatant is knocked unconscious. Moreover, departing from the National Commission's code, upper ranges of authorized maxima are not reserved for defined classes of specially dangerous offenders. The proposed Sentencing Commission Act provides that "a substantial sentence of imprisonment shall be provided in the guidelines for most [such] cases."

4. Undesirable Short-Term Imprisonments.—The National Commission provided for a lowest-level offense that should carry no imprisonment, but fine only: the "infraction". It was peculiarly suitable to unwitting, non-dangerous breach of traffic rules, administrative regulations, and the like. The penalty has been increased in S. 1437 to 5 days in jail, an expensive, useless indignity, which will inevitably be imposed in a selected few of the innumerable cases in which it is applicable.

It can be defended as an improvement over the 30-day and 6-month penalties thoughtlessly authorized in much extant legislation. But it would be better eliminated.

Above the "infraction", S. 1437 provides three classes of misdemeanors, with maxima of 30 days, 6 months, and 1 year, respectively. Section 2301(b). Short term imprisonment is probably essential for some minor crimes, but the deterrent effect that can be gained from it is fully realized in a 30-day sentence. Additional jail up to a year is gratuitous and socially costly cruelty. Only recidivists should be subject to substantial sentences. Cf. National Commission section 3003.

5. Legislative Policy on Probation and Parole Is Not Established.—The bill states what factors shall be "considered" in making these crucial decisions, but fails to adopt the National Commission proposal that non-jail alternatives be favored unless the deciding official believes that imprisonment better serves the public interest.

6. Conspiracy.—The bill in effect continues existing law requiring merely that two persons "agree" and do "any conduct" to effectuate the agreement. The conduct need not be such as "indicates intent that the crime be completed", as in the case of attempt. It is time for a more radical cut-back on conspiracy. Since conspirators are accomplices if the crime is carried out or in any attempt to carry it out, the only need is for a narrowly defined offense of organizing or leading a substantial and continuous criminal business. Cf. section 1005 of the National Commission's Study Draft and the Racketeering provisions of the present bill. Sections 1801 et seq.

7. Obscenity.—The attempt at federal enforcement of morals in this area is a shambles, makes the law look ridiculous, and operates with extreme unfairness as between publishers of like material. Insofar as section 1842 penalizes "commercial dissemination" to adults where nothing is thrust upon an unwilling person, it ought to be dropped. The felony classification is in any event excessive. The reliance on "community standards", originally introduced in the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code as a restraint on efforts to penalize widely accepted material, has been converted by Supreme Court decisions into a weapon by which the most prudish local prosecutor can jeopardize a nationally-distributed publication. There is in section 1842 not even an exemption for material going to a state where it is lawful, although section 1843 dealing with prostitution makes it a defense to federal prosecution that the activity is lawful in localities where it is carried on.

8. False Oral Statements to Investigating Officers.—Section 1343 is too broad. It makes it a crime even to deny guilt under interrogation by an officer. Family, friends, informants and others can be convicted under this section on the basis of statements in private interviews with officers, if the officer is prepared to testify later that the false statement was "volunteered" or made after advice that it is an offense to lie to policemen. The National Commission was much more circumspect. Final Report sections 1352(3), 1354 (penalizing false oral statements only when made in the protective context of an "official proceeding", except for fire alarms, bomb scares, false incrimination of innocents).

9. Dispersal and Other Police Orders in Riots and Emergencies.—Disobedience of "public safety orders" was proposed by the National Commission as a non-jail infraction to facilitate discrimination between mere presence at a riot and participating or law obstructive behavior. Safeguards included the requirement that the order be authorized by a supervising officer. Infractions in S. 1437 are punishable by 5 days imprisonment, a penalty that should not be within the power of a single policeman to allot to someone he is prepared to say "disobeyed" him. The infraction should in any event be limited so that police cannot prevent representatives of the press and elected officials from attending, observing, photographing, and reporting confused events of high public interest.

10. Disorderly Conduct.—In response to mistaken pressure of civil liberties groups, the National Commission's carefully delimited infraction, punishable by fine only, has been dropped. The effect of this is precisely the opposite of what was intended. Disorderly conduct is not thereby eliminated as a federal crime, in federal enclaves for example. On the contrary, it is retained as an adoption from neighboring states and communities, section 1862, with varying, notoriously loose definitions and with penalties up to one year's imprisonment.

11. Possessing Burglary Tools.—Section 1715 penalizes possession of objects "commonly used" for burglary, if the possessor "intends" to use them for that purpose. This is a common state statutory provision that too easily lends itself to arrest without real probable cause and to unjust convictions. Instruments commonly used for burglary include screw-drivers, hammers and other tools which are just as commonly used for innocent purposes. Section 1715 does not even require that the circumstances are favorable to imminent use, or that the intention to use be manifest in the conduct of the accused. This is punishment of "mere preparation" run riot. A federal code, on which many states will pattern themselves, should get rid of this concept, and content itself with banning attempts.

12. Weapons Offense.—The issue of effective national hand gun control has been prepermitted as to violently controversial. Instead S. 1437 has adopted "mandatory" consecutive sentences for engaging in a crime and for using or displaying a weapon in committing the offense. Since crimes in which weapons are employed, e.g., robbery, aggravated battery, carry heavier maximum sentences precisely because of that circumstance, there is no need for mandatory consecutive sentences, no added deterrent value, and no justification for what amounts to punishing twice for the same behavior.

13. Espionage.—Important defects in this area have gone unremedied, as existing legislation is reenacted. E.g., sections 1121(a), 1122. The defects relate to such matters as overcomprehensiveness and vagueness of "information related to national defense," and failure to distinguish adequately for penalty purposes between intent to injure the United States, intention to "aid a foreign power" (without hostile intent against the U.S.), and various degrees of negligence.

14. Regulatory Offenses.—S. 1437 fails to adopt a proposal of the National Commission, Final Report section 1006, which would begin to tame the unreasonable and chaotic penalties (often imposable without regard to culpability) found in existing regulatory legislation.

15. Racketeering.—The provisions, sections 1801 et seq., taken from existing law, are needlessly complex as compared with alternatives (see Conspiracy above). They are also perverse insofar as they purport to make investment (of "tainted" money) in lawful enterprises a felony. Section 1803. The provision is probably ineffectual anyway since it operates only when accused are shown to be guilty of other severely punishable offenses, and since conviction requires very difficult tracing of the source of funds back to a "racketeering" activity.

16. Federal State Relations.—S. 1437 fails to adopt a proposal by the National Commission, Final Report section 207, which would make local authorities primarily responsible for essentially local law enforcement, even if federal jurisdiction exists technically, e.g., because of the incidental use of the mails or interstate communications. S. 1437 does not address the important issue of federal and state prosecutions duplicating each other. Cf. National Commission, Final Report section 703 et seq. Finally, S. 1437 needlessly complicates and lengthens the code by repetitious federal jurisdictional sections, e.g., sections 1601(e), 1621(c)(4), 1731(c). The problem was neatly solved by the National Commission's use of a single "catalogue" of jurisdictional bases to which succinct cross-references were made.

17. Burden of Proof.—Problems occur in relation to "affirmative defenses", on which the burden of proof is put on the defendant. Section 111. There are occasions when this may be appropriate, e.g., defense of renunciation of conspiracy or attempt, sections 1001(b), 1002(b), because a new defense is being extended where no defense at all has previously been available and the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of a defendant who has, by hypothesis, been engaged in a criminal course of conduct. But it is inadmissible to shift the burden to defendant on the issue like owner's consent to a property deprivation. Section 1703(a).

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I will only emphasize my own feeling, as an academic reformer with some practical background, that this is a magnificent democratic synthesis. While there remains an agenda for reform in the future, as there will always remain an agenda for future reform, it would be a miraculous gain if the McClellan/Kennedy bill would pass.

In my statement, I have enumerated the principle scores on which this bill is to be commended. I pass over obvious matters of organization and simplification and modernization and elimination of obsolete defenses. The Attorney General testified about that and I think nothing needs to be added.

The core of any criminal code is the definition of what shall be penalized and what kind of behavior subjects you to treatment by the official establishment. Secondly, who makes the critical decisions about how much punishment shall be handed down. That is the critical civil liberties issue in any penal code: the distribution of discretion to subject to the indignities of imprisonment and other punishment. This code makes magnificent advances in the regularization of this discretion.

We have to look back to the time when, in the English ancestor of our law, punishment was totally discretionary. One can envision a criminal code which says that anybody who does anything wrong shall be punished at the discretion of the judge. That was virtually the state of the law at one time in England. The whole development of specific offenses on the one hand and of controlled discretion on the other hand is the progress of civilization in this area.

The way this bill promotes order in what has been described as a regime of law without order—that is to say, our present sentencing system—is, first of all, by defining offenses distinctly, second, by grading offenses rationally, and, third, by providing judicial review of sentence. It is a scandal that at present sentencing is not subject to review in the Federal system. The very introduction of judicial review will lead to a considerable improvement in the equality of justice handed out in the Federal courts.

Now I come to that remarkable innovation in the legislation—the sentencing guidelines proposal. As you know, this means that a commission will develop catalogs of offenders and catalogs of offenses. The offender catalog will take into account the usual circumstances—youth, mental defect, dependency—all the things that any intelligent judge would take account of in the personal situation of the convict. The catalog of offenses will reflect in general civilized views of what is more serious and what is less. Out of this there will develop a set of guidelines. I emphasize, not a dictation to the judges as to what sentence shall be, but a range of permissible sentences. If the judge imposes a sentence within the permissible range, there will be no appeal. If it is outside the permissible range, the judge is required to state his reasons, which in itself will induce rational action. With good or bad reasons, the sentence will then become appealable.

I note with pleasure another innovation in the bill. In place of absolutely mandatory sentences prescribed in certain instances under current law, the bill provides a limited escape in the basis of judicial discretion. The improvement has to do with two things: the proper role of the legislature and the proper role of the judge. The Congress of the United States, the elected representatives, should define penal policy. It is entirely appropriate that Congress should say: In such and such a class of offenses, it is our policy that prison should be preferred, leaving it then to the judge to carry out that policy as he must carry out many other policies.

On the other hand, it is always a mistake to mandate sentences absolutely, because it is necessary to take into account—as the Supreme Court has held in the case of capital punishment—vast differences among people who commit what are superficially similar offenses. Therefore, this aspect of the bill seems to me commendable.

I note with pleasure the considerable extensions made in the protection of constitutional rights and guarantees of civil liberties. Not only are the secrecy provisions deleted, but we have extended protection of the criminal law to discrimination based on sex and alienage. In many other respects, we have strengthened constitutional liberty while at the same time tightening up law enforcement.

I was particularly happy, as a teacher of criminal law and as a former practitioner in the Department of Justice, to note the strengthening of white collar provisions, particularly the subjection of corporate crime to effective sanctions. Among these are notably an invention of the Brown Commission, the declaration that reckless default in supervision is enough to implicate a corporate officer when that default contributed to the occurrence of the corporate crime.

Another thing that is done is to provide for notice to the public when a corporation has been involved in dirty business. Part of the penalty which the judge may order—and you can't send a corporation to prison—is a little blow to the corporate image. That is to say, appropriate publicization of the corporate default. There is also provision for ordering restitution to victims. I should have preferred to see a class action outlined as a consequence of corporate conviction, but I know that class action gets into the field of civil law, and I don't claim any expertise as to that.

Finally, I will mention the marihuana improvement. It is the beginning of a reform that is long overdue. Almost everybody who has studied this subject has had to compare the marihuana sumptuary controls to that notorious failed experiment, alcohol prohibition. The bill decriminalizes possession of small quantities of marihuana. As I point out in my agenda for further reforms, which is an appendix to my statement, that this is a very meager beginning indeed. Although possession, as such, is decriminalized, under some of the definitions of trafficking, possession with intent to transfer—which might mean intent to hand over just a petty quantity to somebody else even without pay—could still be prosecuted.

The Attorney General has testified that it is not the present practice of the Department to prosecute in such cases, but I would prefer to see more effective restraints in the statute itself.

I conclude, Senator Hatch, because I have referred to some areas in which I have reservations, by repeating my very strong plea to the Congress to move us a great step forward by enacting the McClellan/Kennedy bill.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your testimony. You have covered a lot of areas.

Governor Brown, what do you feel about some of the new provisions not contained in the previous bills? You might care to remark on this also. Give me some of your thoughts about the areas not covered in previous bills, such as victims of crime, rape, political offenses, and civil rights.

Mr. BROWN. I think if you get into some of those things, you are going to make the bill a very controversial one.

Senator HATCH. They are in there now.

Mr. BROWN. Some of them are, but a great many have been eliminated.

I thought you asked the question of whether or not they should have been included. I think the important thing is the adoption of this code, because there is nothing in the days ahead that we can't either add to or eliminate other sections as we go along.

As I tried to state in my statement, if we are ever going to get a code, we are going to have to leave something to specific bills after the adoption of the code itself.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Professor, would you care to remark?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. With regard to the victim compensation fund particularly?

Senator HATCH. Sure. Or the rape provisions.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. The rape provisions, I think, are a splendid forward movement. It brings us up to date by treating all kinds of forceful and impositional sexual relations alike, whether they are heterosexual or homosexual. I think that is—I was going to say the wave of the future, but it is already present in the criminal laws of many States which followed the Model Penal Code.

Senator HATCH. As I understand it, the offense of rape, as described in the bill will no longer require separate corroboration of the victim's testimony.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Yes; there is also a provision, somewhat ambiguous, that "except as required by the Constitution," there is to be no inquiry into the sexual practices of the victim before or after the alleged crime. In my opinion, that constitutional caution is quite appropriate. There have been, of course, many, many abuses by police and in the courts of this cross-examination regarding sexual behavior of the complaining witness. Questions as to whether the complaining witness was a virgin or had had sexual relations before. These are outrageous, in my opinion, and really should have been ruled out as irrelevant.

On the other hand, I would be quite opposed to a total ban on cross-examination about all types of sexual experience. I say that because I had in mind Brady versus Maryland, a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States of about 10 years ago in which the facts were that the complaining 16-year-old told a story of violent ravishment by two black men. They received death penalties on the basis of her testimony. It was only years later that it was established that she had regularly had sexual relations with anybody on any occasion, and with whole classes of people. How any jury, judge, or society could sentence the death of two men on testimony of somebody who was known to be sick like this I can't answer.

Therefore, it is obvious to me that some degree of inquiry, carefully controlled by the judge, is constitutionally necessary as the bill itself indicates.

Senator HATCH. I think those are astute comments.

With regard to the section on labor bribery, and I don't mean to be picking isolated sections, but recognizing your authority and allowing for all the time you need to spend on this, I would just like to ask one question.

I notice that with regard to labor bribery, it seems to impose penalties on the employer. Are there any penalties imposed on the employee?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I disclaim any expertise on this section. It was drafted subsequent to our work on the Brown Commission. Would you be satisfied if I say that my own position is that corruption by anybody ought to be penalized?

Senator HATCH. I agree with that, but this section appears to read only that the employer can be found criminally liable for labor bribery. I think it should go both ways if we're going to be objective here.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I will examine it more fully and write you, Senator.

Senator HATCH. I would appreciate that because I need to examine it also.

I would like your expert opinion after you do examine it, because I am concerned that it be fair.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. If it failed to penalize corruption or bribery on the Union side, it would not be the only compromise embodied in this bill. I understand the pressures for that.

Senator HATCH. It might not be constitutional, however, if it imposes criminal liabilities on one side of the dispute, but not on the other.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. You mean the denial of equal protection, or something of that sort?

Senator HATCH. That, plus there may be some other constitutional problem.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I will write to you, Senator.

Senator HATCH. I would appreciate it.

With regard to marihuana, the intent of this bill, it seems to me, is to decriminalize the mere possession of marihuana of less than 10 grams which is a pretty small amount. This means that an indiscrete young person who might have a marihuana cigarette in his hands when he is picked up, or something like that. But that's considerably less than an ounce.

Do you, as a top criminal law professor, agree with that particular section?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I agree with it as a beginner. I don't think it goes far enough, as I say in my memorandum. It is a very conservative beginning.

Senator HATCH. I see.

With regard to the political offenses, did you participate in the writing of those provisions?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. We had the section on political offenses but they have been considerably changed in this bill.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Do you basically endorse this section?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Yes; I do.

I had some twinges with regard to some features of it. I remember, for example, an aspect of it that made it a crime, or perhaps a felony for any alien to make a contribution to a political campaign. I wasn't sure that I thought that was totally consistent with my notions. I can understand not wanting foreign powers financing our campaigns, but we have resident aliens who have interests in legislation; for example, in immigration and denaturalization legislation. I thought it went a little far to say that a resident alien might not make any political contributions. And I have other reservations. But I think they are peripheral.

None of these reservations cause me to hesitate about the McClellan/Kennedy compromise, which it is. It is a compromise in the highest tradition of democratic legislation.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate the testimony of both of you, and we are happy to have had you before us this morning.

Our concluding witness is Prof. G. Robert Blakey, former consultant to the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws. Welcome.

STATEMENT OF PROF. G. ROBERT BLAKEY, FORMER CONSULTANT TO THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

Mr. BLAKEY. My name is G. Robert Blakey. I am a professor of law at the Cornell Law School. I am also director of its Institute on Organized Crime.

My appearance here today, however, is personal. Nothing that I say should be attributed to any organization with which I am associated.

It is a pleasure to return to the committee. As Senator Hatch may be aware, I was its chief counsel between 1969 and 1973. In a sense, this is a coming home rather than an appearance before a strange forum.

Oliver Cromwell in 1656 told the Second Protectorate Parliament:

The truth of it is, there are wicked and abominable Laws which it will be in your power to alter. To hang a man for Six-and-eight pence, and I know not what; to hang for a trifle, and acquit murder—is in the ministration of law, through the ill-framing of it. * * * And I wish it may not lie upon this Nation a day longer than you have an opportunity to give a remedy. [Quoted in "Essays in the History of Early American Law," at 182 (Flaherty ed. 1969).]

This quote, from some 300 years ago establishes, I think, the enduring need for the reform of the criminal laws.

Cromwell's position on law reform was commented on by Jeremy Bentham, the English reformer, in these words:

Behold what was said in his day by Cromwell! In my eyes, it ranks that wonderful man higher than anything else I have read of him:—it will not lower him in yours. [IV Works 501 (1858 ed.).]

Any issue of public policy that can bring together men so diverse as Cromwell and Bentham is surely one that should command the support of the majority of the American people. Indeed, if we look through history, we can see an illustrious list of names associated with the reform of the criminal law: Caesar, Theodosius, Tribonian, Justinian, Beccoria, Bentham, Napoleon, McCauley, Stephen, Livingston, Field, and, in recent times in the United States, Prof. Herbert Wechsler, of Columbia and Prof. Louis B. Schwartz of the University of Pennsylvania.

If each of these men so diverse in time, place, and ideology could come together and agree on the need for the clarification and simplification of law, it establishes beyond any real question, I think, that what faces this committee is not a question of ideology—not a question of liberal or conservative—but it is a question of a tradition that stems from our Roman heritage—it is not less than a question of the rule of law.

In the last several weeks, I have had the opportunity to examine the draft of the criminal code now pending before the committee, S. 1437. I found much in it that I am familiar with that stems from the Model Penal Code. I found much in it that I am familiar with based on the work of the Brown Commission. I found much in it that I am familiar with based on the work of the subcommittee in the 92d and 93d Congress when I was intimately involved in its draftsmanship. I found much in it, also, that is new, particularly its sentencing scheme. It would be wrong to suggest, however, that the sentencing scheme is really new. It is not terribly different from that which was suggested by Beccaria in his seminal essay “On Crime and Punishment,” which was first published in the 18th century.

But I suppose the last entry in a ledger on the examination of a bill that is this long and complex is the one expressed by Professor Schwartz.

I can put it to you perhaps best in this way: If I were a Senator and this bill were presented to me on final passage in its present form, I would vote for it.

If I were the President and this bill in its present form was presented to me for signature, I would sign it.

I might add, Senator Hatch, that I have little expectation that I will either be a Senator or a President. My role, as a law professor, will be limited to commenting on what others do.

In that spirit, I have to also say that I do have some individual comments on the bill. Some of them are technical in nature, and I will not bore you with them or clutter your record with them. I will make them available to the very able staff of this committee for their own consideration.

Senator HATCH. We would be happy to incorporate anything in the record that you would desire to have included in the record.

Mr. BLAKEY. There are, however, certain policy questions that I think merit at least brief mention in a public forum. If I may, I would like, given your limitations of time and endurance in a long hearing of this kind, to briefly mention them.

The first is apparently a technical amendment, but I think it goes to the very heart of what should characterize the draftsmanship of this code.

My suggestion to you is that the state-of-mind requirement for the crime “complicity” be changed from “knowingly” to “intentionally.” [See sec. 401.]

My argument is essentially that of the drafters of the Model Penal Code. The scope of liability embraced by the term “knowingly” is simply too wide. It would include within it, for example, a cab driver could be held to be an accomplice in the crime of running a house of who, on one occasion, drove a patron to a house of prostitution. He could be held to be an accomplice in the crime of running a house of prostitution because he knowingly engaged in the conduct that aided it. [See sec. 1843.]

Similarly, a statement of complicity so broadly drafted would incorporate in criminality the Hertz Corp., which rents a car to two executives, who stand before the car rental desk discussing a price fixing meeting to be held at a hotel or a motel on a mountain.

If that car was a necessary means of transportation to the motel or hotel, and it was knowingly provided, Hertz could find itself as a corporation in complicity with the executives in price fixing.

Obviously, I have given you two extreme cases illustrating a broad statement of liability. I would not expect that the new Code would be enforced at this breadth. Nevertheless, if it were not enforced at this breadth, it would not be enforced as a matter of prosecutive discretion and not as a matter of law. [But see Wilcox v. Jeffery, 1 All Eng. Rept. 464 (Kings Bench 1951) (Spectator Newspapermen at concert held liable for violation of player).]

I would prefer to see a statement of complicity developed by Judge Learned Hand—"a stake in the venture"—reflected in the code's draftsmanship.

I would like now to comment on two series of provisions in the code. First, in the order of time, are those dealing with smuggling. Section 1411, 1412, and 1413. They are paralleled in section 1731, 1732, and 1733, which deal with theft.

I was very pleased to see, in examining the draftsmanship of the statute, that the provisions in the various sections are, indeed, parallel and can and should be interpreted in pari materia.

Essentially, my comments grow out of work I did for the National Association of Attorneys General in the last several years in drafting model antifencing legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask at this point that the committee incorporate in my testimony pages 1614 through 1626 of an article that I published in the Michigan Law Review, volume 74, 1976. The article includes statistics on theft and fencing in the United States from 1960-1975; it also includes the text of the model statute supported by the National Association of Attorneys General. I might add that Florida and Arizona have recently adopted legislation modeled on this proposal.

The essence of that study is that the role of the fence in theft must be recognized as more significant than the role of the thief. Nevertheless, the grading provisions in theft and fencing make the trafficker in stolen property only equal to the thief.

I would suggest that the trafficker in stolen property should be graded at a level higher than the thief and that that class of fence who is both a thief and a receiver of stolen property should be graded at an even higher level.

I would also suggest to you that parallel amendments be made in the smuggling sections—(sections 1411, 1412, 1413).

I would also suggest that the committee give consideration to adopting a new criminal prohibition—probably at a low level—against the possession of altered property. By altered I mean property where the identifying physical characteristics have been changed as a means of hiding stolen property in the stream of commerce.

I would also suggest to you the adoption of additional evidentiary inferences that would facilitate proof in fencing cases, that is, raising an inference of risk-taking where property is bought out of the regular course of business.

The text of the suggestions are included in the law review article, and I would refer the staff and the committee to it there.

Next, I would like to commend the committee in its bill on the major improvements reflected in the crime of rape. Certainly, they are major improvements over the suggestions that appeared in the Brown commission document.

The Brown commission document, as you know, saw rape as two crimes—one dealing with aggravated involuntary sodomy—which is homosexual rape—and the traditional rape—or heterosexual rape.

It included some suggestions for evidentiary restrictions in rape trials.

I am glad that the committee has consolidated these two crimes into one offense called rape, and it has made an effort to eliminate some of the special evidentiary restrictions found in present law. I would suggest, however, that you haven't gone far enough.

I would suggest, for example, that it should be put on the face of the statute that lack of consent in a rape case can be proved without resistance to the utmost.

Here I would also direct the committee's attention to the recent reforms in this area, both in the state of California and in Michigan. These two States have developed comprehensive approaches to the very sophisticated problem alluded to by Professor Schwartz, that is, the prior sexual conduct or reputation of a woman complainant. Clearly, it is a question of balancing between the woman's right to privacy and the defendant's right of fair trial. The legislation in Michigan and California has made an excellent effort to do this. I would commend it to the committee's attention.

Next, I would draw the committee's attention to its gambling provision, appearing as section 1841 and raise this general issue with you.

The statute is apparently designed to codify the present gambling policy of the United States. Careful analysis of it would indicate, however, that the model the committee had in mind was private, illicit gambling. The potential application of the statute to publicly owned or publicly controlled legal gambling was not carefully considered.

For example, the definition of "enterprise"—sec. 111—does not include a government. Similarly, "person" and "organization" do not include a "government"—sec. 111. If the definitions of "enterprise," "person," and "organization" do not include a "government," it might not be possible to enforce federal gambling policy against government corporations that will appear and are now in operation engaged in various forms of legal gambling.

This is certainly a major issue in the area of state run lotteries. A number of states, in fact, are engaged in lotteries and the Federal Government has articulated a number of policy judgments as to how those lotteries should be run consistent with the policy of sister States.

I would hope that the committee would carefully examine the scope of this gambling statute to see to it that there is no doubt but that it applies to state-run or state-owned gambling activities.

At the same time, I would suggest that if the law is clarified in this area, it should be clarified to indicate that only civil remedies would be appropriate in dealing with state agencies.

It seems to me wholly inappropriate to raise the specter of a criminal prosecution of a governor of a State or even State employees who are following what they believe in good faith to be the policy of that State.

The committee has already embodied in its bill a similar remedy for fraud in section 4021. I would suggest that it be expanded in a parallel way to authorize the enforcement of the gambling section, section 1841, by civil remedies, at least in the area where it deals with government agencies.

Next, I would make this general comment on the obscenity section, section 1842.

As I read it, it would not prohibit the noncommercial dissemination of obscenity among consenting adults.

While much can be said for that general proposition, I would raise with the committee whether we ought to extend that measure of the decriminalization of obscenity to what is properly known as kiddie porn.

I would suggest that whatever interest our society may have in maintaining the right of individuals to do whatever they want as long as it harms no one other than themselves perhaps that ought not to extend to what has come to be called kiddie porn. The committee might wonder whether that is too great a degree of decriminalization in this area.

Next, I would draw the committee's attention to the problem of sentencing in organized crime cases. While I was chief counsel for this committee, it conducted a study of sentencing in organized crime cases and came up with some rather shocking statistics that indicated that federal judges simply did not sentence adequately what we ultimately came to call dangerous special offenders. [See S. Rept. No. 91-617, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., at 84-85 (1969).]

This is the other half of the disparity problem mentioned by a number of previous witnesses. If it is true—and indeed I think it is—and I would associate myself with those remarks—that in many situations, sentencing in our federal courts is outrageously high, unjust, and discriminatory.

At the same time, it is, in other cases, outrageously low, unjust, and discriminatory.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I would like to incorporate in the record a copy of the GAO study of the experience of organized crime sentencing and mention a few of the statistics to you to bring out in a more dramatic way their impact.

The GAO studied the sentencing experience in organized crime cases in some six Federal strike forces. They indicated that in 52 percent of the organized crime cases, no jail time was given at all.

In those cases in which jail time was given, 58 percent of the cases had jail time imposed of less than 2 years.

If we examine, out of the general category of organized crime, just those identified members of the Costa Nostra, we have 128 sentences out of a possible 241. They found that 51 percent received no jail or that less than 2 years.

In the period 1974 to 1975, they examined 56 cases. Again, only a small fraction of the authorized maximum was given.

Indeed, five of the six strike forces had not employed the dangerous special offender sentencing in title 10 of the Organized Crime Control Act.

Frankly, Senator Hatch, I find this a shocking failure on the part of the Department of Justice to implement the statute and of the Judiciary to sentence appropriately in regular cases.

They certainly have the power in many ways under present law to deal with this problem.

To indicate the scope of that power, I would like to incorporate in my testimony at this time a memorandum prepared by the staff of the Cornell Institute on Organized Crime, dealing with the power of the courts, consistent with due process, to impose adequate sentences.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it will be entered in the record, as will your prior submissions.

[Material follows at conclusion of Professor Blakey's testimony, p. 8834.]

Mr. BLAKEY. I would also like to incorporate at this time a copy of a brief I prepared on behalf of the Americans for Effective Law Enforcement, dealing with the constitutionality of title 10 sentencing. It was submitted to the eighth circuit in United States v. Duardi, 529 F.2d 123 (8th Cir. 1975).

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it is so entered.

Mr. BLAKEY. The basic constitutionality of title 10 sentencing has been sustained so far in three circuit court opinion: Stewart in the sixth circuit (531 F.2d 326 (1967), cert. denied, 96 S. ct. 2629 (1977)), Bailey in the fifth circuit (537 F.2d 845 (1977)), and Neary in the seventh circuit (—————).

If its constitutionality is clear, I would see no reason for not making an effort to making it a part of this bill.

The committee has insofar as you are dealing with upper range sentencing under class C and B sentences reflected the concept of dangerous special offender sentencing, suggesting—and, indeed, mandating—for the sentencing commission upper range sentencing. Where you are dealing with the possible 12- or 25-year penalty, this is appropriate.

I am concerned, however, with the situation at the lower range of the penalties. I am speaking now of the class D and E crimes, for which 6 and 3 years are authorized.

It may well be that in lowering the general penalty level—a particular goal with which I associate myself in the codification effort—we may well have foregone an opportunity to secure that degree of incapacitation that might be appropriate in the area of the dangerous special offender.

I would suggest, therefore, that the concept of the extended term, as opposed to the concept of the upper range penalty, that is present now in title 10 be preserved and carried forward, at least in class D and E felonies.

I would also make another suggestion. Given the demonstrated failure over a significant period of time of the federal judiciary to implement high sentencing for the serious offender and of the Department of Justice to speak in behalf of the public interest for more appropriate sentencing at the higher range, I would suggest that there be a requirement on the face of the code that in each case the attorney for the government should make its recommendation—not necessarily an argument—but a recommendation for sentence, in order that the public can hear from the Department as to what it thinks is appropriate. Maybe we can also do at least some good in stimulating them to think through the problem of sentencing and to express their views on it.

Normally, the only time you hear from prosecutors on the question of sentencing is when they complain later that the judge didn't impose a high enough sentence. The reality of it is that in most cases, the sentence is something that the prosecutor accepts or makes no comment on at all and then merely second-guesses the judge. I think that practice should stop.

Lastly, I note that in a comment on the guidelines that incorporate the DSO sentencing provisions (sec. 994(e)) you have omitted the requirement of present law, 18 USC 3575(e)(2), dealing with "special skill or expertise."

You have also omitted the requirement of present law in section 3575(e)(3), dealing with bribery or violence as it plays a part in organized crime conspiracy. I would suggest that they be incorporated back in to the statute's provisions.

Let me turn my comments next to a provision that first became law in the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 in title II, which authorized for the first time on the Federal level what is called "use" immunity.

At that time, it was objected to by many people as a departure from sound constitutional theory. Candidly, Senator Hatch, I never really understood the bases for the objections.

Let me quote two passages from two leading scholars in the law of evidence that I think sum up the position that one ought to take on the issue of use immunity.

Dean Wigmore said, and I quote:

The constitutional efficacy of use statutes was well expounded in earlier opinions written at a period nearer to the era of constitutional making when the cobwebs of artificial fantasy had not begun to obscure its plain meaning. [IX Wigmore at 523 (3d ed. 1942).]

Charles McCormick, another leading expert in the law of evidence, commented on the Supreme Court's decision in Counselman [142 U.S. 547(1892)]. It struck down use immunity at the turn of the century. He said:

Surely (Counselman) * * * was a wrong turning at a critical point. Perhaps few decisions in history have resulted in freeing more rascals from punishment. * * * Surely * * * protection (from use plus fruits) is all that (should) * * * reasonably be demanded, and the insistence upon complete immunities for punishment is an unjust and unnecessary obstruction to law enforcement. [McCormack, at 285-86 (1954).]

I set out that background, Senator Hatch, because I think it is time for this committee to consider whether "use" immunity ought not to be extended to the defense as well.

It is commonly assumed that use immunity is a concept useful only for the prosecution in obtaining evidence. What many people fail to recognize is that the defense has an equal need for evidence in criminal cases.

I recognize that title 2 is not inconsistent with the granting of use immunity for defense witnesses. Indeed, in drafting it, the staff and the committee was very careful not to prejudge the issue and it wasn't discussed or decided either way. I also note that the seventh circuit in United States v. Allstate Mortgage [507 F.2d 494-95 (7th Cir. 1975).] has correctly interpreted the statute to say that it is not required as a matter of law that defense witnesses receive use immunity.

I would suggest, however, that that issue should be clarified on the face of title 2.

Use immunity is a theory that will reconcile the sixth amendment privilege of a defendant to compulsory process for witnesses in his behalf. With those witnesses' legitimate and appropriate fifth amendment claim against self-incrimination. Use immunity would permit both the witness not to be prosecuted based on what he said and the defendant to be freed based on their testimony. I see no reason in a society characterized by even-handed justice not to extend use immunity to the defense under appropriate safeguards, including approval by court order after the prosecution has had an opportunity to be heard and to protect its evidence in order that subsequent prosecution could be brought on independent grounds.

I would commend that extension of the present law to your attention.

Next, I would like to raise this issue with you, Senator Hatch.

I recognize the realities of political compromise. I have been associated with some political compromises in the work of this committee in the past. Nevertheless, as a scholar and as one concerned with the reform of the Federal criminal law, I must say that I cannot accept a political compromise and associate myself with the integrity of a code that omits a statement of defenses.

I find it sad, but perhaps necessary, that the defenses be omitted.

Similarly, I felt it was sad, but perhaps necessary, that the issue of privilege be omitted when the Federal Rules of Evidence went through.

What I am concerned about is the long-term implications for reform. It seems to me issues like privilege and defenses are capable of being resolved by our legislative bodies. The failure to do so calls into question the power of the Congress to govern.

What I am suggesting to you, therefore, is that this committee should institutionalize the process of reform that ultimately led to the drafting of this bill and that it incorporate in the text of the bill a permanent Criminal Law Reform Commission.

This idea is not new. Plato, the Greek philosopher, in his essay on the laws [Laws, pp. 515 et seq. (Penguin Classic 1970).] suggested such a commission after he had sketched out what was for him an ideal set of laws for his own ideal republic.

It is a practice widely followed in continental jurisprudence, and it would provide a mechanism to feed back to the Congress on nonpartisan, nonideological basis recommendations for each of the major defenses: insanity, mistake of law, and the like.

Perhaps Congress could digest, one by one, what it is apparently unable to digest as a whole.

I would hate to see this reform go through and no mechanisms for future reform be put in place.

That body might be a particularly well-suited body to formulate a set of uniform jury instructions that should ultimately be promulgated to implement the new code.

I would like to make one additional suggestion to you for reform.

Much has been said—and, indeed, in these hearings—of the degree to which this new code takes into consideration the lessons of Watergate. The lessons of Watergate, I take it, are reflected in campaign contribution limitations and the obstruction of elections provisions.

Let me add one further lesson that I think comes from Watergate. That is the obstruction by the legal profession of investigations.

John Dean's role in orchestrating the obstruction of justice that led to the recent incarceration of the Attorney General of the United States and some others teaches us a lesson that we should learn, that is, that extreme care must be taken in regulating the representation by lawyers of witnesses in grand jury investigations.

I have prepared and ask that it be incorporated in the record a memorandum that is given out at the Institute on Organized Crime for prosecutors facing the problem of obstruction of justice by unethical and disreputable attorneys.

I am sure the committee will find the memorandum of interest.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[Material follows Professor Blankey's testimony, p. 8811.]

Mr. BLAKEY. I would also suggest to you that the committee should take the bull by the horns and formulate an additional statute, in its 1300 series, dealing with the obstruction of grand jury investigations. The type of statute I have in mind would prohibit any counsel from representing more than one witness who had been served with a grand jury subpoena. No lawyer would be permitted to represent two witnesses in the same grand jury investigation.

I would also extend that prohibition against multiple representation to lawyers in his firm or associated with him in practice.

I would also raise with you the very difficult issue of fees being paid by corporate, union, and other organizations for witnesses in grand jury investigations.

I recognize that extremely serious and sensitive freedom of association issues are raised by a restriction on third parties from paying fees. I would resolve them by suggesting that no lawyer should accept a fee from one other than the client he deals with without prior approval by a court, where all of the various values—including interest the interest of the appearance of justice—can be evaluated by an independent body.

Let me conclude with a quote from Edmund Burke, who in 1780 addressed the House of Commons on the issue of electoral reform:

Consider the wisdoms of a timely reform. Early reformations are amicable arrangements with a friend in power; late reformations are terms imposed upon a conquered enemy; early reformations are made in cool blood; late reformations are made under a state of inflammation. In that state of things, the people behold in government nothing that is respectable. They see the abuse, and they will see nothing else. They fall under the temper of a furious populace provoked at the disorder of a house of ill fame; they never attempt to correct or to regulate; they go to work by the shortest way; they abate the nuisance, they pull down the house. [E. Burke: Selected Writings and Speeches, at 287 (P. Stanlis ed. 1963).]

What Burke said of reform of the electoral process in 1780, can be said of the criminal justice system in this country today, including criminal justice on the Federal level.

People in this country are fed up with the way the criminal justice system does not work. It does not work in behalf of society's interest; it does not work in behalf of the individual's interest.

If Congress does not have the courage and the will to carry forward this reform, it will be carried forward by other people who follow us. I suggest to you it will probably not be carried forward with the care for civil liberties that might be expected at this time.

I am seriously concerned that unless we bring a sense of justice to our system of justice, the reformations that come later will be at the price of our liberties. And that is a price too high for me to pay.

Thank you, Senator.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Professor.

I think that you have given us some tremendous insights into some of the difficulties and some of the good aspects of this bill.

I'm sure our staff will look this over very carefully, especially since you have had such a tremendous background with the committee and in this particular area.

We will continue these proceedings tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

We appreciate those who have testified today.

[Whereupon, at 11:45 a.m., the committee stood in recess to meet Wednesday, June 8, 1977.]

The first part of the document discusses the importance of maintaining accurate records of all transactions. It emphasizes that every entry should be supported by a valid receipt or invoice. This not only helps in tracking expenses but also ensures compliance with tax regulations. The text further explains that regular audits are essential to identify any discrepancies or errors in the accounting process. It also mentions the need for a clear and concise system of classification for different types of expenses, such as salaries, rent, and utilities. The document concludes this section by stating that a well-organized accounting system is crucial for the long-term success and stability of any business.

The second part of the document focuses on the practical aspects of accounting, including the use of journals and ledgers. It provides a detailed explanation of how to record transactions in a journal, highlighting the importance of the date, the account names, and the amounts. The text also discusses the process of posting entries from the journal to the ledger, ensuring that the debits and credits are correctly recorded. Additionally, it covers the preparation of financial statements, such as the balance sheet and the income statement, and how they provide a comprehensive overview of the company's financial health. The document concludes by emphasizing the role of accounting in providing valuable insights into the company's performance and helping management make informed decisions.

CRIMINAL REDISTRIBUTION OF STOLEN PROPERTY: THE NEED FOR LAW REFORM

G. Robert Blakey* and Michael Goldsmith**†

Our society is permeated by a consciousness of theft: triple-locked doors of city apartments, guard dogs prowling stores and warehouses at night, retail prices and insurance rates based on the assumption that large quantities of merchandise are simply going to disappear. But our consciousness of theft tends to be limited. It is easy to imagine the act itself—the forced lock or smashed window in the dead of night, the hijacker ordering the driver out of his truck cab at pistol point. It is harder to keep in mind that these acts aren't random or self-contained but are usually practical ways of acquiring goods for an established buyer. As for the dealer in stolen goods—the "fence"—there our imagination seldom goes beyond the owner of a seedy pawnshop or the character who sidles up on the street and mutters, "Hey buddy, wanna buy a watch?"<sup>1</sup>

THE development of sophisticated fencing systems for the sale of stolen property to consumers has paralleled the industrialization of society. Although crimes against property and attempts to control them have ancient origins,<sup>2</sup> most theft before the Industrial Revolution was committed for immediate consumption by the thieves and their accomplices rather than for redistribution in the marketplace.<sup>3</sup> Society's small population, inadequate transportation and

Although these social and technological developments are important, they do not provide a complete explanation for the rising theft rate or for the tremendous amount of property successfully redistributed annually.<sup>8</sup> Instead, these problems must be attributed in large part to our society's failure to identify properly the economic relationship underlying theft and redistribution and, consequently, to our inability to develop successful methods of legal control.<sup>9</sup> stolen goods from thieves and resell them at retail and wholesale levels. Frequently masquerading as legitimate businessmen,<sup>11</sup> sophisticated fences not only use cheap stolen merchandise to increase their profits and to undercut legitimate competitors,<sup>12</sup> but also operate without much risk of detection since they can easily remove identifying labels from the goods, falsify records to hide illegal purchases, or otherwise "legitimize" the goods, and then quickly dispose of them in the marketplace.<sup>13</sup> Second, there are the thieves who, with the growth of viable fencing schemes, have available purchasers for their stolen property. Thus, they too can rapidly dispose of the evidence of their crimes and are then presumably better able to avoid arrest and conviction.<sup>14</sup> In general terms, a symbiotic relationship between fences and thieves appears to have developed.

Any sketch of this relationship must recognize the primary role played by receivers. Such recognition is crucial if proper legal techniques for controlling theft are to be developed. Unfortunately, law enforcement efforts in the United States have traditionally focused on capturing the thief rather than on eliminating the fence.<sup>15</sup> This "theft-oriented" approach was perhaps sufficient in preindustrial society but is inadequate and seriously misdirected today because it fails to recognize that thieves steal primarily for profit rather than for personal consumption.<sup>16</sup> Fencing systems play a vital role in theft activity because most thieves are unable to deal directly with the consuming public and must therefore operate through middlemen who have the financial resources to purchase stolen goods and the contacts to help in their redistribution.<sup>17</sup> Although thieves usually receive only a small fraction of the retail value of their goods,<sup>18</sup> the ability of most fences to make prompt payment<sup>19</sup> facilitates rapid disposal of stolen property and reduces the risk of detection that prolonged possession entails. Without fences, few thieves could survive<sup>20</sup> because fences both satisfy their motive for stealing and provide an incentive for future theft.<sup>21</sup> Thus, the first step in combat-

18. "[A] norm that has governed the asking price of thieves for centuries says simply, 'When you take something to a fence you should try to get a third of the value of the goods.'" C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 114. The thief asks for a third of the retail price because he knows that he cannot get a half, which is the standard wholesale value. Typically, even though bargaining may begin at the one-third price level, few fences ever pay this much. Id. at 114 n.6. Most, in fact, pay much less. See Hearings on Organized Crime, Stolen Securities Before the Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations of the Senate Comm. on Government Operations, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 1, at 39, 212 (1971) [hereinafter Hearings on Stolen Securities]; C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 114 (analyzing fencing from a marketing perspective). Frequently, payment may simply take the form of drugs. See, e.g., Chasan, supra note 1, at 14; U.S. DEPT. OF JUSTICE, STRATEGIES FOR COMBATTING THE CRIMINAL RECEIVER (FENCE) OF STOLEN GOODS 16-18 (August 1976) [hereinafter STRATEGIES] (barter transaction typical of West Coast). Thieves are frequently ignorant of the value of their goods, and have little bargaining power against the fence. See C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 115-26. To avoid paying the one-third price, the more sophisticated fences have developed a variety of methods to deceive their suppliers. Id. at 115-27. To combat these practices some of the smarter thieves appear to be taking courses (such as gemmology) so that fences will no longer be able to "exploit [their] ignorance." Chasan, supra note 1, at 16.

When a fence negotiates a price he must be aware of his economic costs which include the risk of detection, storage and transportation expenses, cash outlay, repairs, and other middlemen services. 20. See R. BARNES, ARE YOU SAFE FROM BURGLARS? 142 (1971). At least one critic, however, has rejected this explanation as too simplistic:

A history of attentions to criminal receiving and the trade in stolen property could be written about the saying "if there were no receivers there would be no thieves." . . . [T]he observation itself is better understood as an hyperbolic plea for attention to the criminal receiver than as an accurate statement of his relationship to theft. . . . In brief, if there were no receivers, there would still be all sorts of thieves, and possibly more thieves of sorts we don't like than we have now.

ing the theft problem is to realize that law enforcement efforts should be primarily directed at the fence.

A major obstacle to dealing effectively with theft is that, despite the institutionalization of criminal redistribution systems, receiving is a so-called invisible crime largely free from public scrutiny.<sup>22</sup> It is difficult to identify stolen property under any circumstances; the task is made virtually impossible after a fence sells those goods to unsuspecting customers, for evidence of the crime is then effectively destroyed.<sup>23</sup> In short, once stolen property is successfully fenced no "smoking gun" remains. This invisibility has several undesirable consequences. Police investigations of fencing activity usually are unsuccessful because the crime is not readily detected by conventional police surveillance techniques.<sup>24</sup> Moreover, the crime of receiving generally has not been subject to comprehensive academic analysis<sup>25</sup> because police enforcement problems are reflected in the absence of accurate statistics exposing methods of redistribution and

22. Since the 1700s "[t]he fence has . . . been recognized as a very important part of the theft problem and as a crucial figure in the support and maintenance of the thief." Chappell & Walsh, Receiving Stolen Property 485. See Observations on the Buyers or Receivers of Stolen Goods—A Letter to a Member of Parliament, 3 LAW PAMPHLETS No. 5 (1751).

23. "This is in sharp contrast to . . . 'conventional crimes' such as murder, assaultive offenses, and theft. These activities, even when successful for the perpetrator . . . still leave substantial proof of their occurrence." Chappell & Walsh, Receiving Stolen Property 494. Consequently, the only data that directly document fencing activity are those that become available when a particular fencing operation has been discovered by the police.

Chappell and Walsh suggest that one reason for this situation is that the fence has never been viewed as an appropriate subject for criminological research:

Criminology's search for crime causality, bolstered by inputs from the disciplines of psychology and sociology, has greatly influenced the choice of research topics for students of the field. . . . The quest to develop a psychological and sociological competence in the study of crime causation meant . . . the rejection of the simplicity which economics had introduced. It came also to mean, however, the virtual rejection of the discipline of economics with its rational explanations, as irrelevant and inappropriate. . . . Lacking any obvious psychological difficulties and remaining a well-integrated participant in the socio-economic structure, the fence could hold little interest for criminologists who were searching for more deviant personalities to study. The same is true of the white-collar criminal, those individuals associated with organized crime, and many professional thieves. It seems clear that until economics is again accepted as a legitimate input into the criminological research process, the rational criminal—in particular the criminal receiver—will remain little studied and even less understood.

measuring the amount of property actually redistributed.<sup>26</sup> Understandably, researchers have directed their attention to more visible crimes such as theft itself or violent crimes against persons for which statistics are available.<sup>27</sup> Further, surprisingly carefree public attitudes that insurance will cover theft losses<sup>28</sup> and that the purchase of stolen goods is acceptable social conduct<sup>29</sup> reinforce the neglect afforded fencing operations. Partly as a result of inadequate research, society's theft-oriented approach has long remained free from rigorous scrutiny, and the development of effective and creative legal techniques for controlling the problem has been delayed.

The absence of accurate statistics directly measuring fencing activity, however, has not foreclosed other, sometimes intuitive, means of estimating its significance; this in turn allows appreciation of theft's economic basis and makes it possible to devise reasoned solutions. Crimes against property have increased 230.5 per cent since 1960,<sup>30</sup> and by conservative estimates property crimes cost American businesses, and ultimately American consumers,<sup>31</sup> 20.3 billion dollars annually.<sup>32</sup> Of this amount ordinary crimes, including burglary, robbery, vandalism, shoplifting, employee theft and passing bad checks, account for approximately 16.1 billion dollars.<sup>33</sup> Presented with similar statistics, a recent Senate investigation concluded that since "[t]he magnitude of theft is so great . . . the only reasonable outlet must be to legitimate consumers."<sup>34</sup> Obviously, stolen goods must be channeled through criminal redistribution systems.<sup>35</sup>

26. There is a "relative paucity of data" to support fencing research. Chappell & Walsh, Receiving Stolen Property 492. "Most of the information that does exist is of an anecdotal, historical, or 'police intelligence' nature." Id. at 493. Further, police "[i]ntelligence information is rarely made available for public scrutiny . . . ." Id. For a comprehensive discussion of the difficulties involved in researching fencing activity, see C. 31. There is little question that the consuming public must ultimately shoulder the burden of paying for the increased costs that are engendered by theft and fencing activity. See U.S. DEPT. OF JUSTICE (LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE ADMIN.) & DEPT. OF TRANSPORTATION, CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME: A DESKBOOK FOR MANAGEMENT AND LAW ENFORCEMENT 8 (1972) [hereinafter CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME]. It is not clear, however, that the consumer, who so quickly pays for theft, would just as quickly reap the benefit of an anti-theft and fencing effort. The immediate effect would be on insurance claims. This could affect rates and consequently profits, prices, or both. How far down the line the benefits would actually flow is not evident. But it seems obvious that, while the effect of an increasing theft rate on the consumer tends to be immediate and adverse, the effect of a decreasing theft rate would, in all likelihood, be gradual and only potentially positive.

One original study of property theft and recovery rates appears in appendix A to this article. Research shows that, for every one hundred persons, the value of property annually stolen, measured in constant "1960" dollars to account for inflation, jumped from 502 dollars in 1960 to 1061 dollars in 1975, an increase of 111 per cent.<sup>36</sup>

35. Los Angeles authorities have reported, for example, that 95 per cent of stolen property is ultimately redistributed. Hearings on Fencing 3. Chappell and Walsh state:

Reflected in each auto theft, in each burglary, and in many robberies and muggings is evidence of fencing. No goods, whether created through the productive process or acquired by theft, have value to the possessor unless they are distributed and sold—and that is the fence's job. Fencing, then, represents a major proportion of the nation's yearly crime figures . . . .

Chappell & Walsh, Receiving Stolen Property 495. Chappell and Walsh, however, may overstate the case, at least in the auto theft area. Most auto thefts are apparently made not for resale but for short term transportation. Young people (under 18) represent a major portion of those arrested for the offense (55 per cent in 1975). Similarly, a high proportion (62 per cent in 1975) of stolen autos are recovered. Id. at 178. UNIFORM CRIME REPORTS FOR THE UNITED STATES 37 (1975) [hereinafter U.C.R. 1975].

36. See Table 2, Appendix A.

Moreover, during the same period the percentage of stolen property recovered declined from 52.4 per cent to 29.9 per cent.<sup>37</sup> Rising theft rates and declining recovery rates, especially of goods recently manufactured for sale to consumers, are consistent with the theory that theft is the by-product of sophisticated fencing schemes that quickly redistribute stolen goods and frustrate police procedures currently employed to control them.

These conclusions are supported by other observations reported in appendix A. First, the increase in personal property thefts is primarily accounted for by a rapid increase in thefts of "miscellaneous" property,<sup>38</sup> as classified by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in its Uniform Crime Reports. "Miscellaneous" property includes office equipment, televisions, radios, stereophonic equipment, firearms, household goods, consumable goods and livestock,<sup>39</sup> goods which are constantly in high demand by consumers. These goods also are usually quite easy to conceal and transport, and can often be "legitimized" simply by removing identifying labels since they are rarely not marked with serial numbers; they are thus easy to fence.<sup>40</sup> Second, the increase in the value of property recovered kept pace with the increase in the value of property stolen until 1966 when the recovery rate dropped dramatically. This drop coincides with the acceleration of thefts of miscellaneous property.<sup>41</sup> Finally, the statistics indicate that although the overall recovery rate declined, the ability of law enforcement authorities to recover most types of stolen property did in fact improve.<sup>42</sup> Nevertheless, improved police procedures for recovering such items as automobiles, furs, and jewelry have been more than offset in the overall recovery rate by the inadequacy of existing investigative techniques to recover miscellaneous property.

This study supports other commentary that postulates a high correlation between merchandise frequently stolen and that readily demanded by consumers.<sup>43</sup> It also reinforces more intuitive observations that thieves do not hijack truck loads of razor blades, tires or tuna fish for personal consumption.<sup>44</sup> Redistribution for profit is always the ultimate objective of these thefts, and the consumer market is generally quite willing to absorb stolen goods.<sup>45</sup> Although consumers are often unaware they are purchasing stolen property,<sup>46</sup> many bargain hunters have displayed a marked proclivity to buy such merchandise when it is available.<sup>47</sup> In this regard, reference already has been made to the importance of apparently legitimate businessmen who seek a competitive edge by selling stolen merchandise<sup>48</sup> and whose cash resources facilitate redistribution. Clearly, therefore, the survival of criminal redistribution systems depends upon the continued propensity of consumers and businesses to buy illegal goods.<sup>49</sup>

The ultimate consequences of theft and fencing for both the national economy and American society is not completely reflected in the estimated 20.3 billion dollar cost of property crimes.<sup>50</sup> On one level, rising theft rates for many legitimate businesses mean higher in-

Some establishments may be reluctant "to buy from irregular, noninstitutionalized sources of supply," but will ultimately wind up obtaining stolen property because of their failure to check the purchasing practices of their buyers, or because a fence has successfully established a quasi-legitimate front. See Roselius & Benton, Stolen Goods 183; Emerson, They Can Get It for You Cheaper Than Wholesale, NEW YORK MAGAZINE, Nov. 22, 1971, at 37.

The greed of legitimate businessmen is a prime support of fencing activity. See generally Hearings on Fencing 4. Thieves often feel "completely safe in making an offer to an apparently legitimate store." Id. Pure greed may not be the only factor. "Given current economic conditions, many small businessmen are only too glad to get merchandise at low swag [stolen property] market prices." Emerson, supra, at 37. "[I]n poor areas of the inner city, where small businesses have an enormous rate of failure, fencing may make the difference between survival and failure." Chasan, supra note 1, at 17. Finally, in other situations, organized crime may be coercing businessmen to trade in stolen goods. See note 119 infra and accompanying text.

49. By analogy, it has been said that "the American confederation of organized crime thrives because a large minority of citizens demand illicit goods . . . that it has for sale." insurance rates<sup>51</sup> and administrative costs,<sup>52</sup> strained customer relations,<sup>53</sup> and lost profits.<sup>54</sup> In many cases, the free flow of commerce may be impeded.<sup>55</sup> On another level, although the sophistication of fencing schemes varies considerably, the typical fence operates as a businessman, often selling goods at discount and undercutting legitimate competitors. Ultimately, therefore, widespread and sophisticated theft and fencing threatens the free enterprise system<sup>56</sup> as tax revenues decline<sup>57</sup> and legitimate businesses are forced to lay off employees,<sup>58</sup> to relocate, to use other methods of shipping goods, or, perhaps, to declare bankruptcy.<sup>59</sup>

There is a clear and pressing need, therefore, to recognize the undesirable consequences of fencing operations and to deal with them forcefully. An important factor in our society's neglect of the fence's role in the theft problem, however, has been his singular success in avoiding prosecution and conviction.<sup>60</sup> To a limited extent,

A recent report issued by the Waterfront Commission of New York Harbor reveals that airline theft may be valued at a figure as high as $16 million per year at Kennedy, La Guardia and Newark airports (more than in the rest of the country combined); it also casts doubt on previous evidence given to Congress that the theft problem was being brought under control. WATERFRONT COMM. OF N.Y. HARBOR, REPORT ON THE TRUE EXTENT OF CARGO THEFT AT THE NEW YORK-NEW JERSEY AIRPORTS 2-3 (1975). The Commission concluded:

The thefts at our airports are really only symptomatic of the more basic problem of criminal control of the air freight industry. Large-scale theft of gold, silver, platinum, rare metals, furs, jewelry, diamonds, etc. are not thefts of individual impulse, but rather require sophisticated planning in advance by organized groups as well as previously arranged distribution channels to get such commodities into manufacturing and consumer markets.

this success is a product of current law enforcement practices that tolerate fencing as a quid pro quo for information concerning theft<sup>61</sup> and other crimes that police consider more important. While these law enforcement priorities reveal a failure to recognize receiving as a cause of other crime, they also reflect deficiencies both in techniques used to detect fencing and in the substantive law that frustrates the prosecution of alleged fences.<sup>62</sup> Thus, partial responsibility for the rising theft rate and the tremendous amount of property successfully redistributed annually may be attributed to a failure of the legal system to recognize the character and consequences of modern theft and fencing operations.<sup>63</sup> Section I of this article describes various theft and fencing operations. As will be evident from that discussion, the most sophisticated fences are far removed from those receivers who are owners of seedy pawnshops or who indiscriminately select potential customers on the street, and thus they pose peculiar problems for law enforcement. Section II then identifies inadequacies in existing investigative techniques and in the substantive laws of receiving in light of modern theft and fencing operations. It proposes changes in the law and suggests appropriate law enforcement strategies to facilitate the detection and conviction of alleged fences. Needed changes in the civil law are also discussed. Throughout these sections of the article, reference will be made to the provisions of a Model Theft and Fencing Act set forth in appendix B.

ber of years. See, e.g., U.C.R. 1975, at 174. Historically, gaps in the substantive law have made it difficult to convict fences. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 173. There have also been other barriers to successful prosecution:

It has always been difficult to convict professional receivers. . . . [T]hey have been shrewd enough to devise methods of operation which [escape] public notice. They dress their illegal traffic in all the paraphernalia of lawful enterprise; they conduct their businesses secretly; they are equipped both mentally and financially to take full advantage of the weaknesses in the administrative machine, should prosecution be initiated.

J. HALL, supra note 5, at 195. At least some law enforcement officials today feel that the substantive law related to fencing activity is satisfactory, believing that the "difficulties arise in the practical application of the law especially in the evidentiary and procedural area." Hearings on Fencing 46. Chappell and Walsh have stated that "fencing should be considered and attacked as a problem of legal revision, of updating the law to the contemporary situation." Chappell & Walsh, Receiving Stolen Property 489.

61. See Chappell & Walsh, "No Questions Asked" 166-67; C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 27-28, 194-95. See generally J. HALL, supra note 5, at 201-02.

62. See notes 175-467 infra and accompanying text.

63. Chappell and Walsh attribute partial responsibility for the legal system's inadequacies to society's inaccurate perception of the fence: "[T]o deal effectively with the fence, we must first alter our perceptions of him. . . . The law, after all, can only proscribe and protect against that which we can describe and demonstrate for it." Chappell & Walsh, "No Questions Asked" 168 (emphasis original).

I. THE REALITIES OF MODERN FENCING SYSTEMS

Although patterns of redistribution differ in sophistication, all fences are essentially businessmen engaged in "[t]he performance of business activities that direct the flow of goods . . . from producer [thief] to consumer or user."<sup>64</sup> As middlemen, fences must locate supplies of stolen goods, contact purchasers, provide transportation and storage facilities,<sup>65</sup> and finance the entire process.<sup>66</sup> During redistribution, therefore, fences confront two major risks: the risk of detection while performing the middleman functions and the risk of financial loss if the particular stolen goods cannot be marketed profitably.<sup>67</sup> As this section of the article will show, the extent of both these risks varies inversely with the sophistication of the fencing operation. Risks are minimized for the most successful fences who have leadership ability, business acumen, established contacts with thieves, broad operation bases, tight organizational control, and legitimate facades.<sup>68</sup> It is, of course, these sophisticated receiving operations that pose the greatest challenge to our society. A brief study of the most common fencing techniques is, therefore, necessary to understand the changes that are desirable both in the substantive law of receiving and in its enforcement.

A. Marketing Theory and the Fence

Successful fences frequently minimize their risks by adopting the

64. COMMITTEE ON DEFINITIONS, AM. MARKETING ASSN., MARKETING DEFINITIONS 15 (1960). This is the conventional definition of the term marketing. See Roselius & Benton, Marketing Theory 177-78. Some commentators argue, however, that a broader definition is often used to give more specific direction to the persons charged with performing the marketing functions. Thus, "[m]arketing is a total system of interacting business activities designed to plan, price, promote, and distribute want-satisfying products and services to present and potential users." This definition assumes that much of the behavior related to the distribution of stolen goods consists of rational, economically guided decisions. It also indicates that such distribution requires conscious effort and decision making by the thief and fence.

Id. at 179 (citations omitted). Other authorities have recognized the business nature of a fencing operation: "The business of dealing in stolen goods requires a trained personnel. It requires most of the qualifications necessary to carry on any business and a number of additional ones." J. HALL, supra note 5, at 156-57.

65. See Roselius & Benton, Marketing Theory 187.

66. Financing the transfer process actually involved paying the producers for their labor and taking care of both transportation and storage arrangements. Roselius and Benton maintain that of these three functions, providing the thieves with their payment is the most important marketing service performed by the fence. See Roselius & Benton, Marketing Theory 186; STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 6-7.

67. See Roselius & Benton, Marketing Theory 187; STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 7.

same marketing techniques used by legitimate businessmen.<sup>69</sup> For example, fences frequently use elementary supply and demand principles to determine which goods can be moved safely and quickly through the redistribution chain.<sup>70</sup> This information is then passed to thieves who usually use it in determining the types of merchandise to steal.<sup>71</sup> Although virtually any item can be fenced,<sup>72</sup> many fences prefer high value, low volume goods that produce handsome profits and can easily be hidden and transported.<sup>73</sup> Most fences, however, deal in high volume goods of lower value that are not easily identified by police<sup>74</sup> because of the large quantities of physically indistinguishable products manufactured today. Thus, the list of commonly fenced "safer" goods includes clothing, stereos, radios, home appliances, cigarettes, liquor, pharmaceutical drugs, building supplies, office equipment, and securities.<sup>75</sup> Shoplifters,<sup>76</sup> employees,<sup>77</sup> and bur-

77. In the cargo industry, employees are participants in 80 per cent of theft acglars,<sup>78</sup> who together account for most commercial theft,<sup>79</sup> often steal these high-demand products and sell them to fences for redistribution.<sup>80</sup> Even though fences usually deal in high-demand products, the use of standard marketing principles is, nevertheless, often imperfect because the demand for and supply of stolen property are extremely heterogeneous;<sup>81</sup> the only fences consistently successful in matching supply and demand are those with reliable and well-connected informants<sup>82</sup> who can direct the fences to thieves able to supply particular goods and customers willing to purchase them.

Once supply and demand have been estimated, a fence must price his stolen merchandise. As in legitimate marketing operations, pricing involves a consideration of current market prices, available

A detailed summary of employee theft techniques is provided in CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 37-38.

A similar situation prevails in the retail industry. Employee theft is estimated to account for 13 per cent of the losses resulting from property crimes, but the Commerce Department and other sources feel that this percentage is greatly understated because businesses are reluctant "to admit the magnitude of their employee theft problem . . . ." *COMMERCE DEPT. 82. Roselius & Benton state:

The dominant form of market information about stolen goods is word-of-mouth communications between consumers, fences, information brokers such as bartenders, and thieves. [Our] study [in Colorado] found no evidence of sophisticated data gathering and analysis similar to the very effective techniques used by legitimate businessmen. However, it is likely that syndicated crime [in other areas] does use such techniques on large volume transactions.

Id. at 188. In addition, tips supplied by company employees are an important source of marketing research information. See notes 140, 144-45 infra and accompanying text. To the extent that a fence is able to buy goods on order for customers who have already indicated a willingness to purchase designated stolen merchandise, his marketing research difficulties with respect to the demand function are eliminated. Buying on order is a frequent occurrence. See notes 111, 121 infra and accompanying text.

capital resources, promotional costs, personnel disbursements, and storage and transportation expenses.<sup>83</sup> The price of stolen property, however, also includes the costs of precautionary measures taken to avoid detection, such as removing identifying labels from the goods, surreptitiously handling the merchandise and, frequently, paying bribes.<sup>84</sup> Ultimately, the price of stolen merchandise reflects both the length of the redistribution chain and the costs of legitimizing the product.<sup>85</sup> If fences must charge prices approximating legitimate wholesale or retail prices, stolen goods will lose their competitive appeal and demand will diminish.

One approach taken by certain cost-conscious fences is to trade only in particular goods. By specializing in art, jewelry, or automobiles, for example, a fence can eliminate many costly and risky transactions. Specialization, however, does not guarantee success,<sup>86</sup> and

85. Roselius & Benton, Marketing Theory 191. When the purchaser is aware that the goods have been stolen, the goods may be sold at a lower price. Id. Indeed, the aware consumer actually expects to purchase stolen goods at bargain rates. In contrast, when the consumer is unaware that the goods are stolen, an effort must be made within the channel of distribution to legitimize the transaction by disguising the fact that the property is stolen. Differences in channels will entail differences in the number and type of middlemen involved.

The thief may sell directly to the consumer but must take steps to give the transaction an aura of legality. If he cannot legitimize the transaction or perform some middleman marketing function, he must utilize one or more intermediaries in the channel of distribution, generally a fence. Legitimation is best accomplished if the fence operates a cover or front institution of some kind.

86. C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12 at 188:

[T]he would-be successful dealer in stolen property may find that forces beyond his control prohibit him from buying both profitably and regularly. This is particularly true if he has decided to become a specialist dealer. The would-be successful dealer in fine art for example, may buy and sell profitably, but may find that not enough fine art is stolen to permit him to deal regularly. Similarly, the would-be jewelry specialist may find that generalist fences . . . and "occasional receiver" legitimate jewelers take up the small regular trade, leaving him only with opportunities to buy large quantities of very expensive jewelry which nonspecialists are not prepared to handle. The would-be specialist in men's suits, on the other hand, may find that he can buy small quantities of suits regularly but not profitably, because thieves manage to sell them to "lay receivers" at prices which are close to or equal to what he would pay for them legitimately. Specialist dealers are generally under economic pressure to deal in large quantities of their particular item. They are also likely to plan each highly profitable individual transaction days, weeks, or even months in advance.

In contrast,

[t]he generalist dealer may find himself subject to quite different pressures from the economics of theft. These pressures may permit him to deal regularly but may tax his ability to do so profitably. The advantage which the generalist dealer offers to generalist thieves is a ready market for those things which are commonly stolen. Like the department store or shopping center, his attraction is convenience. He is willing and able to buy most things that are stolen, often without special preparations. Two forces are likely to play upon him economically. On the one hand, there is a tendency for him to become more "conveni-the extent to which a fence can successfully specialize and reduce his risks depends on the sophistication of his operation.

Thus, the use of established marketing principles to analyze fencing behavior, although somewhat imperfect, permits two rather intuitive observations. First, measures that increase a fence's difficulty in matching supply and demand prolong redistribution and increase his risks of detection. Second, as these risks increase so too do the costs of minimizing them, and thus stolen goods begin to lose their competitive advantage as their prices rise. Once the risks of financial loss and detection become sufficiently great, fencing activity may be curtailed. Suppose, for example, that most manufacturers of high-demand goods were to label their products with conspicuous serial numbers and were accurately to record those numbers.<sup>87</sup> Such measures might prolong redistribution and increase a receiver's risks of detection and financial loss. They would have these effects by deterring, to some extent, purchasers who knowingly buy stolen property, since the goods of these manufacturers would be readily identifiable; facilitating detection of fencing activity unless added precautionary measures were taken; and increasing the cost of legitimizing stolen merchandise. Additionally, such measures might prolong redistribution for similar goods not so labelled by preventing fences from arranging their resale far in advance because they were uncertain as to whether they could obtain unlabelled goods, and, similarly, by making fences reluctant to refuse to purchase such scarce goods even though they did not yet have buyers.

It is important always to keep in mind, however, that the extent to which such measures would increase fencing risks would also depend on other factors, such as the sophistication of the fence's operation. Although simple serial numbering of products may help in the detection and conviction of relatively unsophisticated "neighborhood" and "outlet" fences, more comprehensive measures may be needed to help detect large, well-financed fences who can easily shoulder the costs of legitimizing stolen goods and the added risk ent," that is, to handle a wider and wider variety of items. Because specialist items are likely to be working with specialist dealers, the unusual items that the generalist dealer is pressed to handle may be small amounts of items taken by chance by generalist thieves. Unless the generalist dealer has an unlimited number of buyers or develops other means of disposing of exotic merchandise, he must find ways of limiting what he buys so as to match his capacities to sell. The specialist dealer must also limit what he buys to what he is prepared to handle readily, but the intermittent character of his trade may make it possible for him to prepare to sell what he knows he is going to buy.

of detection.<sup>88</sup> Attention, therefore, must focus briefly on the major types of fencing systems.

B. Patterns of Redistribution

The extremely successful eighteenth century fencing operations of Jonathan Wild<sup>89</sup> provide a preliminary framework for the analysis of modern criminal redistribution systems. Sometimes called the "Father of Professional Fencing,"<sup>90</sup> Wild's "astonishing organizational sophistication"<sup>91</sup> enabled him to develop a large-scale system of redistribution that "[controlled] the London underworld for more than a decade . . . ."<sup>92</sup>

Although his redistribution system was constrained by economic and demographic factors that made the resale of most stolen property impractical,<sup>93</sup> Wild still managed to make a fortune by opening an office for the "recovery of lost property,"<sup>94</sup> a subterfuge through which he established contacts with thieves and, in effect, fenced stolen goods by selling them back to their original owners and collecting rewards. The success of this system depended upon Wild's ability simultaneously to gain the confidence of thieves with whom he dealt and yet to maintain a clean public image,<sup>95</sup> an understandably delicate balancing process that he accomplished by applying elementary marketing principles and by taking advantage of the then current English law. Wild built good relations with thieves by paying the best prices in London for stolen goods,<sup>96</sup> and he created and Wild ran his operation in a business-like manner. Indeed, he referred to it as a "corporation." Chappell & Walsh, "No Questions Asked" 165. Thieves were often skillfully trained, responsibilities were delegated, and even advertising was employed. See id. at 157, 159, 165-67; C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 13-19.

maintained his untarnished public reputation by "thief-taking"—that is, aiding in the capture of thieves or providing evidence to convict them.<sup>97</sup> Incidentally, the self-proclaimed "Thief-Taker General of Great Britain and Ireland"<sup>98</sup> also accomplished a more subtle goal by helping to convict thieves: Through such activity, he actually tightened his control over the approximately 7,000 thieves in London by giving them means to punish those thieves who would not deal with him.<sup>99</sup>

This brief description of Wild's operation is instructive for at least two reasons. First, it demonstrates that Wild's success depended upon his tight organizational control and, perhaps more importantly, upon his ability to project two apparently contrasting images—an ability that minimized his risks of detection. Thus, "[b]efore a thief, he was a fellow thief; before a gentleman, a gentleman."<sup>100</sup> Second, it demonstrates in a rather simple fashion the extent to which inadequacies in the law may promote fencing. In fact, Wild's operation continued to expand until he succumbed to a law (the so-called "Jonathan Wild's Act") specifically designed to defeat him.<sup>101</sup> As will be evident in the following discussion, the most sophisticated and the most dangerous modern fences also successfully project contrasting images and exploit inadequacies in the substantive law.<sup>102</sup>

1. The "Neighborhood Connection"

[S]ome fences may deal directly with a thief and openly sell to a buyer. This type of fence is usually found in every neighborhood, and he deals primarily with small amounts of property. He is the "neighborhood connection."<sup>103</sup>

97. Id. at 9-10. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 73; Chappell & Walsh, "No Questions Asked" 159.

99. Id. at 17. It was alleged that "notwithstanding his [Wild's] pretended services in detecting and prosecuting offenders, he procured such only to be hanged as concealed their booty, or refused to share it with him." J. HALL, supra note 5, at 71-72. See Chappell & Walsh, "No Questions Asked" 159. Although Wild generally limited his thief-taking activities to those who did not recognize his authority, his public reputation grew because the assistance he offered did, in fact, lead to the capture and destruction of many of London's most powerful criminal gangs. See C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 17-19.

100. C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 12.

101. Id. at 25-26. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 73-76.

102. The typology of fences found in the text is only one of many possible. For a typology based on sources of property dealt with, see STRATEGIES 14-23. It is important to emphasize, too, that one individual may play many different roles in many different transactions; the types in the text, therefore, should not be viewed as mutually exclusive.

103. Hearings on Fencing 44. Perhaps saying that the "neighborhood connection" exists in "every neighborhood" goes too far. But if the fence himself is not

By definition, the neighborhood fence is a small-time operator. He may, on occasion, actually steal merchandise for resale, but more often he is supplied by local thieves, such as small-time shoplifters or dishonest cargo company employees.<sup>104</sup> Although neighborhood fences tend to specialize, they often buy whatever stolen property is available if the price is reasonable and the item is in demand.<sup>105</sup> Once the thief is paid, the goods are frequently stored in unimaginative and insecure hiding places, for instance, in the trunk of a car or the receiver's basement.<sup>106</sup>

Although the neighborhood fence has no permanent place of business, stolen goods are almost never hustled on the streets because of the risks involved.<sup>107</sup> Instead, the goods are sold in living rooms, local bars, or garages, or to local retail stores and pawnshops.<sup>108</sup> The neighborhood fence rapidly acquires a reputation as a dealer in stolen property because little effort is made to legitimize the goods and because his operation is essentially local. As he develops a regular clientele of thieves,<sup>109</sup> a neighborhood fence may occasionally expand his operation by organizing thefts for customers,<sup>110</sup> by working closely with other fences,<sup>111</sup> and by serving as one of many distributors for property stolen by organized crime syndicates.<sup>112</sup>

There are several reasons why neighborhood fences represent considerably less of a threat to our society than do large-scale fences.

in the neighborhood, there is usually someone in every neighborhood who knows where such a fence can be found. For a good account of a neighborhood fencing operation, see Emerson, supra note 48, at 311-17.

104. See Emerson, supra note 48, at 34-38. See generally Hearings on Fencing 44. For a good example of the working relationship between a neighborhood fence and his boosters, see Emerson, supra note 48, at 313.

106. Hiding places for the temporary storage of stolen goods are known in the street language of the "trade" as "drops." See note 146 infra and accompanying text.

107. In reality, street hustlers often peddle legitimate merchandise which has been characterized as "'store-bought' swag." Emerson, supra note 48, at 37.

108. See id. at 35-38.

109. See id. at 35-38. For a neighborhood fence, the development of a local reputation may be equated with Jonathan Wild's concern with "image-building." See notes 95-100 supra and accompanying text. See also note 129 infra and accompanying text.

110. See Emerson, supra note 48, at 36-37.

111. The neighborhood fence may work with a professional fence who specializes in wholesaling. "[A] wholesale . . . dealer . . . sells only in large quantities to other hustlers but does no hustling himself." Id. at 38. A wholesaler may be a middleman "in the chain of distribution for mob-controlled thefts . . ." Id. For an analysis of the professional fence, see notes 126-28 infra and accompanying text.

112. See Emerson, supra note 48, at 34. On the concept of "organized crime," see note 154 infra.

First, they are more easily detected by conventional police investigative techniques because they often retain actual possession of the goods until redistribution is complete,<sup>113</sup> make little effort to disguise the illegal nature of their goods, and are frequently well-known to both thieves and police. Second, neighborhood fences rarely expand because they usually have limited financial resources and marketing opportunities that prevent their establishing a broad operational base or developing long-term relationships with a significant number of thieves. Finally, although a small-scale fencing operation may generate substantial personal income, neighborhood fences probably only distribute a small percentage of the stolen property redistributed annually.<sup>114</sup>

2. The Outlet Fence

Many businesses that primarily market legitimate merchandise also serve, knowingly or unknowingly, as convenient outlets for large quantities of low-cost stolen goods,<sup>115</sup> and gain obvious competitive advantages from such marketing.<sup>116</sup> These so-called outlet fences, especially the large, prestigious establishments, usually do not deal directly with thieves.<sup>117</sup> Instead, transfers of illicit merchandise to these merchants are engineered by so-called professional or master fences whose functions are similar to those of legitimate wholesalers. Before delivery to outlet fences, these wholesalers of stolen goods repackage the merchandise and remove all identifying features.<sup>118</sup>

113. Possession is strong circumstantial evidence of guilt in a prosecution for the crime of receiving stolen property. Further, in most states, possession raises a presumption that the fence had knowledge that the goods were stolen. See notes 335-42 infra and accompanying text. For this reason, other more sophisticated fences generally attempt to avoid actual possession. See notes 143-47 infra and accompanying text.

114. On the other hand, an anti-fencing strategy that was concerned with local burglaries or thefts committed primarily by addicts and juveniles might well decide to focus on the "neighbor fence." See STRATEGIES 14-16.

115. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 22; notes 45-48 supra and accompanying text. "It seems paramount that these businesses must be named for what they really are, a part of this country's criminal system and not what they think they are, 'good' businessmen interested in making a 'good' profit." Hearings on Fencing 37.

116. For example, a retailer may purchase goods at relatively low prices and then sell them at the standard retail level (or just a bit below). The result is a higher mark-up and obviously a greater profit margin. See, e.g., V. TERESA, supra note 29, at 141. In some cases, a retail outlet may be unaware that it is buying stolen goods, and in those circumstances the bulk of the excess profit is reaped by third parties, often the fence and a store's buyer.

117. See Roselius & Benton, Stolen Goods 183.

118. Note that this is in sharp contrast with the procedures utilized by a neighborhood fence who generally makes no effort to disguise the swag identity of his goods. See text at note 109 supra.

The stolen merchandise then not only is ready for its reentry into traditional streams of commerce, but also is difficult for police and honest businessmen to identify.

In contrast to neighborhood fences, therefore, sophisticated outlet fences pose more serious challenges to law enforcement efforts. First, the merchandise these apparently legitimate businesses receive is usually the product of sophisticated theft and redistribution operations,<sup>119</sup> and the prospect of high retail profits often provides sufficient incentive for retailers to develop a long-term relationship with supplying fences.<sup>120</sup> Thus, outlet fences have a greater adverse impact on society than do neighborhood fences simply because they market large quantities of stolen merchandise that otherwise could not be readily redistributed. Indeed, once such retailers begin to expand their dealings in stolen property they may become professional fences.<sup>121</sup>

Second, although any establishment handling stolen property is technically a fence, criminal liability in most jurisdictions attaches only if authorities can prove the establishment knowingly dealt in stolen property, a mens rea difficult to prove if, as is often the case, either the business had no direct contact with thieves or the merchandise when delivered already had been legitimized.<sup>122</sup> One way to prove an outlet fence actually had the requisite mens rea is to examine the circumstances surrounding its transaction with the wholesaling fence. For example, as discussed in section II, there is strong evidence of the requisite knowledge if authorities can prove that the wholesaling fence offered the goods at a price substantially lower than the legitimate wholesale market price, had no evidence of ownership beyond mere possession, or demanded cash when the usual practice is to accept a check and issue a receipt.<sup>123</sup>

Finally, even if a knowledge standard is not unduly burdensome for the prosecution in cases involving small retailers whose propri-

120. For this reason, and because of the sophisticated thefts involved, fencing operations involving legitimate businesses probably stimulate considerable "buy-on-order" theft activity. See Hearings on Fencing 42; REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 3.

121. "Most professional receivers seem, indeed, to be offshoots from legitimate businesses." J. HALL, supra note 5, at 156. See Hearings on Fencing 161. The characteristics of a professional fence are discussed in greater detail in notes 141-54 infra and accompanying text.

122. See notes 274-409 infra and accompanying text.

123. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 224-25 n.72. Many sophisticated purchasers of stolen goods, however, take precautionary measures to disguise the illegality of their transactions. For example, phoney checks or fake receipts may be used for these purposes. See notes 132-38 infra and accompanying text.

etors control all aspects of the purchase and resale, it has serious deficiencies when applied to large-scale retailers. For example, upper-level management of a department store chain often has no actual knowledge of illegal transactions because most purchasing decisions are made at lower levels. By not participating in purchasing decisions, upper-level management may knowingly promote the purchase of stolen goods by the chain's buyers seeking a cost advantage over their competitors and yet avoid criminal liability by intentionally remaining ignorant of relevant transactions.<sup>124</sup> As in the case of smaller retailers, proof of purchases at unusually low prices is strong evidence that store buyers knowingly acted illegally, although frequently the illegal offer itself is even more overt.<sup>125</sup>

3. The Professional Fence

So-called professional fences frequently front as legitimate retail businesses<sup>126</sup> and may be either specialist or generalist fences, depending, in large part, on the nature of their retail establishments.<sup>127</sup> Although professional fences thus appear to be similar to outlet fences, they are different in two important respects.

First, unlike outlet fences who may only occasionally handle stolen property,<sup>128</sup> professional fences are primarily criminal distributors specializing in stolen merchandise, though they may also do a substantial amount of legitimate business. Interestingly, since professional fences require a steady flow of substantial amounts of stolen

125. For example, direct bribes may serve as monetary incentives inducing a buyer to purchase stolen goods. In addition, the buyer may also be rewarded by management for purchasing his merchandise at a good price. See Hearings on Criminal Laws 310.

This discussion of the mens rea problem, more fully pursued in the text at notes 259-73 infra, should note that since a significant number of businesses dealing in stolen property are pressured by organized crime to participate in redistribution schemes, their participation is considerably less culpable than that of willing participants. See STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 8.- For a good example of organized crime exerting pressure on legitimate businesses through the use of gambling and loansharking techniques, see Hearings on Fencing 148-49. See generally CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 28, 39; TASK FORCE REPORT, ORGANIZED CRIME 4-5.

126. The seemingly legitimate business may be a retail discount center, bargain-basement shop, pawnshop, junk dealership, or even a wholesaling enterprise. See Emerson, supra note 48, at 37. Naturally, the more respectable the front, the more security it affords.

127. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 156-57; notes 86-89 supra and accompanying text. The relationship between the professional thief, the professional fence, and organized crime is carefully documented in PENN. CRIME COMM. 1971-72 REPORT 107-37.

merchandise and thus often need to deal directly with thieves, they must simultaneously develop two contrasting images to a greater extent than outlet fences: they must appear sufficiently legitimate to satisfy law enforcement agencies, or at least to frustrate investigations, yet must actively promote their illegitimate operations to attract both thieves wishing to sell and consumers wishing to purchase stolen merchandise.<sup>129</sup> Thieves are naturally inclined to deal with professional fences because they do not have ready access to outlet fences, who are supplied by master fences, and because the extensive capital resources of professional fences make them more attractive purchasers than neighborhood fences. A professional fence, moreover, can frustrate police surveillance techniques and conviction even though he retains actual physical possession or control over the stolen merchandise.<sup>130</sup> In many cases, for example, the merchandise can be resold within hours of its delivery.<sup>131</sup> Otherwise, a professional fence often can easily make his illegitimate conduct indistinguishable from his legitimate activities.<sup>132</sup> Thus, identifying characteristics may be removed to the fullest extent possible<sup>133</sup> by disposing of incriminating cartons,<sup>134</sup> removing labels,<sup>135</sup> and altering or destroying serial numbers.<sup>136</sup> Further, many brand name products frequently can be successfully commingled with the fence's legitimate stock without any alteration.<sup>137</sup> In any case, false sales receipts are drafted and the fence's personal check for the purchase price is cashed so that he has a receipt and a cancelled check, thereby making his conviction extremely difficult even if the goods are identified.<sup>138</sup>

130. For an analysis of the legal problems posed by possession of stolen property, see note 113 supra. These legal risks may be reduced by storing the goods in a warehouse, but this is often not practical and this precaution does not necessarily eliminate the possibility of a tracing process. "Secret locations under fictitious names are simply not normal business procedures; if trouble developed, explaining a hidden storage area might prove to pose more problems than the advantages such an area offered." C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 93. Tracing can be avoided only if the fence takes measures to ensure that the warehouse itself cannot be directly linked to him. Even where a warehouse is available, the stolen goods must ultimately be transferred to the retail establishment; consequently, actual possession cannot be avoided indefinitely.

A second distinction is that as the operation of the professional fence grows in sophistication, he may supply vital information to thieves planning a theft<sup>139</sup> or may himself organize thefts for customers.<sup>140</sup> Arranging successful thefts requires both an extensive system of informants who provide inside information detailing the location of particular property and security measures taken to protect it, and a pool of potential thieves. A professional fence frequently may satisfy both needs by using the shoplifters, dishonest employees, and burglars with whom he regularly deals. Alternatively, the professional fence may satisfy his customers' needs by contacting a so-called master fence who wholesales stolen goods.

4. The Master Fence

The master fence directs a big-time operation and either organizes large-scale thefts or serves as a middleman for other organizers.<sup>141</sup> While other fences may perform similar services, the master fence is distinguished by his ability to insulate himself from the actual theft and subsequent redistribution process.<sup>142</sup> The master fence operates as a broker, buying and selling stolen goods valued

138. See id. at 82, 90-91; J. HALL, supra note 5, at 189-91; Hearings on Fencing 4. All of this must, of course, be evaluated in the context of the "beyond a reasonable doubt" rule in a criminal case. See, e.g., In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970). If the prosecution fails to convince any member of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt a conviction is not possible. There is some evidence that as a result of recent reform legislation the quality of juries, at least in federal cases, is not as high as it might be. Cf. 28 U.S.C. § 1861 (1970) (uniform jury selection). In addition the expertise of the government in prosecuting complicated cases has diminished. See Hearings on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 92d Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 4, at 3709-11 (1972). These two factors may combine to make convictions even less likely.

139. Professional fences frequently provide thieves with detailed information concerning the location of items for theft. See, e.g., Hearings on Fencing 162. Even so, although many professional fences undoubtedly have teams of thieves, most do not personally arrange large-scale heists. Id. at 135-37.

140. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 162.

141. See Hearings on Fencing 135-38; note 153 infra.

142. Hence, "fences may . . . purchase the property from another fence, sight unseen, and never go near the 'drop' where the merchandise is kept. Their transactions are all consummated over the telephone. This type of fence is known as the 'master fence.'" Hearings on Fencing 44. Cf. Chasan, supra note 1, at 15. For a good description of a master fencing operation, see CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 40-42. Most professional fences do not qualify as master fences since they inevitably come into contact with the stolen goods. See note 131 supra and accompanying text. Even so, a professional fence may, on occasion, do some master fencing by arranging a transaction in which he is completely insulated.

To be successful, therefore, a master fence must have an extensive system of contacts including both informants and potential large-scale purchasers. For example, as an organizer of thefts, a master fence relies upon his paid connections, such as a dock employee of a manufacturing company or a dispatcher of a trucking outfit, to provide detailed information on shipments of valuable merchandise.<sup>144</sup> The master fence then contacts potential buyers,<sup>145</sup> but does not actually arrange the theft until he has a firm agreement for resale. Once such an agreement is concluded, he plans in great detail the theft itself and arrangements for storing, legitimizing, and delivering the stolen goods.<sup>146</sup>

Although these activities are more daring than those of most outlet and professional fences, who do not regularly arrange thefts and often receive stolen property already legitimized, master fences avoid detection and conviction in two ways. First, they move stolen merchandise rapidly through their redistribution chains because they never steal unless a resale has been arranged. Second, and perhaps more significantly, master fences rarely have actual physical contact with either the stolen goods or their purchasers. They deal with thieves and purchasers indirectly, usually through agents or by telephone. These practices present obvious problems for law enforcement authorities who must gather evidence. As a result, to convict master fences, authorities must use sophisticated surveillance techniques and must offer immunity from prosecution to other members of the redistribution chain.<sup>147</sup> Intensive surveillance, however, is costly and subject to significant legal restraints; further, even immunity grants may not be sufficient to pierce the master fence's legal

144. Law enforcement officials believe that the truck hijackers all too often "know exactly what type of property is to be in that truck." Hearings on Fencing 136-37. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 158.

145. Hearings on Criminal Laws 310.

146. A good description of the detail in modern hijacking operations may be found in Hearings on Fencing 136-38, 146-54 and CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 38-39.

147. See notes 277-94, 310-25 infra and accompanying text. "Most offenses come to the attention of the police by reports from citizens." LAW ENFORCEMENT IN THE METROPOLIS 3 (D. McIntyre ed. 1967). Since citizens will not usually come into contact with a fence's activities except as purchasers, there are no complaining witnesses. A "complaint only" policy in fencing will result in few fencing prosecutions. Consequently, there is a need to institute carefully thought out police programs. Alternative police strategies, primarily from the perspective of a local police agency, are discussed in STRATEGIES 74-112.

shield since thieves are reluctant to testify against their fences,<sup>148</sup> and, in any event, their testimony alone may be insufficient for conviction in those jurisdictions that have adopted the "accomplice rule," which requires independent corroboration of such testimony.<sup>149</sup>

Successful master fences usually require access to the extensive capital resources, personnel and connections of organized crime syndicates.<sup>150</sup> The degree of assistance a master fence receives, of course, depends on the nature of his relationship with the syndicate. While some master fences may actually be syndicate members,<sup>151</sup> and consequently may receive considerable additional assistance in the form of information, personnel, equipment, and storage space, most are content to function outside the syndicate and simply to participate in the redistribution process, reaping a share of the profits.<sup>152</sup>

Because they deal in large quantities of stolen goods, the activities of master fences have a sharp impact on the national economy.<sup>153</sup>

148. Successful fences often enjoy very good relationships with their thieves. See C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 152-55; J. HALL, supra note 5, at 157, 196. Fences have been known to provide thieves with bail money and legal assistance. See C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 153; STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 4. These factors combine with the thief's natural economic dependence upon his fence to produce a general reluctance to testify against fences. Cf. Hearings on Fencing 34. This disinclination is reinforced when the fence is a member of an organized crime syndicate or in some way associated with one. In such cases, potential witnesses may be intimidated by the threat of physical harm. See TASK FORCE REPORT, ORGANIZED CRIME 14; V. TERESA, supra note 23, at 326-42; Blakey, Aspects of the Evidence Gathering Process in Organized Crime Cases: A Preliminary Analysis, in TASK FORCE REPORT, ORGANIZED CRIME 80, 83; Furstenberg, Violence and Organized Crime, CRIMES OF VIOLENCE: A STAFF REPORT TO THE NATIONAL COMM. ON THE CAUSES OF VIOLENCE 918-19. Finally, in many cases the thief may not know the actual identity of his master fence.

149. See notes 216-308 infra and accompanying text.

150. Even where he has not organized the theft, the master fence must have enough cash to meet his personnel, storage, and transportation costs. Naturally, where the fence has actually organized the theft, his initial cash outlay is even higher. The costs of large-scale theft run high; for hijacking a shipment worth $100,000, $20,000 or more may be needed for payoffs to informants, drivers, thieves and other participants. See Hearings on Fencing 152-53; CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 26-27. See generally STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 5; Emerson, supra note 48, at 37-39. Significantly, testimony has recently been given that in New York City alone "[f]our big fences . . . can come up with $100,000 in cash, no sweat." Hearings on Fencing 153.

151. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 28; Hearings on Fencing 135. These fences receive the benefit of access to capital and manpower resources. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 27; Hearings on Fencing 134-35.

152. "Fences, especially 'master' fences, are usually not members of 'organized crime' per se. However, organized crime figures will often 'stake' a fence with a large amount of money if he will use his connections to move stolen property for them. This is usually the relationship that exists, since a fence especially a 'master' fence, of necessity has the required legitimate contacts and travels in the highest business circles." REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 27. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 164.

153. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 25-28, 38-42; Hearings on Fencing 43-45, 151-54.

More significantly, however, since master fences must rely upon outside sources for support because of their high overhead costs, their growth and success is a good indicator of the extent to which organized crime syndicates control theft and fencing activity.

5. The Role of Organized Crime

Organized crime is a society that seeks to operate outside the control of the American people and their governments. It involves thousands of criminals, working within structures as complex as those of any large corporation, subject to laws more rigidly enforced than those of legitimate governments. Its actions are not impulsive but rather the result of intricate conspiracies, carried on over many years and aimed at gathering control over whole fields of activity in order to amass huge profits.<sup>154</sup>

154. TASK FORCE REPORT, ORGANIZED CRIME 1.

The concept of "organized crime" is much like the fictional crime portrayed in Akira Kurasawa's 1951 film, Rashomon, in which a ninth century nobleman's bride is raped by a bandit and the nobleman is killed. This double crime is then acted out in the film in four versions, as seen by the three participants and a witness. Each version is not quite like the others.

The vision of those who have looked at "organized crime" has been much like that of the witnesses whose stories were told in Rashomon. Some have seen nothing and hence have decided that nothing is there. See, e.g., Hawkins, God and the Mafia, 14 THE PUB. INTEREST 24-51 (Winter 1969). Compare the summaries of wiretaps reprinted in H. ZEIGER, THE JERSEY MOB (1975). Others have looked only at press accounts and have seen little more than a public relations gimmick. See D. SMITH, THE MAFIA MYSTIQUE (1975). Others have looked at it through the eyes of an organizational theorist, and have seen the special character of organized crime to be its functional division of labor. See D. CRESSEY, THEFT OF A NATION (1969). Some have examined the phenomenon from the perspective of an anthropologist and have seen not a "conspiracy" but a "social system." See, e.g., F. IANNI, A FAMILY BUSINESS (1972). Others have examined it as a lawyer would, and have seen it as "conspiracy." See, e.g., Blakey, supra note 148 at 80, 81-83. The President's Crime Commission, too, adopted this view (La Cosa Nostra was recognized only as the "core" of organized crime. Id. at 6); the Crime Commission termed conspiratorial crime "organized crime" when its sophistication reached the point where its division of labor included positions for an "enforcer" of violence and a "corrupter" of the legitimate processes of our society. Id. at 8.

A good summary of this view of "organized crime" was composed by the Departments of Justice and Transportation in a study of cargo theft:

[T]he predominant group and inner core of organized crime is . . . a Nationwide group divided into 24 to 26 operating units or "families" whose membership is exclusively men of one ethnic group and who number 5,000 or more. The Task Force [on Organized Crime of the President's Crime Commission] quoted the FBI's director, who evaluated this core group as "the largest organization of the criminal underworld in this country, very closely organized and disciplined . . . it has been found to control major racket activities in many of our larger metropolitan areas, often working in concert with criminals representing other ethnic backgrounds."

Heading each operating unit, or family, is the boss, whose authority is subject only to the rulings of a national advisory commission, which has the final word on organizational and jurisdictional disputes and is comprised of the more powerful bosses. Beneath each boss, in chain-of-command fashion, is an underboss, several captains (caporegime), who supervise lower-echelon soldiers, who in turn oversee large numbers of nonmember street personnel. One such family is said to number 1,000—half members, half nonmember street-level workers—with 27

In recent years, organized crime syndicates have expanded their fencing operations to exploit the growing demand of consumers and businesses for stolen goods.<sup>155</sup> This expansion has been made possible by the ability of organized crime to marshal its tremendous resources to solve the complex financial and logistical problems that captains and stretches from Connecticut to Philadelphia. Bosses have access to a variety of "staff men," including attorneys, accountants, business experts, enforcers, and corrupters. Many individuals, while not family members in a formal sense, work closely with these inner-core groups and may be called associates (to distinguish them from mere street workers) and, as is the case with street personnel, should be considered an integral part of organized crime. Some associates are highly respected by family members and are very powerful in their own right.

Through interceptions of phone conversations and other oral communications at different times and places between members and associates of this large criminal nucleus of the organized underworld, its existence, structure, activities, personnel, and such terminology as "boss," "captain," "family," "soldier," "commission" have been confirmed and reconfirmed beyond rational dispute.

Loosely allied with this large criminal nucleus are several other organized crime syndicates or groups, those members can also be distinguished among ethnic lines—just as most neighborhoods can, and probably for much the same sociological reasons. The various organized crime groups call upon the services and special skills of one another frequently enough for them to be characterized as a loose confederation, a designation reflecting the absence of a boss of bosses at the top. Sometimes these groups are referred to individually or collectively as the "outfit," "mob," or "syndicate."

Taking into account the political organizations, unions, businesses, and other groups directly or indirectly under the thumb of organized crime, the manpower available to the confederation could conceivably run into the hundreds of thousands. Because they are relatively well organized and disciplined and because they possess the demonstrated superior ability to protect themselves from prosecution through corruption and other means, organized crime groups have a strength and permanency beyond the reach of conventional partners in crime.

The difference to management between cargo theft committed under the direction of organized crime and cargo theft executed under the direction of non-member employees is analogous to the difference between a company's market share being challenged by a multibillion conglomerate and being challenged by a three- or four-man partnership. Both the conglomerate and partnership are engaged in business, just as organized crime groups and other nonmember criminal elements are both engaged in organized criminal activity. But there is a world of difference between a conglomerate and a partnership, just as there is between organized crime and less organized and disciplined individuals who may cooperate in crime.

CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 23-24. The phrase "organized crime" is used throughout this article to refer to this type of conspiratorial criminal behavior. For an analysis of the concept of "organized crime" that further breaks it into "enterprises," "syndicates," and "ventures," see ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE: REPORT OF THE NATIONAL COMM. FOR THE REVIEW OF FEDERAL AND STATE LAWS RELATING TO WIRETAPPING AND ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE 189-92 (1976) [hereinafter WIRE-TAP REPORT] (concurrence of Commissioner Blakey). See generally D. are inherent in large-scale theft and fencing activity.<sup>156</sup>

The participation of organized crime in many truck hijackings and the evolution of sophisticated hijacking techniques are evidence of its increasing role in large-scale fencing.<sup>157</sup> Illustratively, syndicate members engineer as many as seventy-five per cent of all truck hijackings in some areas of heavy organized crime activity.<sup>158</sup> In fact, the prototype "stick-up" hijacking is essentially a relic of the past,<sup>159</sup> for most hijackings today are more appropriately characterized as "give-ups" in which drivers, in accordance with prior arrangements, deliver the merchandise to thieves and then claim they were hijacked.<sup>160</sup> Sometimes the drivers and other insiders are rewarded for their duplicity,<sup>161</sup> but in most cases syndicate members coerce their participation by threatening to foreclose their gambling and loan sharking debts.<sup>162</sup> Members of the syndicate usually re-

158. A prime example is New York City. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 26; Hearings on Fencing 191. The syndicate's role, however, is not obvious to everyone:

Whether because of such indirect involvement by organized crime in cargo theft or because of public-image reasons—or both—there is the temptation to downgrade or deny the presence of organized crime at facilities where cargo is transported or otherwise handled. For example, at a southern location, a shipping executive did not believe organized crime was connected to pier thefts. However, other sources in the area revealed the following information: (1) the local crime family boss has held meetings with warehousemen, grocers, truckers, etc.; (2) this boss offered his assistance in establishing another local of a waterfront union; (3) a shylock has solicited loans, at 5 for 4 (25 percent weekly interest), from longshoremen and has been in collusion with a local waterfront union, which permitted the presence of the loan shark on payday and held back the wages of those indebted to him; (4) a syndicate-connected gambler is quoted as saying he expects to get "a lot of action off longshoremen"; (5) the president of a local dock workers union wrote a Federal judge about the fine character of the area's mob boss, who was about to receive a sentence from the jurist; (6) the same union president at one time utilized the services of a syndicate-connected bodyguard.

Once the theft is finished, the syndicate efficiently and effectively legitimizes and redistributes the goods.<sup>167</sup> The syndicate's connections with master and professional fences,<sup>168</sup> and the influence it exerts over many legitimate businesses,<sup>169</sup> have enabled it to develop a redistribution system capable of funneling stolen goods through interstate commerce with great ease.<sup>170</sup> Goods hijacked at 4:30 p.m. may be on retail shelves by 5:15 p.m. that same day.<sup>171</sup> The growth of such a redistribution network inevitably stimulates large-scale theft.

Although organized crime groups have not, of course, monopolized theft activity,<sup>172</sup> the considerable profits derived from redistributing large quantities of stolen goods assures their continued participation in large-scale thefts.<sup>173</sup> Moreover, syndicate activity in

The sophisticated structure of an organized crime syndicate, its relatively tight internal controls, and its usually enforced code of omerta—the code of conduct which mandates silence and loyalty—all serve to reinforce this insulation. 167. This service is essential because, in its absence, large-scale thieves would not be able to find a market for their goods. With financing supplied by syndicate sources, a sophisticated theft and fencing operation is made possible.

168. See note 152 supra.

169. Organized crime members have utilized their loansharking and gambling activities as a means of compelling indebted businessmen to handle stolen goods. In other situations, businesses directly controlled by organized crime handle the goods. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 28-29 (25 per cent of stolen goods estimated to be handled in syndicate outlets).

170. "Organized Crime . . . also controls the underworld disposal systems where bootlegged goods are rapidly fenced and distributed in the city and across the country." Emerson, supra note 48, at 315-16. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 39-40; Hearings on Fencing 7. Speed of distribution is made possible by finding buyers before the theft is carried out. 173. Organized crime does appear to have more than its share of the disposition narcotics, gambling and loansharking is indirectly responsible for a large number of smaller property crimes committed by burglars, shoplifters and employees,<sup>174</sup> and it gives syndicate members a means to acquire information useful for planning major thefts. Thus, organized crime is a pervasive influence in theft and fencing activities.

II. SOCIAL CONTROL THROUGH LAW

A. Criminal Sanctions

Despite the growth of large-scale criminal redistribution systems with their widespread adverse economic consequences, our society has been unable to develop correspondingly sophisticated legal measures to control the problem. As the following brief historical account will demonstrate, although fencing has been illegal since the era of Jonathan Wild, conceptualization of the crime has failed to keep pace with changes in the nature of the criminal activity.

1. The Development of the Law

Receiving property knowing it to be stolen is an offense whose "origin can be traced to medieval England[']s prohibition] . . . against 'harboring stolen cattle,'"<sup>175</sup> but fencing activity at that time was seen merely as an aspect of theft itself, not as a crime deserving of any independent recognition. In fact, early English law did not even impose criminal sanctions upon receivers as accessories after the fact unless they were guilty of sheltering the thieves.<sup>176</sup> Because economic conditions effectively precluded the possibility of large-scale theft for resale, receiving was not considered a major incentive to theft requiring separate criminal punishment.<sup>177</sup> But with ensuing economic developments<sup>178</sup> that spurred the growth of fencing ac-

The bulk, quantity, specialized nature, or other characteristics of much stolen cargo presents incontrovertible evidence—circumstantial as it is—of facilities, contacts, and know-how of a coordinated underworld. Referring to a series of sizeable cargo thefts, the head of a State investigation unit asserts that "the merchandise involved must be disposed of by the thieves and it is equally obvious that it can only be disposed of through organized crime channels."

tivity, legislation was enacted in 1692 to criminalize the mere receipt of stolen property.<sup>179</sup> Even then, however, a receiver was only subject to prosecution as an accessory after the fact to the larceny. Consequently, under established English procedure, he could not be brought to trial before the principal was convicted of theft.<sup>180</sup> This measure, which ironically gave receivers an additional incentive to assist their thieves in evading detection, was subsequently amended in part,<sup>181</sup> but the distinctions drawn between theft and fencing had been firmly ingrained in English law: "The tradition remained throughout the eighteenth century and early nineteenth that the receiver was an accessory to the crime rather than a principal."<sup>182</sup> Despite the success of Jonathan Wild, which clearly demonstrated the errors of this approach,<sup>183</sup> receiving stolen property remained an "appendage of theft" until 1827, when it was finally treated as a separate substantive offense.<sup>184</sup>

The 1827 English receiving statute served as a prototype for subsequent American legislation,<sup>185</sup> and although traces of the ap-

180. This reflected prevailing English attitudes which viewed theft as a major crime and receiving as simply a secondary activity. Since the receiver was only considered to be an accessory, English law would not punish him more severely than his principal and not at all if the thief escaped conviction. Since "the thief might avoid a conviction for larceny by dying, or by not getting caught, or by winning an erroneous acquittal," the statute was not an effective enforcement device. W. LAFAVE & A. Title 18 of the United States Code contains at least twelve provisions which could be used to prosecute the receipt of stolen goods. 18 U.S.C. § 659 (1970) (receipt of property stolen from an interstate or foreign carrier or depot); 18 U.S.C. § 662 (1970) (receipt of stolen property within the special maritime or territorial jurisdiction of the United States); 18 U.S.C. § 842(h) (1970) (receipt of stolen explosives); 18 U.S.C. § 1660 (1970) (receipt of property taken by an act of piracy or robbery); 18 U.S.C. § 1708 (1970) (receipt of property stolen from the U. Receiving stolen property is also outlawed in every state. State legislation is comprehensively analyzed in THE NATL. ASSN. OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL, COMM. ON THE OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL, LEGISLATIVE RESPONSES TO DEALING IN STOLEN GOODS 33-37 (Dec. 1975).

pendage theory still survive,<sup>186</sup> most jurisdictions today conceptualize receiving stolen property as an independent statutory crime.<sup>187</sup> But while the conceptual difficulties that plagued eighteenth-century England have largely been solved, they have been replaced by new failures to recognize the need to draw even more sophisticated distinctions. Whereas eighteenth-century English society had to learn to make legal distinctions between thief and receiver, our society must be prepared to distinguish among different classes of receivers and diverse patterns of fencing activity.<sup>188</sup> Law enforcement strategy and tactics must be designed to reflect modern differences in modus operandi and to accord special emphasis to the important role of organized crime syndicates.

Although there is evidence that our legal system has begun to recognize differences in fencing schemes,<sup>189</sup> recent proposals that treat fencing as a subordinate part of the theft problem simply continue outdated formulations.<sup>190</sup> A more advanced intellectual 186. For example, several of the federal provisions deal with receiving activity simply by listing the prohibition as part of a larger section outlawing a particular type of theft. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 641, 659, 1708, 2113 (1970). Several of the states, too, have recently consolidated receipt of stolen property as part of a general anti-theft classification reform. See note 190 infra. Examples of state statutes are: CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 53a-119(8) (Supp. 1975); ILL. REV. STAT. ch. 38, § 16-1(d) (Supp. 1975); KAN. STAT. ANN. § 21-3701(d) (1972). Unless sophisticated grading schemes are also adopted that distinguish different types of receipt, such reform is unwise. See, e.g., N.H. REV. STAT. ANN. 637:11 (1971).

187. See THE NATL. ASSN. OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL, supra note 185, at 33-37; ATTORNEY GENERAL, LEGISLATIVE RESPONSES TO DEALING IN STOLEN GOODS 33-37 (Dec. 1975).

188. See notes 103-74 supra and accompanying text. The need to distinguish among different kinds of receivers was first proposed in Hall's classic work. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 155-64; 189-99; 211-25. Since Professor Hall's initial study, patterns of redistribution have become even more sophisticated, and the role of organized crime has become more pronounced. Accordingly, the need for reform today is more apparent than ever, especially in light of the failure to implement Professor Hall's original proposals.

189. The judiciary has been primarily responsible for most of the legal developments that have facilitated the conviction of fences. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 173-89.

190. For example, both the Model Penal Code and the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws have advocated the consolidation of receiving into a general offense category which broadly outlaws theft activity. By characterizing receiving as merely a subordinate part of theft, the proposed legislation inadvertently de-emphasizes the significance of fencing activity. See MODEL PENAL CODE, § 223.1 (1) (Proposed Official Draft 1962); SENATE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, SUBCOMM. ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES, REPORT OF THE NATIONAL COMM. ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 1, § 1732(c), at 359 (1971) [hereinafter REFORM COMMN.]. Consolidation may be an appropriate way to deal with the receiver who obtains stolen property merely for personal consumption, but it is an awkward way to attack the multifaceted fencing activity that is carried on throughout the nation today. Both the Model Penal Code and the Reform Commission have, however, made some attempt to distinguish among different types of receivers for the framework that fundamentally changes evidentiary rules, state of mind requirements, and criminal sanctions, is at least one prerequisite to a modernization of investigative techniques. Until this has been accomplished, our laws will remain unable to help control effectively criminal redistribution systems.

2. Receiving Stolen Property: A Modern Perspective

Legislation criminalizing fencing activity has traditionally been drafted to outlaw the knowing receipt of stolen property.<sup>191</sup> To convict a receiver under such a statute, the prosecution must establish: (1) receipt of the goods by the fence; (2) the merchandise was stolen property at the time of the receipt; and (3) the fence knew the property was stolen.<sup>192</sup> When defined strictly in these terms, each element of the crime poses major obstacles to successful prosecution. Once these elements are considered from a twentieth-century perspective that recognizes the increasing sophistication of redistribution systems, however, appropriate modifications can be made to remove those obstacles.

a. The "receipt" of property. As in the first English fencing statute passed in the seventeenth century, the actus reus prohibited by most of the early federal and state statutes drafted in this country was the buying or receiving of stolen property.<sup>193</sup> Since this de-purpose of grading. See MODEL PENAL CODE §§ 223.1(2)(a), 223.6(2) (Proposed Official Draft 1962); REFORM COMM. § 1735(2)(f) at 362. Nevertheless, the potential impact of § 223.1(2)(a) of the Model Penal Code and § 1735(2)(f) of the Reform Commission is limited, and unless their significance is carefully noted, reform based on these recommendations can err. See, e.g., N.H. REV. STAT. ANN. § 637.11 (1971) (grading distinction not adopted).

191. The offense is commonly referred to as "receiving stolen property." See note 185 supra.

192. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 683. In addition, some statutes explicitly require the prosecution to establish that the defendant intended to deprive the owner of his interest in his property. See, e.g., COLO. REV. STAT. § 18-4-401 (Supp. 1975); ILL. REV. STAT. ch. 38, § 16-1(d) (Supp. 1975); N.Y. PENAL LAW §§ 165.45, 165.60 (McKinney 1975). This requirement is designed to eliminate the potential liability of one, such as a policeman or innocent finder, who knowingly possesses the stolen property, but intends to return it immediately. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 223.6 (Proposed Official Draft 1962). In any event, this element is not considered a major impediment, since it is readily established by direct or circumstantial evidence. Generally, in the absence of specific language setting forth this requirement, its establishment is not a prerequisite to conviction. See STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 17.

193. See 3 & 4 W. & M., c.9, § 4 (1692). Approximately 20 jurisdictions still retain this emphasis on the buying or receiving of stolen goods. Hearings on Fencing 164-71. See, e.g., MD. ANN. CODE art. 27 § 466 (1957); N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:139-1 (Supp. 1974). See generally MODEL PENAL CODE § 206.8, Comment (Tent. Draft No. 2, 1954).

194. See notes 142-43, 145, 152 supra and accompanying text.

scription of the proscribed conduct proved ineffective in controlling fences who avoid physical contact with stolen goods and never make purchases for their own use,<sup>194</sup> many states have expanded the scope of the prohibited conduct to include withholding, concealing or aiding in the concealment of stolen property.<sup>195</sup> Likewise, Congress has adopted measures to correct similar deficiencies in federal receiving statutes, but no uniform formula has yet been developed at the federal level. Thus, current state and federal legislation, reflecting the inability of law enforcement authorities to formulate an effective and consistent approach to fencing, broadly proscribe conduct ranging from the traditional purchase or receipt to the sale, barter, concealment, retention, transportation, disposal, storage, or possession of stolen goods.<sup>196</sup>

It is doubtful that the inclusion of many of these terms actually promotes more efficient law enforcement. Language such as "disposal" or "sale" may help reach the fencing techniques of modern receivers, but, in the absence of appropriate gradation distinctions, the remaining language merely creates additional confusion in the substantive law. In contrast, the clear description of the proscribed conduct in the Criminal Justice Reform Act of 1975, S.1, the most recent Congressional proposal for reforming the federal criminal code, makes possible a realistic effort to deal with modern fencing activity.<sup>197</sup> According to the fencing provisions of that proposed Act, "[a] person is guilty of [receiving stolen property] . . . if he buys, receives, possesses, or obtains control of property of another that has been stolen."<sup>198</sup> By focusing on the control of stolen prop-

195. Hearings on Fencing 164-71. See, e.g., CAL. PENAL CODE § 496 (West Supp. 1975). These additions, however, are only an indirect way of dealing with the problem, and considerable judicial effort has been required to apply the modified versions to fences who have avoided physical contact with the goods. See note 202 infra and accompanying text. Significantly, the terms "conceal" or "withhold" were probably adopted merely to reach the situation where the defendant, upon initial receipt, had no knowledge of the goods' stolen character but subsequently acquired the requisite knowledge and decided to keep the goods. As the statutes were initially drafted, such a defendant had technically committed no crime since he did not knowingly receive the goods. See W. LAFAYE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 688-89. Subsequently, however, the terms "withhold" and "conceal" received appropriately broader application. Id. at 684.

196. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 641, 662, 659, 842(h), 2113(c), 2313, 2315 (1970). These statutes are discussed briefly in note 185 supra. Specific state legislation dealing with specialized aspects of fencing is outside the scope of these materials. Examples of provisions that are common throughout the United States, but are too particularized to merit examination here, are ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 44-1621 to 1627 (1967) (pawn brokers); COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 42-5-102 (1973) (stolen auto parts).

erty, the statute concisely covers a broad range of modern fencing activities that do not require physical possession.<sup>199</sup> The proposed federal legislation, however, does not contain a definition of control.<sup>200</sup> In any event, it is, of course, not yet law, and only a few states have adopted a simple control-oriented definition of the actus reus by defining receiving to be the equivalent of acquiring possession or control of stolen goods.<sup>201</sup>

Despite failures at the legislative level, modernization of fencing statutes has in effect been accomplished in many jurisdictions by judicial statutory construction. By viewing the offense in broad terms, a number of courts have construed statutes to include any conduct that might be considered to be constructive possession, effective control, or an exercise of dominion over the stolen property.<sup>202</sup> Still, many courts steadfastly refuse to make this broad interpretation. Moreover, in those jurisdictions that are willing, case-by-case determinations, requiring close judicial scrutiny of the relationship between the defendant and the stolen goods, suffer from a lack of predictability as to whether proof of constructive possession or control is sufficient to convict alleged fences and, if it is, as to what conduct amounts to sufficient control.<sup>203</sup> This lack of uniformity and predictability can only be alleviated by carefully tailored legislative reform.

This article, therefore, recommends that legislatures enact statutes similar to the Model Theft and Fencing Act (Model Act) set

199. See generally notes 142-50 supra and accompanying text. The Model Penal Code also reflects the view that control of stolen property is the essence of modern fencing activity. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 206.8, Comment (Tent. Draft No. 2, 1954).

200. S.1, § 1733(a) simply mentions the word control without explicating the factual basis that would support such a finding. In all likelihood, the courts would follow previous decisions. For a discussion of prior decisions, see United States v. Casalnuovo, 350 F.2d 207, 209-10 (2d Cir. 1965).

201. See Hearings on Fencing 164-71. An example of such legislation is COLO. REV. STAT. § 18-4-401 (1973). This approach has been advocated by the Model Penal Code. MODEL PENAL CODE § 223.6 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

202. See W. LAFAYE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 683. Both state and federal cases stress that control or dominion is the essential element to be established. See, e.g., United States v. Casalnuovo, 350 F.2d 207, 209 (2d Cir. 1965) ("such a nexus or relationship between the defendant and the goods that it is reasonable to treat the extent of the defendant's dominion and control as if it were actual possession"); Commonwealth v. Davis, 444 Pa. 11, 15, 280 A.2d 119, 121 (1971) ("in possession of stolen goods only when it is proved that he exercised conscious control or dominion over those goods").

203. See People v. Fein, 292 N.Y. 10, 53 N.E.2d 373, 39 N.Y.S.2d 999 (1944); People v. Colon, 28 N.Y.2d 1, 267 N.E.2d 577, 318 N.Y.S.2d 929, cert. denied, 402 U.S. 905 (1971). forth in appendix B, which modifies the basic approach employed by the drafters of S.1. According to the Model Act, the defendant has exhibited the proscribed conduct if he "obtains or uses" stolen property.<sup>204</sup> The proposal defines "obtains or uses" as "any manner of . . . taking or exercising control . . . making an unauthorized use, disposition, or transfer of property . . . or obtaining property by fraud . . . ." <sup>205</sup>

Even if suggested substantive reforms are initiated, however, because of critical inadequacies in existing techniques for gathering evidence, control or constructive possession may be difficult to establish if the fence is not apprehended in physical possession of the goods. Conviction simply is not possible unless the stolen merchandise can in some way be linked to the fence. An investigation may be facilitated by informants<sup>206</sup> or by testimony from accomplices who have received immunity.<sup>207</sup> To tap these sources of information, the Model Act provides that accomplice testimony alone is sufficient to establish receipt if it is believed beyond a reasonable doubt.<sup>208</sup>

The rule in many jurisdictions, however, is that, unless it is independently corroborated, an accomplice's testimony is insufficient for conviction.<sup>209</sup> As a tactical matter, then, the prosecution's task in

In 1972, for example, FBI informants provided information which led to the recovery by the FBI of $35 million in stolen property and contraband. Hearings on the Depts. of State, Justice, and Commerce, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations for 1974 Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Appropriations, 93d Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 1, at 879 (1973). Different problems are involved when the informant is not a thief. First, the police may be reluctant to reveal his identity, since such a disclosure would destroy his future effectiveness and jeopardize his physical safety. Second, an informant by his very nature may not make a credible witness. Finally, in some cases, the use of an informant may result in allegations of entrapment. See, e.g., C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 98-100. On the federal level, the traditional notion of entrapment focuses on the predisposition of the defendant to commit the crime. See Sorrells v. United States, 287 U.S. 435 (1932). In United States v. Russell, 411 U.S. 423 (1973), where the defendant was offered an essential ingredient for the illicit manufacture of drugs, the Court's language in formulating the defense suggests that a "sell and bust" program in the fencing area might not run afoul of entrapment if targets were carefully selected. What might have been only inferred from Russell seems to be beyond question in Hampton v. United States, 19 CRIM. L. RPTR. 3039 (4-27-76) (sell to and buy back heroin if predisposed not entrapment). "Attempted receipt," not "receipt," of course, would be the charge. See note 237 infra. Such a program might, however, run into judicial opposition at the state level. See Young v. Superior Court, 253 Cal. App. 2d 838, 61 Cal. Rptr. 355 (1967).

those jurisdictions is appreciably lightened only when it has apprehended the defendant in actual possession of the goods, which seldom occurs at the more sophisticated levels of fencing activity, or has otherwise obtained independent corroboration of the facts establishing control or constructive possession.<sup>210</sup>

The use of a search warrant is all too often an inadequate investigative tool for fencing crimes since the warrant may be issued only after probable cause has been established, a process that tends to be both cumbersome and time-consuming.<sup>211</sup> For example, although the personal observations of a police officer would establish probable cause, in situations where an informant has provided the critical information—the typical case in fencing investigations—police must demonstrate to a judge their basis for considering the information reliable and reveal the informant's source of information.<sup>212</sup> There is sufficient corroboration if the informant, shown to be reliable, states he has personal knowledge of the information he has provided.<sup>213</sup> If the informant does not have such personal knowledge, police must independently corroborate his testimony.<sup>214</sup> Sophisticated fences are too often able to dispose of their stolen goods before police can acquire probable cause and obtain and execute a war-

210. Even in those states where there is no rule requiring the corroboration of an accomplice's testimony, an accomplice's account of the crime often lacks the credibility necessary to persuade a jury beyond a reasonable doubt. This is particularly so when the defense effectively emphasizes to the jury that the witness is testifying under a grant of immunity or promise of leniency. See C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 99-100.

211. The warrant must set forth sufficient detail of underlying circumstances to enable the federal magistrate or a judge of the state within which the search is to take place to evaluate independently whether probable cause exists. See United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573, 578-83 (1971); Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 415-16 (1969).

212. See Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. at 416-17; Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 110-15 (1964).

213. Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. at 416.

214. Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. at 416-18. Spinelli's demand for corroboration has been weakened by the holding of United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573 (1971). Two concurring justices went as far as to call for the overruling of Spinelli. 403 U.S. at 585-86 (Black & Blackmun, JJ., concurring). It may be only a short time before it is overruled. As it stands, it is a significant road block in fencing investigations.

Note that prior to Spinelli, Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307 (1959), upheld the validity of a warrantless arrest under circumstances where the corroboration consisted simply of police observations of activity which, while not itself illegal, served to confirm so many of the details supplied by the informant that it would have been reasonable for a magistrate to conclude that the information supplied was accurate. The validity of this approach to probable cause, however, underwent a significant development in Spinelli, which found that the Draper information was based on personal knowledge, so that corroboration of the criminality was not required.

rant.<sup>215</sup> Alternatively, the use of the "buy-bust" technique,<sup>216</sup> which deploys undercover agents who pose as dealers of illegal goods, may offer a more viable solution, at least in gathering evidence against neighborhood, outlet, or professional fences. It obviously offers little hope of success against well-insulated master fences.

In any case, investigations are often also complicated by the general absence of conduct that clearly bespeaks its own illegality: A sophisticated fence utilizes the legitimate aspects of his business to disguise any underlying criminal conduct.<sup>217</sup> Even so, this veil of legitimacy may in some cases be pierced by intensive physical and electronic surveillance, which allows police to show the probable cause they are not otherwise able to establish by conventional methods of enforcement. Police might not then be required to obtain a warrant for an immediate arrest<sup>218</sup> and search<sup>219</sup> where the fence is known to be in criminal possession, thus greatly reducing the risk the fence will transfer the stolen merchandise, thereby disposing of the evidence of his crime. Although admittedly time-consuming, expensive, and an obvious drain on manpower,<sup>220</sup> once the authorities have learned (from an informant, captured thief, or electronic surveillance) of the operations of a particular fence, intensive sur-

215. See, e.g., Hearings on Fencing 27; note 131 supra.

216. The "buy-bust" or "sell-bust" technique may be utilized against both thieves and fences. When thieves are the target of the technique, the undercover officer assumes the identity of a fence who is willing to buy stolen goods. At an appropriate time, arrests can then be made. See generally, 122 CONG. REC. S12222-25 (daily ed. July 22, 1976) (LEAA support for anti-theft programs). For a fence, the process would involve an attempt by an undercover officer to sell goods to, or purchase them from, a suspected fence. If the fence is responsive, an arrest would be made. See STRATEGIES 74-113.

217. See notes 132-38 supra and accompanying text.

218. The right to arrest without a warrant was recognized prior to the development of the warrant procedures and was never supplanted by them. See Wilgus, Arrest Without a Warrant (pts. 1-2), 22 MICH. L. REV. 541, 548-50, 673, 685-89 (1924). Historically, arrest warrant procedures arose solely out of a desire to protect the arresting officer from tort liability. 1 STEPHEN, A HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND 190-93 (1883). The right to search without a warrant, however, received no such independent favorable development. See generally LASSON, THE HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE FOURTH AMENDMENT 23-50 (1937). The current teaching of the Supreme Court on arrests without warrants is contained in United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976) (not necessary in public area).

219. Once an arrest has been made, the police can conduct a limited search of the area to ensure that the goods are not subsequently moved. The Supreme Court has limited the scope of this potential search, however, to the suspect's body and areas within his immediate reach. Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969). Even so, if the goods are not initially obtained in that way, the police could protect against the loss of evidence by posting a guard and returning later with a search warrant. See Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970); Shipley v. California, 395 U.S. 818 (1969).

220. See Hearings on Fencing 4.

veillance as part of an aggressive enforcement program offers the only realistic hope of acquiring sufficient evidence of the proscribed conduct to justify an arrest. Whether a conviction is subsequently obtained depends upon the prosecution's ability to establish the remaining elements of the offense.

b. The goods must be stolen. Since receiving statutes are designed to criminalize only conduct that is socially unacceptable, a basic element of the offense is the requirement that the goods have been stolen and have retained their stolen character throughout the redistribution process.<sup>221</sup> This element initially posed definitional problems for prosecutors since courts were inclined, at least at one time, to describe as "stolen" property only those items that were obtained by common law larceny.<sup>222</sup> They thus excluded the receipt of property obtained by embezzlement or false pretenses from the scope of fencing statutes. In recent years, however, the potential for a technical defense based on the narrow common law definition of the term "stolen" has been eliminated by judicial<sup>223</sup> and legislative<sup>224</sup> action that has expanded the scope of the prohibition to include property obtained by any type of felonious taking.<sup>225</sup>

Although this development has successfully eliminated a troublesome technical defense to fencing crimes, conviction is often impossible anyway either because prosecutors are unable to prove that the goods are stolen<sup>226</sup> or because the goods are no longer technically "stolen property" when obtained by the fence. Typically, stolen merchandise lacks any distinctive identifying indicia, and whatever identifying marks are provided can easily be removed by fences.<sup>227</sup>

225. The Model Act eliminates any similar confusion by specifically providing that goods obtained by a variety of means are considered "stolen property." See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 7(b), Appendix B. S. 1, § 111 proposes a very broad definition of "stolen": "[s]tolen property means property that has been the subject of any criminal taking, including theft, executing a fraudulent scheme, robbery, extortion, blackmail, and burglary . . . ."

226. This is due in large part to the prosecution's need to identify stolen property with "some precision." STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 15. The true owner is generally required to identify his goods. An analysis of the cases holding that identification is not necessary suggests only that the owner's identification is not always necessary for indictment purposes. See Annot., 99 A.L.R.2d 382 (1965). Because the owner's identification is required for trial, however, most prosecutors are reluctant to initiate indictment proceedings if a precise identification cannot be made. See notes 228, 231, 259 infra.

227. Members of the New York City Police Department have regularly conferred with various manufacturers of clothing and small appliances in an attempt

Manufacturers could deter theft and fencing somewhat by serially numbering their products and recording those numbers.<sup>228</sup> Such a procedure would presumably impede illicit resale efforts by facilitating both the recovery of stolen property and the prosecution of guilty parties.<sup>229</sup> Unfortunately, few manufacturers are willing to incur the production and record-keeping expenses that this process unavoidably entails.<sup>230</sup> In the absence of a reliable identification system, therefore, fungible stolen goods can be easily commingled with legitimate merchandise<sup>231</sup> to preclude precise identification by police.<sup>232</sup>

Conviction of fences is further hampered in many jurisdictions by the requirement that the goods retain their stolen character throughout the redistribution process. Quite often, police catch the thieves with the stolen property or otherwise recover the merchandise before it comes into the possession of a fence, and, frequently with the cooperation of the apprehended criminals, they then proceed to complete delivery to the property's purchasers. By utilizing this approach, police can minimize identification problems and directly trace the goods to a professional fence or other seemingly legitimate business.<sup>233</sup> In contrast to analogous investigatory "set-ups" used to break up distribution networks for narcotics, however, once authorities recover stolen property, the goods immediately lose their stolen character, and subsequent receivers cannot be prosecuted for receiving stolen property.<sup>234</sup> Although this result may be to have all products serialized for identification purposes. However, the position of many manufacturers is that identification would be extremely costly in terms of labor and record keeping and might conceivably price their products out of the market. In most cases, identification can be made by markings on outer cartons where consignee names and order numbers are stenciled. Unfortunately, the thieves also have this knowledge and their first act after coming into possession of "swag" is to "strip the cartons" or remove the information from the cartons.

233. After the goods are traced to a warehouse, a professional fence, or a "legitimate" business outlet, investigation could work upstream in an effort to apprehend (or at least identify) the organizer or master fence. This process could be achieved, inter alia, through the careful use of immunity grants. See note 277-94 infra and accompanying text.

234. The authorities uniformly agree on this point. See, e.g., W. LAFAVE & A.

legally sound, a valuable investigative technique is largely emasculated if authorities are also unable to prosecute receivers for attempted receipt of stolen property.

In the federal system, the question of whether fences may be prosecuted for attempted receipt of stolen property in these situations is not reached because there is no attempt provision of general application in the federal criminal code.<sup>235</sup> At the state level, a number of jurisdictions with criminal attempt provisions have not yet decided whether an attempt conviction is appropriate in this instance. When the issue was squarely presented in the leading case of People v. Jaffe,<sup>236</sup> however, the New York Court of Appeals held that an attempt conviction in the fencing context presented a question of legal impossibility, and accordingly reversed a conviction for attempted receipt of stolen property.<sup>237</sup> New York followed this ap-

236. 185 N.Y. 497, 78 N.E. 169 (1906).

237. The Court of Appeals reasoned that "if the accused had completed the act which he attempted to do, he would not be guilty of a criminal offense," and on this basis concluded that he could not be guilty of attempt. 185 N.Y. at 502, 78 N.E. at 170. In reality, however, Jaffe's conviction should have been upheld since the case actually involved a question of factual, not legal, impossibility. Jaffe had made a mistake with respect to a factual attendant circumstance; he had thought that property that was not stolen was, in fact, stolen. Although under the circumstances of the case, the property had legally lost its stolen character, this transition should only have served to preclude a conviction for the substantive offense but not for a conviction for attempt. The authorities are in general agreement that factual impossibility is not a defense to attempt. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 438-42. As evidenced by Jaffe, the distinction between legal and factual impossibility is unclear. The appropriate distinction is outlined by LaFave and Scott: "If the case is one of legal impossibility, in the sense that what the defendant set out to do is not criminal, then the defendant is not guilty of attempt. On the other hand, factual impossibility, where the intended crime is impossible of accomplishment merely because of some physical impossibility unknown to the defendant, is not a defense." Id. at 439 (emphasis added). When analyzed in this context the distinction is apparent, but confusion has developed because of a tendency by some courts to classify certain cases as legal impossibility simply because an attendant circumstance simultaneously involved what appears to be a question of law. For example, in Jaffe there had been a prior interception, which made the question whether the property was stolen one of law. But as to the defendant, the question was really one of fact, and the mistaken belief did not make his conduct any less blameworthy. Analyzing the issue in precisely this manner, the Supreme Court of California rightly rejected the Jaffe decision: "Even though we say that, technically, the [goods] . . . were not 'stolen' nevertheless the defendant did attempt to receive stolen property." People v. Rojas, 55 Cal. 2d 252, 258, 358 P.2d 921, 924, 10 Cal. Rptr. 465, 468 (1961). Accordingly, mistake as to attendant circumstances should never be a defense to attempt. This is the view taken by the Model Penal Code and sophisticated legislatures and jurists. See notes 239-41 infra. Other decisions that have incorrectly applied the impossibility theory proach for many years,<sup>238</sup> but other states adopted a more pragmatic approach in similar situations and, either by judicial interpretation<sup>239</sup> or statutory enactment,<sup>240</sup> authorized convictions for attempting to receive stolen property. Although the primary rationale for the more pragmatic approach is the blameworthy character of the fence's conduct and his state of mind,<sup>241</sup> such an approach also facilitates law enforcement efforts. Rather than requiring police to resort to impracticable techniques that would necessitate their tracking stolen goods from a distance as they pass through a complex redistribution chain,<sup>242</sup> recognition of the propriety of attempt convictions in these circumstances allows authorities to intervene immediately and to maintain direct control as the property passes through the chain.

By legislation, New York has abandoned the impossibility de-

The apparent confusion surrounding the impossibility defense and the crime of attempt has attracted the attention of numerous scholars. See, e.g., J. HALL, GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LAW 586-99 (2d ed. 1960); Elkind, Impossibility in Criminal Attempts: A Theorist's Headache, 54 VA. L. REV. 20 (1968); Enker, Impossibility in Criminal Attempts—Legality and the Legal Process, 53 MINN. L. REV. 665 (1969); Hughes, One Further Footnote on Attempting the Impossible, 42 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1005 (1967); Sayre, Criminal Attempts, 41 HARV. L. REV. 821, 848-55 (1928).

The impossibility doctrine still continues to trouble the courts. For two recent cases decided on questionable grounds see United States v. Hair, 356 F. Supp. 339 (D.D.C. 1973) (defendant told that television set was stolen property) and United States v. Berrigan, 482 F.2d 171 (3d Cir. 1973) (refusal to allow conviction of "attempt to smuggle mail in or out of prison without warden's knowledge or consent" when warden knew of smuggling). But see Booth v. State, 398 P.2d 863, 868-72 (Okla. Crim. App. 1965); Young v. Superior Ct., 253 Cal. App. 2d 848, 853-54, 61 Cal. Rptr. 355, 359-60 (1967).

240. These statutes have not focused specifically on the crime of receiving stolen property but instead have paralleled the approach of the Model Penal Code by authorizing attempt convictions whenever an actor "purposely engages in conduct which would constitute the crime if the attendant circumstances were as he believes them to be." MODEL PENAL CODE § 5.01(1)(a) (Proposed Official Draft 1962). See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 53a-49 (1971).

241. "In all of these cases (1) criminal purpose has been clearly demonstrated, (2) the actor has gone as far as he could in implementing that purpose, and (3) as a result, the actor's 'dangerousness' is plainly manifested." MODEL PENAL CODE § 5.01(a), Comment, at 31 (Tent. Draft No. 10, 1960).

fense,<sup>243</sup> but the law of other states in this area generally remains unsettled.<sup>244</sup> Since an approach authorizing attempt convictions in receiving cases reflects an appropriate standard of blameworthiness and supports a necessary investigative technique, it is to be hoped that legislation eliminating the impossibility defense in fencing situations will be quickly enacted without the delay associated with general penal reform. The Model Act, illustratively, expressly authorizes attempt convictions in the receiving context.<sup>245</sup> Further, since similar investigative techniques would facilitate control by federal authorities of large-scale, interstate fencing activity,<sup>246</sup> there is a need for congressional enactment of an appropriate special attempt provision that would obviate the possibility of a technical defense based on legal impossibility.<sup>247</sup>

Additional legislation could also be drafted to facilitate investigations and help reduce the difficulties prosecutors confront in proving the goods are "stolen."<sup>248</sup> Since legitimate wholesale and retail

244. Because very few jurisdictions have specifically dealt with the question of legal impossibility in the receipt of stolen property context, the issue has not been satisfactorily resolved. Accordingly, there is the danger that other jurisdictions will consider Jaffe well reasoned. See Annot., 37 A.L.R.3d 375 (1971); note 237 supra.

245. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT §§ 2, 4(a)(1), 4(a)(2), Appendix B.

246. See note 170 supra.

247. S. 1, § 1001 proposes the creation of a general attempt offense and the elimination of the defense of legal or factual impossibility whenever the crime would "have been committed had the circumstances been as the actor believed them to be."

248. The need for federal legislation goes beyond reform in the area of attempt. Presently, federal theft legislation is usually tied to some aspect of interstate commerce; the defendant must be shown to have so transported, or at least so caused the transportation of, the stolen goods. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 2314 (1970); United States v. Scandifia, 390 F.2d 244 (2d Cir. 1968), vacated on other grounds, 394 U.S. 310 (1969). This causes additional proof problems at trial. It also causes virtually insurmountable probable cause problems during the process of investigation, particularly investigation of fences. Informants will supply intelligence of fencing activity, but they are not often attuned to the proof requirements of federal law. Under present practices and legal limitations, it is difficult to convict a fence on federal grounds, even with the aid of such extraordinary tools as electronic surveillance. See generally Testimony of Special Agent Robert G. Sweeney, Hearings of the National Comm. for the Review of Federal and State Laws Relating to Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance, Vol. 2, at 860-61 (May 20, 1975). The need here is for comprehensive federal fencing legislation patterned after either 18 U.S.C. § 892 (1970) (loansharking) or 18 U.S.C. § 1955 (1970) (syndicated gambling), neither of which makes commerce an integral part of the offense. See Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146 (1971) (holding that § 892 is constitutional); United States v. Sacco, 491 F.2d 995 (9th Cir. 1974) (§ 1955 held constitutional). The need for independent federal legislation is underscored by the interplay of other aspects of the problem. Often the states that have comprehensive theft and fencing legislation do not have the necessary investigative tools (e.g., wiretapping); in addition, because of restrictive court decisions, federal-state cooperation is seriously inhibited. See, e.g., People v. Jones, 30 Cal. App. 3d 852, 106 Cal. Rptr. 749, cert. denied, 414 U.S. 804 (1973) (lawful federal wiretap inadmissible in state proceedings).

dealers apparently play an important role in theft and fencing,<sup>249</sup> it would be helpful to impose on them a duty of inquiry as to the source of the goods they purchase and to criminalize, under appropriate standards, the possession of merchandise with altered identification marks. An appropriate duty of inquiry would permit undercover police to offer for sale allegedly stolen goods<sup>250</sup> and at least to arrest dealers who purchased without making a proper inquiry. Assuming sufficient corroborative evidence is available, noncomplying merchants might be convicted of both an attempt to purchase stolen property and a failure to inquire, regardless of the innocent character of the property in question.<sup>251</sup> Of course, the failure to inquire might be appropriately graded as a lesser offense than attempted receipt of stolen property.<sup>252</sup>

249. See notes 45-49, 115-39, 145, 169-71 supra and accompanying text.

250. The investigation would have to be carried out with great care, since entrapment is an obvious potential difficulty. See note 209 supra. A suggested method would include the use of agents or cooperative informants who would be wired with appropriate electronic surveillance devices. Since the "wired" individual consents to the use of such a device, no fourth amendment problem is posed. See Lopez v. United States, 373 U.S. 427, 437-40 (1963) (wire recorder); On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747, 753-54 (1952) (transmitter); United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971). Cf. Rathbun v. United States, 355 U.S. 107 (1957) (telephone). For an illustration of the creative use of a wired informant in a fencing investigation where the informant died before trial, but the tapes were still used, see United States v. Lemonakis, 485 F.2d 941, 948-49 (D.C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 989 (1974). A merchant who fails to adhere to the duty could also be caught through the use of legislatively authorized electronic surveillance measures issued pursuant to a court order. 18 U.S.C. §§ 2516-2519 (1970). See notes 310-28 infra and accompanying text. Under such circumstances a "wired" agent could establish the initial probable cause for the court order.

251. Since the purpose of such an enactment would be to facilitate investigative efforts, the mere failure to make inquiry would constitute a separate offense, and the character of the goods would be immaterial. Consequently, a merchant who fails to make appropriate inquiry with respect to the source of goods would act at his peril.

Hall points out that New York initially utilized a similar approach by enacting legislation that required diligent inquiry into the character of the goods and later created a rebuttable presumption of knowledge of the goods' stolen character whenever there had been failure to make diligent inquiry. J. HALL, supra note 5, at 211-12. New York's statute did not, however, make the mere failure to inquire a separate substantive offense. Id. at 212-13. See People v. Rosenthal, 197 N.Y. 394 (1910), affd., 226 U.S. 260 (1912) (failure to inquire in receipt of stolen property by junk dealer not violation of liberty of contract or equal protection). Apparently, Hall did not recognize the investigative significance that such a statute might have, for although he proposed to make the failure to inquire a separate offense applicable to designated retail and wholesale dealers, he apparently would not have allowed a conviction if the items were not, in fact, stolen. J. HALL, supra note 5, at 224.

252. As an alternative to making failure to inquire an offense, a statutory presumption could be enacted which would give rise to a presumption of knowledge of the goods' stolen character upon proof of a dealer's failure to make inquiry with respect to source. See notes 344 infra and accompanying text. There are, however, constitutional limitations surrounding presumptions of this type. See notes 351-54, 360-88 infra and accompanying text.

A law proscribing the possession of altered merchandise would function in a somewhat different manner. As provided by section 3 of the Model Act,<sup>253</sup> possession of altered property itself would be considered a separate crime; in addition, it could be treated as a strict liability offense.<sup>254</sup> The Model Act also provides appropriate gradation distinctions since possession of altered goods may be less blameworthy than possession of stolen property.<sup>255</sup>

Obviously, such a proposal is useful only if sufficient numbers of products are manufactured with distinctive identification marks. For this reason, legislatures should seriously consider requiring serialization of products where technologically feasible.<sup>256</sup> In the past, state legislatures have not refrained from imposing similar requirements upon businessmen to protect state revenues. For example, the stamping of cigarette packages is routinely required in most states.<sup>257</sup> State revenues are similarly threatened by theft and fencing, since fences frequently sell stolen goods without collecting or reporting a sales tax and victimized merchants inevitably report lower profits for income tax purposes.<sup>258</sup> If mandatory serialization is too far-reaching, legislatures might consider offering businesses tax credits in return for voluntary serialization.

In any case, both prosecutors and police are in desperate need of a modernized approach to help them prove receipt of "stolen" property. Serialization accompanied by accurate recording procedures would help in the identification of stolen property, and especially in jurisdictions that do not recognize a crime of attempted receipt of stolen property, would also help police trace property

253. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 3, Appendix B. Note that the Model Act would not make possession of altered property a strict liability offense. See note 2, Appendix B.

254. Strict liability has traditionally received constitutional approval in the regulatory offense area. For a detailed discussion of the constitutional limitations on strict liability offenses in general, see notes 412-25 infra and accompanying text. Note that the proposed legislation should provide an exemption for cases when the dealer has received the manufacturer's express permission to make alterations or when such activity is considered impliedly approved by prevailing commercial standards.

Similar legislation, but of a more limited character, has been enacted in California and Illinois. California's statute does not provide for strict liability, and Illinois' is directed at a very limited range of activity. See CAL. PENAL LAW § 537e (West Supp. 1975); ILL. ANN. STAT. ch. 38, § 50-31 (Smith-Hurd 1970).

255. Compare MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 3(b), with §§ 2(b), 4(b), Appendix B.

256. Legislation could be designed that would create a hearing board structure to review questions of technological and economic feasibility.

through complex redistribution systems without actually intervening, and thus without depriving the goods of their "stolen merchandise" status. In addition, since sophisticated receivers can remove serial numbers, the passage of statutes criminalizing either the possession of altered merchandise or the failure to inquire is necessary.

c. The state of mind requirement. In addition to establishing that the property was received and stolen, the prosecution must also establish that the fence knew the goods were stolen.<sup>259</sup> In the federal courts the prosecution need not prove that the defendant knew the stolen goods were part of interstate commerce,<sup>260</sup> since this element has uniformly been regarded as a purely jurisdictional requirement.<sup>261</sup> Although for many years the circuits were split over whether knowledge of the jurisdictional element must be established in conspiracy cases,<sup>262</sup> the Supreme Court recently facilitated con-

259. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 685-88.

260. The interstate character of the transaction must be established under several of the federal theft statutes. There is, however, a difference between the character of the interstate element in several of the statutes. In 18 U.S.C. § 659 (1970), for example, the goods must be taken from interstate commerce, while in 18 U.S.C. § 2313 and § 2315 (1970) the goods must have moved in interstate commerce after having been stolen.

261. See, e.g., United States v. Jennings, 471 F.2d 1310, 1312 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 935 (1973); United States v. Tannuzzo, 174 F.2d 177, 180 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 815 (1949).

262. The underlying argument of those decisions that have required proof of the defendant's knowledge of the jurisdictional elements in conspiracy cases was originally stated by Judge Learned Hand: "While one may, for instance, be guilty of running past a traffic light of whose existence one is ignorant, one cannot be guilty of conspiring to run past such a light, for one cannot agree to run past a light unless one supposes that there is a light to run past." United States v. Crimmins, 123 F.2d 271, 273 (2d Cir. 1941). Accordingly, "[t]he distinction between the scienter component of the conspiracy and substantive charges arises from the notion that although an individual may commit some crimes unwittingly he cannot conspire to commit a specific crime unless he is aware of all the elements of the crime." United States v. DeMarco, 488 F.2d 828, 832 (2d Cir. 1973).

The Hand approach, however, was widely criticized by both the courts and the commentators. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 5.03, Comment at 110-13 (Tent. Draft No. 10, 1960); Developments in the Law—Criminal Conspiracy, 72 HARV. L. REV. 920, 937-39 (1959); 1 WORKING PAPERS OF THE NATIONAL COMM. ON REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS 388-89 (1970) [hereinafter WORKING PAPERS]; REFORM COMM., §§ 203, 204, 1004; United States v. Polesti, 489 F.2d 822, 824 (7th Cir. 1973).

The Model Penal Code, while recognizing the conceptual basis underlying the Hand formulation, proposed an easy legislative solution to the problem. The draftsmen suggested that the interstate requirement be viewed "not as an element of the respective crimes but frankly as a basis for establishing federal jurisdiction." MODEL PENAL CODE § 5.03, Comment at 116 (Tent. Draft No. 10, 1960). In this manner, the problem is overcome by simply omitting the jurisdictional requirement from the definition of the basic crime. The jurisdictional elements are listed in separate sections. The Reform Commission accepted this proposal, and accordingly proceeded to segregate the interstate commerce requirement from the remaining elements of the federal statutory offenses. See, e.g., REFORM COMM., §§ 201, 203, 204, 1732, 1740. This principle has been followed in S.1. See, e.g., §§ 201(c), 1731(c), 1733.

spiracy prosecutions by rejecting the older analysis that required such proof.<sup>263</sup> Despite this reform in the federal courts, federal and state prosecutors still face the difficult task of proving the remaining state of mind requirements.

(i). The appropriate mens rea. Although the term "knowledge" suggests an actual awareness of attendant circumstances,<sup>264</sup> if "receiving statutes required absolute certainty, there would be few convictions, for one seldom knows anything to a certainty, and the receiver in particular is careful not to learn the truth."<sup>265</sup> Accordingly, most jurisdictions require the prosecution to show only that the defendant believed the goods were stolen, not that he knew this fact with certainty.<sup>266</sup> Even when framed in these terms, however, jurisdictions have been unable to agree whether an objective test<sup>267</sup>

263. United States v. Feola, 420 U.S. 671 (1975). The Supreme Court held "that where knowledge of the facts giving rise to federal jurisdiction is not necessary for conviction of a substantive offense embodying a mens rea requirement, such knowledge is equally irrelevant to questions of responsibility for conspiracy to commit the offense." 420 U.S. at 696. Justice Blackmun quoted the Government's response to the traffic light analogy: "The Government rather effectively exposes the fallacy of the Crimmins traffic light analogy by recasting it in terms of a jurisdictional element. The suggested example is a traffic light on an Indian reservation. Surely, one may conspire with others to disobey the light but be ignorant of the fact that it is on the reservation." 420 U.S. at 690 n.24.

In his opinion for the majority, Justice Blackmun emphasized that the first issue is the proper characterization of the element, but that once it is characterized as jurisdictional, then the requirement is irrelevant to the dual purposes of conspiracy theory: (1) the "protection of society from the dangers of concerted criminal activity," and (2) the initiation of "preventive action" against the commission of crimes that are still in a relatively inchoate stage. 420 U.S. at 693-94. Accordingly, Justice Blackmun concluded that, "[g]iven the level of criminal intent necessary to sustain conviction for the substantive offense, the act of agreement to commit the crime is no less opprobrious and no less dangerous because of the absence of knowledge of a fact unnecessary to the formation of criminal intent." 420 U.S. at 693.

264. "A person acts knowingly with respect to a material element of an offense when:

(1) if the element involves the nature of his conduct or the attendant circumstances, he is aware that his conduct is of that nature or that such circumstances exist . . . ." MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.02(b) (Proposed Official Draft, 1962) (emphasis added). Note that the Model Penal Code modifies its scienter requirement in receipt of stolen property cases. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 223.6(1) (Proposed Official Draft, 1962) ("or believing that [the property] has probably been stolen"). Courts are split as to whether suspicion is sufficient. Compare Commission of Pub. Safety v. Treadway, — Mass. —, 330 N.E. 468, 472 (1975) (suspicion enough), with State v. Goldman, 65 N.J.L. 394, 398, 47 A. 641, 643 (1900) (suspicion not enough).

The receivers of stolen goods almost never "know" that they have been stolen, in the sense that they could testify to it in a court room. The business could not be so conducted, for those who sell the goods—the "fences"—must keep up a more respectable front than is generally possible for the thieves. Nor are we to suppose that the thieves will ordinarily admit their theft to the receivers: that would much impair their bargaining power.

267. A number of states have adopted legislation which expressly sets out an "ob-or subjective test<sup>268</sup> of knowledge or belief is appropriate.

Since prosecutors face difficult evidentiary burdens, some mitigation of the stringent subjective test is warranted. Indeed, the sophistication of modern fencing operations compounds the difficulties already inherent in proving even a defendant's belief as to whether his goods are stolen.<sup>269</sup> A possible response to these difficulties would be the adoption of the less confining objective test. Such a standard for criminal liability might be appropriate if it were limited to retail and wholesale dealers.

A better reform, however, would be the adoption of a recklessness standard,<sup>270</sup> under which a defendant would have a culpable state of mind if it were established that he purchased goods despite being aware of a substantial risk that the property had been stolen.<sup>271</sup> jective" standard of state of mind. Under this approach, the defendant is said to have knowledge if he knew or should have known of the goods' stolen character. See, e.g., ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-621 (Supp. 1975). A few courts have acknowledged that an objective test is appropriate. See, e.g., Seymour v. State, 246 S.2d 155 (Fla. App. 1971). This standard involves the imposition of a strict form of liability based on what a reasonable person would have known. That a reasonable person would have known is evidence that a particular person did know. But there is a world of legal difference between circumstantial evidence of a fact and actual knowledge of the fact itself. See United States v. Werner, 160 F.2d 438, 441-42 (2d Cir. 1947). Of course, in trial, this difference would tend to blur during the process of proof and the jury deliberations. The distinction, however, would have to be stated in the judge's instruction.

268. The majority of jurisdictions have adopted the subjective approach articulated by Judge Hand:

[S]ome decisions even go so far as to hold that it is enough, if a responsible man in the receiver's position would have supposed that the goods were stolen. That we think is wrong; and the better law is otherwise, although of course the fact that a reasonable man would have thought that they have been stolen, is some basis for finding that the accused actually did think so. But that the jury must find that the receiver did more than infer the theft from the circumstance has never been demanded, so far as we know; and to demand more would emasculate the statute, for the evil against which it is directed is exactly that: i.e., making a market for stolen goods which the purchaser believes to have probably been stolen.

United States v. Werner, 160 F.2d 438, 441-42 (2d Cir. 1947) (footnotes omitted). While recognizing that knowledge may be inferred from circumstances that would give a hypothetical reasonable man knowledge of the goods' stolen character, these jurisdictions nevertheless require a finding of actual knowledge on the part of the particular defendant involved. Any instruction suggesting the contrary is considered to be reversible error. See, e.g., Schaffer v. United States, 221 F.2d 17, 23 (5th Cir. 1955).

269. The difficulties involved in proving knowledge are discussed in notes 274-328, 389-97 infra and accompanying text.

270. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 2 n.2, Appendix B.

271. The Model Penal Code defines recklessness as follows:

A person acts recklessly with respect to a material element of an offense when he consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature and purpose of the actor's conduct and the circumstances known to him, its disregard involves a gross devia-

Use of a recklessness test would permit partial reconciliation of two somewhat conflicting aims of the criminal law. First, by applying a subjective test, a recklessness standard would hold the prosecution to a higher burden of proof than would an objective test, thus limiting criminal punishment to only particularly blameworthy conduct. Second, such a standard, although not as favorable to the prosecution as an objective test, would facilitate the prosecution and conviction of fences since authorities would not be required to prove actual knowledge.

An even more sophisticated refinement would be to incorporate the recklessness standard into a continuum that would vary the prescribed punishment with the state of mind proved by the prosecution. Since a defendant who knowingly purchased stolen property is more blameworthy than a defendant who made a reckless purchase, distinctions in the penalties imposed might be appropriate.<sup>272</sup> More importantly, such a gradation of punishment would facilitate both plea bargaining and the successful prosecution of fences whose cases are taken to trial. For example, in exchange for lighter punishment, a defendant could plead guilty to a lesser fencing offense than that for which he might have been convicted had the case gone to trial. Further, in cases actually tried, jurors would no longer have to elect between convicting a fence of one offense or not convicting him at all. By permitting prosecutors to bring separate charges alleging actual knowledge and recklessness, similar to the procedure in many jurisdictions where prosecutors charge a defendant with both first-degree and second-degree murder, verdicts could more closely reflect the facts; jurors presumably would be less likely to acquit a defendant who made a reckless purchase because they would no longer have to mete out the same punishment as they would to a person who knowingly purchased stolen goods.

Thus far, however, although a few courts have used the language of a recklessness standard,<sup>273</sup> no jurisdiction has expressly modified its state of mind requirement to include a recklessness standard or tion from the standard of conduct that a law-abiding person would observe in the actor's situation.

MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.20(c) (Proposed Official Draft, 1962). Under S. 1, "[a] person's state of mind is reckless with respect to: (1) an existing circumstance if he is aware of a risk that the circumstance exists but disregards the risk . . . ." § 303(c).

272. For a more detailed discussion of gradation principles, see notes 450-67 infra and accompanying text.

273. See United States v. Brawer, 482 F.2d 117, 126-27 (2d Cir. 1973), affd., 496 F.2d 703 (2d Cir. 1974) (defendant acted with reckless disregard by consciously avoiding learning the truth).

legislated a comprehensive state of mind continuum correlating punishment and blameworthiness. Consequently, prosecutors are usually left with the unenviable task of proving defendants had an actual belief the goods purchased were stolen.

Although this situation is dismaying, legislative action can, and sometimes has, provided law enforcement officials with potentially powerful evidence-gathering techniques. Most important are various devices to encourage informants to come forward and the expanded use of electronic surveillance. For example, the use of immunity grants may provide a viable means of compelling testimony from informants, despite the widespread reluctance of thieves to testify against their fences.<sup>277</sup> At the federal level, title II of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, permits judicial, administrative, and congressional bodies to issue orders granting immunity in exchange for testimony with appropriate safeguards for individual liberties.<sup>278</sup> A grant of immunity is authorized whenever a recalcitrant witness refuses to divulge information important to the public inter-

277. "The commentators, and this Court on several occasions, have characterized immunity statutes as essential to the effective enforcement of various criminal statutes. As Mr. Justice Frankfurter observed, . . . such statutes have 'become part of our constitutional fabric.'" Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 447 (1972) (citations and footnotes omitted). See 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 2281 (3d ed. 1940).

est and claims his privilege against self-incrimination.<sup>279</sup> Once immunity has been granted, the witness is required by law to disclose whatever information is requested, but none of his testimony may be used directly or indirectly against him in a subsequent criminal prosecution.<sup>280</sup> This so-called use immunity of the federal statute is an effective investigative technique, for a witness testifying under it has a strong incentive to provide the prosecution with as much information as possible. In effect, the more information a witness provides under the compulsion of an order to testify, the more difficult it is for the prosecution to gather independently, and to show it gathered independently, evidence to convict the witness of the underlying crime.<sup>281</sup> Failure to comply with the order to testify is punishable as contempt, subjecting the witness to a potentially prolonged period of imprisonment,<sup>282</sup> and a grant of immunity does not protect 279. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 6002, 6003, 6004, 6005 (Supp. 1975).

280. 18 U.S.C.A. § 6002 (Supp. 1975). The negative implication of section 6002 is that the witness's testimony can be used against him in a civil suit. See United States v. Cappelto, 502 F.2d 1351, 1359 (7th Cir. 1974). For a detailed discussion of civil remedies in the fencing context, see notes 499-544 infra and accompanying text. Civil consequences were encompassed under the former standard transaction immunity language ("penalty or forfeiture"). See, e.g., Lee v. Civil Aeronautics Bd., 225 F.2d 950 (D.C. Cir. 1955).

281. In a criminal proceeding brought against such a witness, the prosecution may only utilize evidence that has been obtained independently of the subject's testimony. See note 280 supra and accompanying text. Generally, a use-immunized witness is entitled to a copy of the immunized testimony. In re Minkoff, 349 F. Supp. 154 (D.R.I. 1972). Access may also be had to the minutes of an indicting grand jury. United States v. Dornau, 356 F. Supp. 1091 (S.D.N.Y. 1973). The prosecution's burden to show no subsequent use may not be met with conclusionary assertions. United States v. Seiffert, 463 F.2d 1089 (5th Cir. 1972). Proof must be offered. United States v. Seiffert, 357 F. Supp. 801 (S.D. Tex. 1973). Mere exposure to a prosecutor has been held to warrant dismissal of an indictment. See United States v. McDaniel, 482 F.2d 305 (8th Cir. 1973); United States v. Dornau, 359 F. Supp. 684 (S.D.N.Y. 1973). This seems to go too far since other prosecutors who had not been exposed to the testimony could handle untainted evidence. Obviously, the government's burden is heavy, but it is not insuperable. See WATERGATE: SPECIAL PROSECUTION FORCE REPORT 208 (1975) (filing of "taint" papers in reference to John Dean).

282. Federal legislation provides that a noncomplying witness may be confined for a period not to exceed 18 months. 28 U.S.C. § 1826. The witness may obtain his release at any time by purging himself of his contempt. His confinement may be renewed if he is subsequently called upon to testify, for example, before a new grand jury, and he again refuses to comply. See Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364 (1966) (dicta); In re Grand Jury Subpoena of Alphonse Persico, 522 F.2d 41 (2d Cir. 1975). At least one federal court, however, has expressed dicta to the effect that, at some point, prolonged confinement may violate a person's due process rights. See United States v. Doe, 405 F.2d 436 (2d Cir. 1968). New Jersey, too, has upheld prolonged confinement (four years), but has recognized that the facts of each case must determine its resolution. Catena v. Seidl, 65 N.J. 257, 262, 321 A.2d 225, 228 (1974) stated: "The legal justification for commitment for civil contempt is to secure compliance. Once it appears that the commitment has lost its coercive power, the legal justification for it ends and further confinement cannot be tolerated." The test used by the court to determine whether confinement should end was whether there a witness from prosecution for perjury.<sup>283</sup>

Immunity grants are also routinely authorized by state legislation.<sup>284</sup> Nevertheless, despite the Supreme Court's decision in Kastigar v. United States,<sup>285</sup> which held that the federal "use immunity" statute is coextensive with the scope of the fifth amendment's privilege against self-incrimination,<sup>286</sup> most state legislation only authorizes prosecutors to grant witnesses "transaction immunity," or protection from prosecution for any crime to which the compelled testimony relates.<sup>287</sup> Transaction immunity offers considerably broader protection than that required by the fifth amendment privilege and is less effective than use immunity as an investigative tool. Transaction immunity provides no inducement to the witness to provide maximum information since it acts as an "immunity bath": A witness is always immune from prosecution for the underlying offense once he testifies, regardless of how much useful evidence he provides.<sup>288</sup> Further, a grant of transaction immunity in a fencing investigation may was "no substantial likelihood" that the witness would testify. 65 N.J. at 262, 321 A.2d at 228. For subsequent developments in Catena see N.Y. Times, Aug. 20, 1975, at 1, col. 5 (late city ed.) (Gerardo Catena ordered released from confinement for civil contempt) and 17 CRIM. L. RPTR. 2497 (1975).

283. See 18 U.S.C.A. § 6002 (Supp. 1975). Until recently, the perjury sanction has been of limited effectiveness because of the traditional difficulties involved in proving a violation. See Blakey, supra note 148, in TASK FORCE REPORT, ORGANIZED CRIME 88-91. This problem has been ameliorated by the passage of legislation that requires only "proof that the defendant while under oath made irreconcilably contradictory declarations material to the point in question . . ." 18 U.S.C.A. § 1623 (Supp. 1975). The cases also make it clear that the immunity attaches only to truthful testimony; untruthful responses may be used against the witness, for example, to cross-examine and incriminate him under another charge. See, e.g., United States v. Tramunti, 500 F.2d 1334 (2d Cir. 1974).

284. A comprehensive list of state immunity legislation is provided in 8 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 2281, at 495 n.11. Thirty three states now provide for immunity in the fencing area. THE NATIONAL ASSN. OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL, ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL LEGISLATION 133-41 (1974).

287. See, e.g., CAL. PENAL CODE § 1324 (West 1972). Only three states currently provide for the granting of "use immunity." LA. REV. STAT. ANN. § 15.468 (1973); N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2 A. 81-17.3 (1968); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2945.44 (Page 1975). The New Jersey approach has been sustained as constitutional. See Zicarelli v. New Jersey State Commn. of Investigation, 406 U.S. 472 (1972).

288. Once a witness has been granted transactional immunity, his cooperation is by no means assured. See, e.g., Giancana v. United States, 352 F.2d 921 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 959 (1965). The reluctant witness may provide the government with some evidence, but not enough to sustain a conviction. He is, of course, subject to the contempt sanction, but it is effective only if the government can establish that he is still withholding information. For a discussion of how some of those who attended the infamous Appalachian gathering handled subsequent immunity grants through evasive answers, see United States v. Bufalino, 285 F.2d 408, 418 n.27 (2d Cir. 1960).

require a decision to forego prosecuting a thief and instead to convict a fence, a decision many law enforcement agencies appear reluctant to make.<sup>289</sup> No doubt this aversion reflects outmoded priorities that should be changed,<sup>290</sup> but since police often can independently gather sufficient evidence to prosecute thieves successfully, the dilemma could be eliminated altogether by enacting legislation authorizing the granting of "use immunity,"<sup>291</sup> as is provided by Section 12(b) of the Model Act.<sup>292</sup>

Whether testimony elicited through the use of an immunity grant can provide direct evidence establishing a fence's culpable state of mind depends upon the thief's ability to give a detailed account of his transactions with the fence. Sometimes thieves do not know the identity of their fences,<sup>293</sup> but this obstacle can be overcome by a series of immunity grants used to climb the chain of command of sophisticated fencing operations. Inevitably, even a well-insulated master fence can be convicted.<sup>294</sup>

Regardless of their potential as investigative tools, the effectiveness of immunity grants is considerably hampered in many jurisdictions by courts suspicious of the credibility of testimony favorable to the prosecution given by a witness with an obvious interest in escaping punishment.<sup>295</sup> These courts have created the so-called cor-

289. The reluctance of law enforcement authorities to make this policy decision is suggested by the widespread practice of tolerating fencing operations in exchange for information concerning theft activity. See note 61 supra and accompanying text. This may be because "the most commonly used measure of police performance is the rate at which crimes are 'cleared' by arrest." C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 28. Given the importance of clearance by arrest statistics, the police may not be inclined to grant a thief immunity, since the fence who might be convicted is usually capable of producing a greater number of theft arrests.

294. In organized crime cases, however, witnesses may be completely intimidated by the threat of physical injury. See note 148 supra. Fear of "underworld reprisals," however, will not warrant refusal to testify before a grand jury. See Latona v. United States, 449 F.2d 121 (8th Cir. 1971). On the federal level this situation has been somewhat ameliorated by provisions of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 that were designed to afford maximum protective cover to potential witnesses. 18 U.S.C. §§ 6001-005 (1970) and 28 U.S.C. § 1826 (1970). The program is administered by the United States Marshall Service. The number of witnesses under protection runs to approximately 100 per day. The "increasing number of major crime figures who are volunteering to serve as witnesses is an indication of the success of this program." Hearings Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Appropriations, 93 Cong., 1st Sess. 1072 (1973). See How Business Shelters Witnesses from the Mob, NATION'S BUSINESS, August, 1973, at 20.

roboration rule that requires either a cautionary jury instruction calling for care in evaluating such testimony or a directed verdict of acquittal whenever the testimony of an accomplice has not been corroborated.<sup>296</sup> Although initially conceived as "merely . . . a [discretionary] counsel of caution given by the judge to the jury,"<sup>297</sup> the practice has evolved into a strict rule of law in some jurisdictions.<sup>298</sup> Fortunately for prosecutors, however, a number of jurisdictions have narrowly circumscribed application of the corroboration rule by technically limiting the term "accomplice" to those criminals subject to indictment for the same crime with which the defendant is charged. In some receiving cases, this reasoning continues, the corroboration rule is not applicable since a thief is not a receiver's accomplice; he has instead technically committed a separate offense of theft and therefore is not subject to indictment for the crime of receiving. According to other courts, however, this view is patently superficial since the conduct of both criminals is necessary for successful commission of the theft and the receiving, and the testifying witness still has an interest in escaping punishment by providing testimony favorable to the prosecution.<sup>299</sup> Regardless of which approach is taken, the ultimate result on the evidentiary issue is frequently the same, however, because even those jurisdictions that narrowly define "accomplice" recognize an exception and apply the corroboration rule whenever there has been a prior relationship between the fence and the thief.<sup>300</sup> Given the number of fences who have regular contacts with thieves and the high volume of the "steal-to-order" business,<sup>301</sup> the corroboration doctrine is obviously a potential problem in the prosecution of all large-scale fencing activity.<sup>302</sup>

296. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 691; 7 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 2056. An early discussion of this problem in the fencing context is provided in J. HALL, supra note 5, at 176-85. Massachusetts has gone one step further. Accomplice testimony need not be corroborated. Commonwealth v. French, 357 Mass. 356, 395 (1970). But by statute, MASS. ANN. LAWS ch. 233, § 201 (1970), immunized testimony must be. See Commonwealth v. DeBrosky. — Mass. —, 297 N.E. 2d 496 (1973).

302. More than theft or receiving is involved. If there is a prior relationship, it is possible that the receiver is guilty of conspiracy to steal and receiving rather than theft or receiving. See State v. VanderLave, 47 N.J. Super. 483, 487, 136 A.2d 296, 298 (1957), affd., 27 N.J. 313, 142 A.2d 609 (1958), where the court said:

The conspiratorial role of appellant, alleged and proven by the State, transcended the function of a receiver of stolen goods, even one with foreknowledge

These difficulties could be avoided if courts and legislatures would recognize that, although an accomplice's testimony is often deserving of skeptical treatment, the considerations that gave rise to the corroboration rule no longer carry much force,<sup>303</sup> and that credibility should be an issue ultimately left to the jury.<sup>304</sup> The federal courts, for example, have correctly decided that an absolute bar against convictions based upon an accomplice's uncorroborated testimony is inappropriate since the defendant's rights are adequately protected by the required cautionary instruction.<sup>305</sup> Similar action by state legislatures would facilitate the conviction of fences by removing a major obstacle to the prosecution's use of insiders to establish the requisite state of mind.<sup>306</sup> Fencing reform legislation that abolishes the corroboration rule to the extent that it requires a directed verdict of acquittal would obviate the need for the judiciary to draw what are solely formal distinctions. But if such reform legislation is to be effective, it must not preserve the directed verdict where there has been a prior conspiracy or some participation by the receiver in the larceny.<sup>307</sup> Such an exception is a potentially embarrassing loophole of the intended theft. The conspiracy plan here was one of continuity; the primary thief and the appellant agreed upon details of the unlawful design and its modus operandi; it is not an exaggeration to say that the proof was susceptible of a finding that appellant had participated in supervising the detail, particularly the timing, of certain larcenies, and showed a selectivity in pointing out the type and quantity of material which should be stolen for his use, complaining at one time that drums of stolen material were not filled to his liking . . . and in other respects the conspirators were shown to have been en rapport, not in the naked buy and sell relationship of a thief and his receiver, but in the clandestine and consultative concert of planned action which is the hallmark of the criminal conspiracy.

303. The doctrine originated at a time when defendants were not permitted to take the stand and the accomplice's testimony was admitted as an exception to the rule of incompetence. See 7 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 2057.

304. See id. § 2056. The Supreme Court has suggested that it is in basic agreement with this position. See Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293, 303-04 (1966); On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747, 757-58 (1952).

305. In the federal courts, a typical jury instruction simply warns the jury that "such testimony is always to be received with caution and weighed with great care." E. DEVITT & C. BLACKMAR, FEDERAL JURY PRACTICE INSTRUCTIONS § 12.04, at 256 (2d ed. 1970). The government may also obtain, however, an instruction that the jury is not to evaluate informant testimony in terms of their approval of this use and that the government "must take the witnesses to the transactions as they are," particularly in conspiracy cases. United States v. Corallo, 413 F.2d 1306, 1322 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 958 (1969).

306. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 5b, Appendix B.

307. New York, for example, has purportedly eliminated the corroboration rule, but the legislation has had a limited impact in enhancing the government's ability to deal with major fences because of the exception applicable where the receiver has "participated in the larceny." N.Y. PENAL LAW § 165.65 (McKinney Supp. 1974). Cf. People v. Valinoti, 26 N.Y.2d 553, 260 N.E.2d 541, 311 N.Y.S.2d 910 (1970). The New York corroboration rule had been established in People v. Kupperschmidt, 237 N.Y. 463, 143 N.9.2d 256 (1924) (thief held accomplice of receiver for corroboration purposes). See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 181-85. As a result of business pressure, the Kupperschmidt decision was legislatively set aside. Id. at 184-85. Ironically, however, the corroboration rule still applies in theft prosecutions, so that the reversal has had impact on a limited class of receivers; those who may be accomplices of the thieves are still protected by the corroboration rule. THE N.Y. COMM. ON THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE, THIRD SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT 16 (1937) aptly characterized the general rule as "a refuge of organized crime [that] protects the principles [sic] in racketeering cases." Their recommendation that the general rule be abolished, however, was not adopted, and it remains today an unwarranted obstacle in the fencing area whenever prearranged theft or a continuous relationship is present.

since it ironically protects sophisticated receivers who organize thefts or who are otherwise involved in the larceny.<sup>308</sup>

308. "[T]he moment that the fence enters into the actual conspiracy to steal the property, thereby becoming legally culpable for the larceny itself . . . the People can only obtain a conviction against the fence for the larceny or possession of the stolen property if there is corroborative evidence." Hearings on Fencing 6. When characterized in these terms, it is apparent that many fences do participate in the larceny process. See notes 139-140, 143-46 supra and accompanying text. In the case of a master fence who arranges the actual theft, the corroboration rule—or the exception in conspiracy cases—adds another layer of insulation to his protective network. See notes 143, 146-49 supra and accompanying text.

It must be stressed, however, that legislative reform should not shelter from credibility attack the testimony of either accomplices or informants. Such an attack is properly part of the adversary process.

Finally, it should be emphasized that a thief generally cannot be convicted for receiving the fruits of his own theft. Consequently, where a relationship exists between the "thief" and the "receiver," it is sometimes necessary to indict in the alternative, permitting the jury to convict for theft or receipt, but not both. See United States v. Gaddis, 18 CRIM. L. RPTR. 3079, 3081 (Sup. Ct. 3-3-76).

310. Electronic surveillance has raised first, fourth, fifth, and sixth amendment constitutional questions. See Spritzer, Electronic Surveillance by Leave of the Magistrate: The Case in Opposition, 118 U. PA. L. REV. 169 (1969); Schwartz, The Legitimation of Electronic Eavesdropping: The Politics of "Law and Order," 67 MICH. L. REV. 455 (1969). Prior to the enactment of Title III (see notes 311-23 infra and accompanying text), it was felt by some that these constitutional problems could be largely overcome. A per se fifth amendment argument based on the privilege against self-incrimination had been rejected in 1928 in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), and this aspect of Olmstead has not been overruled. In addition, an analogous argument, based on using an informant rather than a wiretap, was held to be without merit in Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966). A sixth amendment violation could occur only if electronic surveillance were used during a post-indictment period, *Massiah v. Such evidence is completely reliable so there is little danger of a credibility attack at trial.<sup>319</sup> Numerous prosecutions have been facilitated in this manner,<sup>320</sup> and it is apparent that

318. The federal legislation, however, authorizes an interception order in fencing investigations only when violations of 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 659, 2314, and 2315 are involved. See 18 U.S.C.A. § 2516 (Supp. 1975). Authorization should be extended to cover other federal fencing violations. See note 185 supra. There is also a certain unfortunate lack of clarity in the current draft of S.1. Section 3101(b) does not explicitly authorize state surveillance in the theft and fencing area, and its general language reads "crime of violence." See S.1, § 111. The legislative history indicates that this phrase is used "in the broad sense as comprehending the present language" of 18 U.S.C. § 2516 ("dangerous . . . to . . . property"). SENATE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY, 93D CONG., 2D SESS., 3 REPORT ON CRIMINAL JUSTICE CODIFICATION, REVISION AND REFORM ACT OF 1974, at 942 (Comm. Print 1974) [hereinafter S.1 REPORT]. Obviously, there is no intent to eliminate this area of investigation from the use of state surveillance, but it might have been hoped that this intent could have been more clearly expressed.

319. The only possible credibility argument would concern whether the recording has been tampered with in any way. Careful police enforcement procedures and the use of a seal would completely obviate this defense. See 18 U.S.C. § 2518(8)(a) (1970); S. REP. 320. The following case study demonstrates the effectiveness of such techniques in the fencing context:

if this method were widely implemented professional fences would run a substantially higher risk of conviction.

In addition to establishing the requisite state of mind, successful electronic surveillance can also help establish "receipt," can locate and identify other stolen property,<sup>321</sup> and can provide authorities

Case Study
Kings County, New York—Forgery, Criminal Possession of Forged Documents, Grand Larceny, Criminal Possession of Stolen Property, Criminal Usury

Background

This was a "target investigation," begun in 1971, directed against a high level member of an organized crime "family" operating in Brooklyn. Physical surveillance and two gambling wiretaps on public telephones in a local bar which the target's associates frequented had pinpointed the target's headquarters as the trailer office of a nearby business.

Physical surveillance of the trailer was conducted for several months. During this time, a pattern was established for meetings in the trailer between the target and other persons with criminal histories. During this period of observation, it was also learned that the FBI was engaged in an independent investigation of the gambling activities of several of the target's associates. Following a meeting between the District Attorney and FBI agents, it was decided to proceed with a joint investigation.

At this time, the FBI produced an informant who had personally overheard criminal conversations in the trailer and who described a stolen car racket, using forged documents, which was being conducted there. Orders were then sought to place wiretaps on the three telephones in the trailer and to place a "bug" within the trailer itself.

The three wiretaps were installed on the day that the orders were signed. It took a week, however, to install the bug, as the trailer was inside the lot, surrounded by an eight foot high cyclone fence and guarded by a watch dog.

The wiretaps were initially approved for thirty days, but one extension on each was granted, allowing each to run for sixty days. The order on the bug was extended three times, giving it an authorized operational period of 120 days. During this period, conversations apparently relating to a variety of criminal activity, including bribery, were overheard.

Results

The investigation ultimately resulted in the arrest of seventy-one individuals, including the target of the original investigation and several other alleged members of the same organized crime family. Of this number, thirty-seven pleaded guilty to minor charges and were given $100 fines. Of the thirty-four persons indicted, three have been convicted of perjury or criminal contempt and thirty-one cases are pending.

Evaluation

This is an excellent example of the sophisticated use of electronic surveillance by law enforcement agencies to combat organized crime. It points out the value of federal-state agency cooperation, the interplay between electronic and non-electronic surveillance techniques, and the usefulness of an investigation targeted against a specific organized crime figure, with the availability of reliable informants close to the target.

NATL. COMM. FOR THE REVIEW OF FED. AND STATE LAWS RELATING TO WIRETAPPING AND ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE, STAFF STUDIES AND SURVEY 277-78 (1976). Finally, the use of electronic surveillance recently led to the successful prosecution of Jack Mace, one of New York's most sophisticated fencing operators. See United States v. Tortorello, 480 F.2d 764, 770-71, 773-76 (2d Cir. 1973); V. TERESA, supra note 29, at 258-89. By intercepting conversations and tapping telephones at Mace's place of business, the "Rio Coin Shop," investigators were able to secure his conviction, as well as the convictions of several major organized crime figures.

with evidence and leverage to induce the testimony of potential witnesses. For example, the apparently legitimate businessman who initially denies his association with a major fence may be more willing to cooperate once he has been confronted with a tape recording of his self-incriminating remarks.<sup>322</sup> At this point, the stage is set for granting the businessman immunity in exchange for testimony that may help trace the complex redistribution system of a master fence.

Yet despite its demonstrated success, electronic surveillance has rarely been used in the investigation of fencing cases. Only twenty-three jurisdictions have enacted electronic surveillance statutes pursuant to title III authorization,<sup>323</sup> and of the 701 orders authorizing wiretapping issued in 1975, only thirteen were issued to detect suspected possession of stolen property.<sup>324</sup> Instead, most so-called intercept orders concern probable gambling and narcotics violations.<sup>325</sup> Thus, because of both legislative omission or investigative oversight, law enforcement authorities generally have failed to take advantage of the most effective evidence-gathering device available to combat large-scale fencing activity.<sup>326</sup>

Nevertheless, even if this were not the case, it must be acknowledged that electronic surveillance is no panacea for existing deficiencies in evidence-gathering techniques. Electronic devices are particularly difficult to use where, for instance, a master fence does not operate from a fixed place of business but instead conducts his transactions from randomly selected telephone booths.<sup>327</sup> Such a receiver is vulnerable only if his purchaser's telephone has been tapped or if for some reason his buyer decides to cooperate with police. In addition, as with search warrants, logistical considerations may delay or completely preclude a successful wire,<sup>328</sup> and once installed, reception is often marred by mechanical difficulties or background noises. These problems, combined with the demonstrated reluctance of legislators and law enforcement authorities to use electronic surveillance, have caused investigators and prosecutors to attempt the more difficult task of proving the requisite state of mind by circumstantial, rather than by direct, evidence.

(iii). The use of circumstantial evidence to establish mens rea. A prosecutor who cannot present direct testimony establishing guilty knowledge must instead recreate circumstances surrounding the fence's receipt of stolen property from which a jury might infer the requisite mens rea.<sup>329</sup> Some courts have held that evidence establishing that the defendant purchased goods at extremely low prices, removed identification marks, or attempted to conceal the merchandise upon receipt, is sufficient to support a finding that the defendant knew the goods were stolen.<sup>330</sup> In order to show that the defendant's conduct was not the product of innocent mistake, successful prosecutors often supplement this circumstantial evidence with proof that the defendant has acted similarly in other transactions or has previously been convicted of receiving.<sup>331</sup>

327. It is questionable that many master fences take such extraordinary precautions. See generally DEPT. OF JUSTICE RELEASES, supra note 321, at 13. Certainly, the professional fence who is also involved in master fencing may tend to use the phone at his place of business. This practice led to the downfall of one of New York City's most sophisticated fences. See note 320 supra. On the other hand, the master fence's work tends to be episodic rather than regular, in contrast to the activities of those engaged in gambling and narcotics transactions. This sharply curtails the opportunities to establish the probable cause necessary to obtain a court order. Indeed, the best hope of getting at the master fence through wire surveillance lies in overhearing his calls to a professional fence, when the professional needs the superior resources and contacts of the master.

Evidence of this nature is admissible because it tends to establish intent by negating the possibility of an innocent mistake or by demonstrating the existence of an on-going plan. Jurisdictional rules vary concerning whether the same type of property must have been involved, whether the goods must have been received from the same thief, and the requisite

Persuasive circumstantial evidence establishing the guilty knowledge of the most sophisticated fences, however, is usually not available. Instead, prosecutors must attempt to convict professional receivers masquerading as legitimate businessmen by introducing somewhat less powerful evidence of conduct by the defendant that deviates from normal business practices. By skillfully comparing a fence's conduct with normal business practices, prosecutors may be able to establish the requisite mens rea on the basis of such circumstantial evidence as proof of poor bookkeeping procedures, unrecorded secret transactions, the failure to retain itemized receipts, unusual methods of payment, or the failure of the accused receiver to make proper inquiry concerning the source of his seller's goods.<sup>332</sup> sufficiency of the link between the present offense and the prior illegal transactions sought to be offered into evidence. See Hearings on Criminal Laws 550. Hall argues that rules requiring delivery by the same thief are inappropriate, since "the larger the business done, the greater are the probabilities that different thieves have been dealt with, that the property was stolen from different places and persons, and hence, that the receiving in question was with criminal knowledge." J. HALL, supra note 5, at 187. Wigmore states that it is usually "necessary and sufficient to show (a) former receipt and possession (and, perhaps, under suspicious circumstances) (b) of goods similar as to the person bringing them or as to their kind or otherwise." 2 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 324, at 228.

Evidence of prior criminal transactions, because of its highly prejudicial nature, may only be introduced if "the evidence is substantially relevant for some other purpose than to show a probability that [the accused] committed the crime on trial because he is a man of criminal character." MCCORMICK'S HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE § 190, at 447 (E. Cleary ed. 1972) (footnote omitted) [hereinafter MCCORMICK]. Accordingly, such evidence may be admitted for purposes of demonstrating the existence of a plan or for establishing that receipt was not without guilty knowledge. Id. at 448-50. The Association of Grand Jurors of New York County has summarized these characteristics as follows:

When a commodity is offered for sale to a business-wise merchant, firm or corporation it is reasonable to presume that he or it knows or will ascertain, before buying, certain things. These are:

1. The market value of the commodity.
2. The cause for its price being disproportionately low.
3. That certain identification marks usually appearing on the article or its container have not been removed or altered.
4. That the seller has the legal right to sell and conforms to the customs of the trade in so doing.
5. That the seller represents a firm known to the trade or is personally known to the buyer.
6. That the seller has a permanent address.
7. If the seller is a stranger to the buyer that he can furnish trade and other reliable references as to his good standing.
8. That nothing connected with the seller or his goods indicates fraud.

PRISON COMM. OF THE ASSN. OF GRAND JURORS OF NEW YORK COUNTY, CRIMINAL RECEIVERS IN THE UNITED STATES 69-70 (1928).

In this way, prosecutors can turn a fence's legitimate facade into a weapon against him.

Yet the availability of such circumstantial evidence does not guarantee conviction, for two accepted judicial doctrines restrict its use and thus diminish its potency. First, most states restrict a trial judge's right to comment on the evidence; consequently, jurors are often unable to draw inferences of guilty knowledge they would otherwise consider if the judge could share his expertise with them.<sup>333</sup> Second, the quantum of incriminating circumstantial evidence deemed necessary to establish an element of a crime beyond a reasonable doubt is often high: In "the absence of direct evidence on a controverted issue, almost all jurisdictions require the prosecution to prove that all the circumstances are consistent with guilt and inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of innocence."<sup>334</sup> Although this rule is not applied in the federal courts,<sup>335</sup> it has had a profound impact at the state level because it "imposes an unjustifiably heavier burden on the state than does the reasonable doubt standard."<sup>336</sup>

The Association of Grand Jurors also took notice of the additional recommendations of experts in the fencing area:

"Mr Leon Hoage of the New York office of the Holmes Electric Protection Company . . . holds that an alleged Fence should be required to explain to the jury acts or omissions, such as the following:

1. Failure to keep bona fide books of account in connection with a business enterprise.
2. Neglect of dealer to keep bills received with goods delivered to him, for a reasonable period, such as two years.
3. Omission of the dealer to demand and keep as bills the receipts given in his commercial transactions.
4. Lack of itemized bills of job lots of standard goods purchased, apart from the balance of the items.
5. Inability or unwillingness of the possessor of goods ostensibly covered by a bill of sale from a reputable firm, to communicate with the firm, at the time the purchase is made, to corroborate the sale.
6. Presentation of a bill of sale, the billhead of which gives the name and address of a non-existent firm.
7. Purchase of valuable merchandise from a push cart, or similarly unreliable vendor."

333. See A.B.A. PROJECT ON MINIMUM STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, STANDARDS RELATING TO TRIAL BY JURY 121-22 (1968) [hereinafter TRIAL BY JURY]. Although the rule against commentary grew out of an early American distrust of judicial power, Wigmore has maintained "[t]hat the preservation of the pristine power of the Court to comment and advise the jury is essential to the efficient working of the jury system, and that the deprivation of that power is highly injurious." 9 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 2551a, at 509. For a detailed list of authorities who have advocated such restoration, see id. at 512 and TRIAL BY JURY 122-24. The power to comment must be seen in light of the possible decline in the ability of average jurors to understand complex fact situations.

336. Note, supra note 334, at 551.

Courts and legislatures recognizing the difficulties inherent in using primarily circumstantial evidence to establish knowledge have attempted to facilitate convictions by developing several common-law and statutory presumptions favorable to the prosecution.<sup>337</sup> A presumption (permissible inference) in the criminal law reflects a determination that a certain set of circumstances should be given special treatment because it tends to establish a particular element of the crime, although such an inference might not otherwise have been drawn by the trier of fact.<sup>338</sup> In receiving cases, the most important presumption is that of guilty knowledge, which is triggered by proof of the defendant's unexplained recent possession of stolen property: "Possession of the fruits of crime, recently after its commission, justifies the inference that the possession is guilty possession, and though only prima facie evidence of guilt, may be of controlling weight unless explained by the circumstances or accounted for in some way consistent with innocence."<sup>339</sup> Originally a common-law rule designed to aid the prosecution in larceny cases,<sup>340</sup> the so-called recent possession doctrine has been codified in several

For an excellent discussion of the presumptions contained in recent federal legislative proposals directed toward organized crime, see Note, Presumptions and Due Process: Congress Attacks Organized Crime, 68 Nw. L. Rev. 961 (1974).

Traditionally, these rules have been called presumptions, and that term will be used here. Nevertheless, it might be more accurate and less confusing in criminal cases to call them permissible inferences, and to distinguish them sharply from what is best described as a mandatory or irrebuttable presumption. A permissible inference arises when A is thought normally to infer B. Prove A, and absent other proof, B may be inferred and is thus proven. A mandatory presumption arises when A is treated as proof of B, and, when A is proven, B must be found absent other proof. An irrebuttable presumption arises when A is treated as the equivalent of B, and the contrary may not be shown.

WORKING PAPERS 936, observes: "Use of the procedural device is appropriate when Congress [or the state legislature] on the basis of special expertise and amassed empirical evidence decides that certain facts are strong evidence of a crime and that these facts should be given proof significance to assist the government in prosecuting the crime." The best way to conceptualize a presumption is to see that by creating a presumption the law is acting as an expert witness, because it is providing the jurors with the basis for drawing an inference that is not necessarily compelled from the ordinary experiences of their everyday lives. See notes 366-68 infra and accompanying text. Since the law is injecting its own expertise into the fact-finding determination, any judicial or legislative presumption must comport with due process standards. Nevertheless, despite seemingly clear language in the Georgia opinion that suggests that the recent possession rule does not apply to receiving cases, the law in Georgia still seems confused. See Comment, Criminal Law—Receiving Stolen Goods—No Presumption in Recent Possession, 22 MERCER L. REV. 481 (1971).

The Colorado decision, however, is incorrectly cited, and the Montana case seemed to turn on a matter of statutory interpretation.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court has rejected the presumption's applicability in receiving cases because of its purported irrationality. See Commonwealth v. Owens, 441 Pa. 318, 271 A.2d 230 (1970). The Pennsylvania decision, however, may be limited to its facts. See Note, Criminal Law—Presumption That Unexplained Possession of Recently Stolen Goods Is Sufficient Evidence of Guilt of Receiving Stolen Goods Held Unconstitutional, 75 DICKINSON L. CODES ANN. § 94.2721 (1969) (presumption upon purchase from a minor, unless sold at fixed place of business); N.M. STAT. ANN. § 40A.16.11 (1972) (possession of other stolen property; purchase at price far below reasonable value; dealers presumed to know reasonable market value); N.Y. PENAL LAW § 165.55 (1975) (presumption upon pawnbroker's or dealer's failure to make reasonable inquiry); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 21, § 1713 (Supp. 1975) (presumption from failure to make reasonable inquiry).

California's statute creating a presumption upon the purchase of property from a minor not operating at a fixed place of business was declared unconstitutional in People v. Stevenson, 58 Cal. 2d 794, 376 P.2d 297, 26 Cal. Rptr. 297 (1962). A similar, but more narrow, statutory presumption has recently been repealed by the Arizona legislature. See Ariz. Laws of 1974, ch. 144, § 2.

sion doctrine, however, these criminal-law presumptions are strictly statutory creations that, despite their potential utility, have not been enacted in most jurisdictions.<sup>345</sup>

Considerable confusion has long surrounded the role of the recent possession rule and other evidentiary presumptions in a criminal case.<sup>346</sup> McCormick characterized the term "presumption" as one of "the slipperiest member[s] of the family of legal terms,"<sup>347</sup> and concluded only that "a presumption is a standardized practice, under which certain facts are held to call for uniform treatment with respect to their effect as proof of other facts."<sup>348</sup> Unfortunately, both courts and legislatures initially experienced difficulty determining what this "uniform treatment" should be.<sup>349</sup> As a result, criminal presumptions at one time had a range of legal effects: some enabled the prosecution to escape a directed verdict of acquittal; others allowed a judge to give jury instructions as to what might permissibly be inferred from the evidence; and a few effectuated a complete shift in either the burden of producing evidence or the risk of nonpersuasion as to the presumed element.<sup>350</sup>

This wide range of potential legal effects was, however, eventually narrowed as constitutional constraints were recognized to preclude the operation of a so-called "true presumption" in criminal cases.<sup>351</sup> In civil cases, a true presumption shifts the burden of pro-

346. See MCCORMICK § 346. For example, one fencing case involving the recent possession rule was erroneously decided partially because the court mistakenly assumed that the presumption was effecting a shift in the burden of proof. See Carter v. State, 82 Neb. 246, 249-50, 415 P.2d 325, 327 (1966). Carter was criticized in State v. DiRienzo, 53 N.J. 360, 375-77, 251 A.2d 99, 107-08 (1969). In another case, the recent possession rule was struck down, partially because of legislative language that clearly suggested that the burden of going forward with the evidence was being shifted upon the defendant's shoulders. See Payne v. State, 435 P.2d 424, 428 (Okla. Crim. App. 1967); note 380 infra. 351. A "true presumption," otherwise known as a mandatory presumption or a presumption of law, "has the effect of forcing the jury to find the presumed fact if the proved fact is believed and no evidence rebutting the presumed fact is produced by the opposing party. However, the presumed fact may be disputed and need not ducing evidence by requiring the jury to find the presumed fact in the absence of rebutting evidence if the proved fact is believed.<sup>352</sup> In such a situation, the effect of a true presumption is mandatory and requires a directed verdict for the proponent as to the presumed fact. In a criminal case, however, a verdict cannot be directed against the accused<sup>353</sup> because such a procedure would violate a defendant's constitutionally-protected rights to a jury trial and to have the prosecution burdened with establishing each element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. Accordingly, although the language of presumption is still frequently used in criminal cases, its actual effect has been reduced to that of what may be called a "permissible inference": The jury is instructed that it may infer the presumed fact from the fact proved, but that it is not required to do so.<sup>354</sup>

Even though the burden of proof constitutionally must remain on the prosecution,<sup>355</sup> "[t]he practical effect of the inference is to pressure the defendant into going forward with [exculpatory] evidence," since once an instruction has been given "[a] silent defendant assumes the risk that the jury will follow the natural probative force of the proven facts."<sup>356</sup> The source of this pressure is the

352. See authorities cited note 351 supra. It is true that the practical effect of instructing the jury on the inference arising from unexplained possession of recently stolen property is to shift the burden of going forward with evidence to the defendant. If the Government proves possession and nothing more, this evidence remains unexplained unless the defendant introduces evidence, since ordinarily the Government's evidence will not provide an explanation of his possession consistent with innocence.

Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 846 n.11 (1973). Note that the Court's discussion subsequently mentions that the burden of going forward may be shifted upon the defendant. Once again, this statement must be analyzed in context. The Court judge's instructions to the jury concerning the effect of a judicial or statutory inference, which permit, but do not compel, finding the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt even though jurors may not have otherwise made such a finding.<sup>357</sup> This effect is especially pronounced where a statute authorizes a jury instruction to the effect that the law regards the proved fact as "strong evidence" of the presumed fact.<sup>358</sup> At least on the state level, then, presumptions can mitigate the adverse impact on a criminal prosecutor's case that flows from the rule prohibiting judges from commenting on the evidence.<sup>359</sup>

To safeguard the rights of defendants, the Supreme Court has, over time, formulated due process guidelines for criminal law presumptions. In Tot v. United States,<sup>360</sup> the Court held a statutory presumption constitutional only if there is a reasonable connection in common experience between the basic fact and the presumed fact:

[A] statutory presumption cannot be sustained if there be no rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, if the inference of the one from proof of the other is arbitrary because of lack of connection between the two in common experience. This is not to say that a valid presumption may not be created upon a view of relation broader than that a jury might take in a specific case. But where the inference is so strained as not to have a reasonable relation to the circumstances of life as we know them, it is not competent for the legislature to create it as a rule governing the procedure of courts.<sup>361</sup>

is speaking in terms of "practical effect," and not in terms of a formal shift that would require a directed verdict in the absence of rebutting evidence. See note 346 supra. Justice Black, however, has argued that even a shift in terms of practical effect is unconstitutional. See Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398, 429-34 (1970) (Black, J., dissenting); United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 74-88 (1965) (Black, J., dissenting). See generally J. WEINSTEIN § 303[01], at 303-08.

357. For a discussion of the relationship between presumptions and jury instructions in the criminal law, see notes 346-54, 369-75, 405-12 infra and accompanying text.

358. For example, S.1 provides that "although the evidence as a whole must establish the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury may arrive at that judgment on the basis of the presumption alone, since the law regards the fact giving rise to the presumption as strong evidence of the fact presumed." Rule 25.1(4)(ii). When phrased in such terms, "the existence of a statutory presumption will probably enhance the value of a basic fact for the prosecution beyond its purely inferential significance." J. WEINSTEIN § 303[02], at 303-18. For a more detailed discussion of the potential impact of different jury instructions, see text at notes 406-12 infra.

359. In the absence of a presumption, most states do not permit the judge to comment on the evidence. See note 333 supra and accompanying text. While the presumption does not give him a right of comment, he is at least permitted to inform the jury of the inferential weight which may be attributed to certain fact patterns.

361. 319 U.S. at 467-68. In United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63 (1965), the

The Court further developed the "rational connection" test in Leary v. United States,<sup>362</sup> which held that "a criminal statutory presumption must be regarded as 'irrational' or 'arbitrary,' and hence unconstitutional, unless it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend."<sup>363</sup> In Leary, the Court overturned a statute that authorized conviction of a person for possession of marijuana with knowledge it was illegally imported and that presumed such knowledge solely on proof of unexplained possession.

When a presumption is not involved, due process, of course, requires that the prosecution establish each element of a criminal offense beyond a reasonable doubt.<sup>364</sup> One plausible reading of the Leary Court's rational-connection analysis, however, would find it constitutionally proper to submit a case to the jury when the evidence supporting the presumed fact satisfied the "more likely than not" test but was insufficient to permit a finding that the element existed beyond a reasonable doubt. At least one commentator has suggested that a less restrictive evidentiary standard for presumptions is defensible since "[t]here is ordinarily no need for a presumption where the basic fact would, under ordinary methods of utilizing circumstan-

Court applied the Tot test in upholding a statute that provided that a defendant's unexplained presence at an illegal still was sufficient evidence to authorize a conviction for carrying on "the business of a distiller." 380 U.S. at 64. The Court reasoned that the rationality test had been met, since "Congress was undoubtedly aware that manufacturers of illegal liquor are notorious for the deftness with which they locate arcane spots for plying their trade . . . [and] that strangers to the illegal business rarely penetrate the curtain of secrecy." 380 U.S. at 67-68. An identical presumption, but one that attempted to authorize a conviction for possession of an illegal still, was subsequently struck down under the Tot analysis. See United States v. Romano, 382 U.S. 136 (1965).

Significantly, although Gainey, Romano, and other Supreme Court decisions applied the rational connection test to statutory presumptions, the Court's recent decision in Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837 (1973), suggests that an identical analysis is appropriate for judicial presumptions. 412 U.S. at 845 n.8. See notes 378-84 infra and accompanying text.

362. 395 U.S. 6 (1969).

363. 395 U.S. at 36 (emphasis added). On this basis, the Court held constitutional a statutory presumption providing that unexplained possession of marihuana "shall be deemed sufficient evidence to authorize conviction" for receiving, concealing, buying, selling, or transporting the substance with knowledge of its illegal importation. 395 U.S. at 30 (quoting from 21 U.S.C. § 176a). "The Court concluded that in view of the significant possibility that any given marihuana was domestically grown and the improbability that a marihuana user would know whether his marihuana was of domestic or imported origin, the inference did not meet the standards set by Tot, Gainey, and Romano." Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 842 (1973). See 395 U.S. at 52-53.

tial evidence, result in a jury finding the presumed fact."<sup>365</sup> This argument appears to be misconceived, however, because the primary purpose of modern presumptions is not to lower the standard of proof but only to facilitate the fact-finding process by providing jurors with information concerning a possible relationship between the fact proved and the presumed fact that may be beyond their common experience.<sup>366</sup> By creating a presumption, the legislature, in effect, serves as an expert witness offering testimony through the judge's instructions regarding the evidentiary significance of a particular fact pattern.<sup>367</sup> There is no reason for affording this particular type of "expert testimony" special treatment by subjecting it to a different standard simply because it is a legislative or judicial presumption. Indeed, although Leary and subsequent cases have not directly decided whether a presumption must satisfy the reasonable doubt standard, one commentator has argued that the Court has in fact adopted that evidentiary standard.<sup>368</sup>

365. J. WEINSTEIN § 303[02], at 303-12. "Requiring a lesser quantum of evidence is, of course, the prime reason for resorting to presumptions." Id.

366. Legislatures are "permitted to create presumptions based, not only upon inferences that might naturally be derived from the facts, but also upon information that will never be given to the jury." MCCORMICK 816. "[Criminal] presumptions are based on empirical evidence that may be outside the expected knowledge of the average juror . . ." S.1 REPORT 1094. See note 338 supra and accompanying text. "Unless the jurors are told of the value of the basic facts, which by hypothesis is not readily available to them, they may acquit when conviction is justified." WORKING PAPERS 21. Nevertheless, since a presumption in the criminal law context operates only as a permissive inference, notes 351-54 supra and accompanying text, it often serves as an evidentiary device that "merely formalizes a natural inference which one might expect reasonable jurors to draw on their own." S.1 REPORT 1904. See C. TORCIA, supra note 338, § 90; 9 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 2491, at 288. For this reason, S.1 proposes the use of stronger jury instructions for statutory presumptions that embody the special expertise of the law. WORKING PAPERS 20-21, 24-25. See notes 406-12 infra and accompanying text.

367. Thus "[i]n United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63 (1965), the Court suggested that in empirical matters 'not within specialized judicial competence or completely commonplace, significant weight should be accorded the capacity of Congress to amass the stuff of actual experience and cull conclusions from it.' 380 U.S. at 67." WORKING PAPERS 20 n.52. See notes 338, 366 supra.

368. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 149. See J. WEINSTEIN § 303[02], at 303-12 to 303-13. Although the Supreme Court, in Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398 (1970), did not expressly adopt the beyond a reasonable doubt standard, commentators have suggested that "the Court's frequent reference to that standard in Turner, coupled with its decision in In re Winship [397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970)] recognizing that such a measure of proof is constitutionally required in criminal cases, makes it likely that the reasonable doubt standard will be applied to test the validity of presumptions in the future." MCCORMICK 816. See Christie & Pye, Presumptions and Assumptions in the Criminal Law: Another View, 1970 DUKE L.J. 919, 923. Since the Supreme Court's initial draft of the Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence contained a section that seemed to incorporate the reasonable doubt standard, the commentators' forecasts did not seem unreasonable. PROPOSED FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE, 56 F.R.D. 183, § 303(b) (1973). See J. WEINSTEIN § 303[02],

A more fundamental and potentially more important question, however, is whether the federal courts have indeed been correct in analyzing presumptions in terms of the due process requirements. A presumption in the criminal law is not mandatory; it only triggers a jury instruction concerning inferences that may be made if particular evidence is believed.<sup>369</sup> Accordingly, in the federal courts, where the trial judge still retains his common-law privilege to comment on the evidence,<sup>370</sup> a presumption, in fact, adds nothing to the substance and impact of a jury instruction. The discretionary right to comment on the evidence permits the judge to "analyze and dissect the evidence . . . in order to give appropriate assistance to the jury,"<sup>371</sup> and it is well within the traditional scope of this privilege to comment on the significance of certain fact patterns.<sup>372</sup> The judge's discretion is, of course, not arbitrary and uncontrolled,<sup>373</sup> but once a statutory presumption in the criminal context is viewed as an exercise of discretion, the appropriate question concerns the propriety of the commentary or, more specifically, whether it infringes upon the jury's role as factfinder, and not whether a particular criminal presumption, however tested, comports with due process. The results often will be the same regardless of which analysis is applied, but this will not always be so since the standard of review is more flexible when the question is one of judicial discretion rather than one of due process.<sup>374</sup>

at 303-16 to 303-18. Nevertheless, when the Court was subsequently given the chance to adopt this standard, it declined to exercise this option. See Barnes v. United States, 421 U.S. 837, 843 (1973).

Thus far, the reasonable doubt standard has not been adopted by Congress. Section 303 of the Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence was excised from the draft which was ultimately enacted into law. See J. WEINSTEIN 303-1 to 303-6. S.1, however, has proposed the enactment of this evidentiary standard. Rule 25.1(a)(4). S.1 REPORT 1093-94.

370. See note 333 supra.

371. TRIAL BY JURY 125 (quoting Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466, 470 (1933)). Since jurors naturally tend to equate the judge with their concept of "the law," there is little practical difference between the effect achieved by a jury instruction concerning what "the law" regards as a permissible inference and the trial judge's commentary regarding the significance of certain fact patterns.

372. In "exceptional cases," current federal law even permits "an expression of belief in the defendant's guilt." Id. at 127.

373. Id. at 125.

374. "It would appear that the comment privilege of federal judges is not abused. One study covering 12 years noted that of 5,781 federal criminal cases tried to juries and appealed, in only 85 cases was any complaint made about the judge's comments. The comments were held to be reversible error in but 30 of these cases, and were criticized in but two others." Id.

comment on the evidence inhibit the adoption of this approach at the state level;<sup>375</sup> at the federal level, unfortunately, the Supreme Court has shown no tendency to depart from the well-established rational-connection line of analysis. Thus, legislative bodies must enact statutory presumptions that are consistent with a due process line of analysis, with the probable result that only those inferences that enable a jury to find the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt will ultimately be held constitutional.

Yet, even though the trend is to a more rigorous constitutional standard, the Supreme Court has indicated courts may defer in some instances to the expertise or judgment of legislatures in enacting presumptions. In United States v. Gainey,<sup>376</sup> the Court stated that in empirical matters "not within specialized judicial competence or completely commonplace, significant weight should be accorded the capacity of Congress to amass the stuff of actual experience and cull conclusions from it."<sup>377</sup> This approach was reiterated in Leary and, more recently, appears to have been adopted in Barnes v. United States,<sup>378</sup> where the Court considered the constitutionality of the recent possession doctrine.<sup>379</sup> Before Barnes, several state courts had held the doctrine constitutionally deficient under the Leary standard,<sup>380</sup> even though it had been considered virtually a universally rec-

375. Since most states prohibit or restrict any judicial commentary, note 333 supra, any guidance to the jury concerning the significance of a particular fact pattern must be accomplished through the use of criminal presumptions. Even this goes too far in some jurisdictions. For example, Arkansas has traditionally equated comment and presumptions and condemned both as an invasion of the province of the jury. See Lott v. State, 223 Ark. 841, 268 S.W.2d 891 (1954); Blankenship v. State, 55 Ark. 244, 247-48, 18 S.W. 54, 55 (1891).

379. Many decisions involving criminal presumptions related to fencing activity have been concerned with the sale of property by minors. Compare People v. Stevenson, 58 Cal. 2d 794, 376 P.2d 297, 26 Cal. Rptr. 297 (1962) (en banc), with State v. Bundy, 91 Ariz. 325, 372 P.2d 329 (1962) (en banc). See generally Note, Statutory Criminal Presumptions: Judicial Slight of Hand, 53 VA. L. REV. 702, 723-29 (1967).

380. See Carter v. State, 82 Nev. 246, 248-50, 415 P.2d 325, 326-27 (1966); Payne v. State, 435 P.2d 424, 427-28 (Okla. Crim. App. 1968); Commonwealth v. Owens, 441 Pa. 318, 323-26, 271 A.2d 230, 233 (1970). Contra, Steve v. DiRienzo, 53 N.J. 360, 251 A.2d 99 (1969). The Carter and Payne decisions may have been made in part on the basis of a judicial concern with what was perceived to be an unconstitutional shifting of the burden of persuasion. See note 346 supra. Nevertheless, a similar concern did not furnish the basis for the Owens decision. There, the Pennsylvania supreme court seemingly focused on the general insufficiency of the prosecution's evidence and on statistics suggesting that the presumption was arbitrary in the particular context applied (a stolen handgun). 441 Pa. at 324-25, 271 A.2d at 233-34. The court erroneously cited authority purportedly demonstrating that a majority of jurisdictions have rejected the recent possession doctrine. 441 Pa. at 326

ognized presumption.<sup>381</sup> The Barnes Court, however, recognized the "impressive historical basis" underlying the recent possession rule and considered "[t]his longstanding and constant judicial approval of the instruction, reflecting accumulated common experience, [as providing] . . . strong indication that the instruction comports with due process."<sup>382</sup> Nevertheless, the Court considered historical considerations alone insufficient to warrant automatic constitutional approval, and thus proceeded independently to examine the presumption "in light of present-day experience,"<sup>383</sup> holding the presumption comports with due process regardless of the evidentiary standard applied.<sup>384</sup>

The analysis offered in Barnes has at least three important components. First, it suggests that legislatures enacting criminal presumptions should gather extensive empirical data and hold hearings examining all issues involved. Legislatures can make such studies more efficiently than can courts, and if an adequate record is developed, courts should be willing to defer to legislative determinations. Second, by testing the constitutionality of criminal presumptions with reference to the modern context, the Court has seemingly introduced the potential for much needed flexibility in law enforcement efforts. It is constitutionally permissible for legislatures to draft new presumptions to handle ever changing, increasingly sophisticated fencing techniques<sup>385</sup> provided the appropriate evidentiary standard is satisfied. Third, the Court has reaffirmed the principle that a presumption in a criminal case does not violate a defendant's fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination provided the jury is instructed that the accused has a constitutional right not to take the stand and that the basic incriminating fact "could be satisfactorily explained by evidence independent of petitioner's testimony."<sup>386</sup> The tendency of a presumption to implicate the defendant and increase the pressure on him to testify was considered a consequence of the adversary process not in violation of fifth amendment privilege.<sup>387</sup> If the defendant is the only party with access to facts capable of rebutting the inference, his misfortune is "inherent in the case" and not necessarily created by the evidentiary presumption.<sup>388</sup>

The Barnes approach to criminal presumptions is especially welcomed, for it has become increasingly apparent that the long-used recent possession doctrine alone is unable to cope with sophisticated receivers.<sup>389</sup> Prosecutors have the task of establishing that the defendant had unexplained, exclusive possession of stolen property.<sup>390</sup> The difficulties they encounter in doing this are inherent in the very formulation of the rule. First, proof of recent possession, in the absence of other affirmative evidence tending to establish guilt, is not sufficient in many jurisdictions to sustain a conviction.<sup>391</sup> Second, although not every explanation a defendant offers precludes a jury instruction,<sup>392</sup> the more sophisticated fences can take precautionary measures that enable them to give reasonable explanations consistent with innocence.<sup>393</sup> Third, even when no such explanation is forthcoming, some jurisdictions hold that the rule does not apply where the prosecution is able to establish only constructive possession.<sup>394</sup> This approach directly impedes, for example, the successful prosecu-

"Whether possession plus additional circumstances is sufficient to show knowledge is a matter which must be considered on a case to case basis." Torres v. United States, 270 F.2d 252, 258 (9th Cir. 1959). See also Annot., 68 A.L.R. 187, 187-88 (1930).

392. "[T]he mere fact that there is some evidence tending to explain a defendant's possession consistent with innocence does not bar instructing the jury on the inference. The jury must weigh the explanation to determine whether it is 'satisfactory.'" Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 845 n.9 (1973).

393. See note 138 supra and accompanying text.

394. See, e.g., United States v. Russo, 123 F.2d 420, 422 (3rd Cir. 1941). Some courts have held that constructive possession merely serves to weaken the presumption's inferential strength, while others have seemingly ignored this question completely. Compare United States v. Casalnuovo, 350 F.2d 207, 211 (2d Cir. 1965), and United States v. DeSisto, 329 F.2d 929, 935 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 979 (1966), with Boehm v. United States, 271 F. 454, 457 (1921). It is easy to see how a reconsideration of the presumption field in light of the power of judges to comment on the evidence would facilitate the proper resolution of this split. Sophisticated analysis of "inference on an inference" would be inappropriate; the issue would be abuse of discretion. See TRIAL BY JURY 125. See generally C. TORCIA, supra note 338, § 91, at 148-51.

tion of master fences who avoid physical contact with stolen goods.<sup>395</sup> Fourth, the recent possession doctrine is not applicable where the defendant establishes that the possession was nonexclusive because other persons, not involved in the theft or fencing, also had access to the goods.<sup>396</sup> Finally, since courts recognize the inferential value of proof of possession of stolen property weakens as the time of the theft becomes more remote, the doctrine's effectiveness as a prosecutorial tool is always limited by the fence's potential ability to conceal the goods until the court "must hold that as a matter of law possession is no longer 'recent.'"<sup>397</sup>

These deficiencies in the recent possession rule, combined with the increasing sophistication of the modern fencing process and the declining ability of present-day jury panels to deal with complex issues,<sup>398</sup> necessitate the enactment of more effective criminal presumptions to help establish the mens rea. The Model Penal Code, for example, includes a presumption that would apply to any retailer or wholesaler who acquires property "for a consideration which he knows is far below its reasonable market value."<sup>399</sup> Such a presumption, which appropriately focuses upon a designated class of individuals whose fencing activities have had a profound impact on the national economy,<sup>400</sup> is included in section 5 of the Model Act.<sup>401</sup>

395. See notes 142-47 supra and accompanying text.

396. See C. TORCIA, supra note 338, § 139, at 237 n.40. Some courts have refused to recognize the inference where the stolen goods were found "in a place where persons other than the defendant had an equal right and facility of access thereto." Annot., 51 A.L.R.3d 727, § 48(b), at 811 (1973). In general, however, "the requisite of 'exclusive possession' is anything but strictly applied in the defendant's favor. In case after case, the courts have considered all the circumstances in determining whether a jury might raise an inference of guilt from whatever degree of possession might be attributed to the defendant." Id. § 2, at 732. Thus, the "jointness" approach is widely applied, id. § 48(a), at 810 and possession is often considered exclusive where other persons have equal access under circumstances that suggest that the defendant knew that their right to access would probably not be exercised. See United States v. Casalnuovo, 350 F.2d 207, 210-11 (2d Cir. 1965).

397. STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 9-10 (footnote omitted). Cf. C. TORCIA, supra note 338, § 139, at 239. Most fences naturally prefer to dispose of their goods quite quickly, which they are generally able to do. See notes 131, 171 supra and accompanying text. Nevertheless, when necessary, "[c]ertain types of property like jewelry and securities can be easily concealed for an indefinite period of time." J. HALL, supra note 5, at 191. Even when long-term concealment is not contemplated, modern tracing techniques are so rudimentary that the interval between theft and recovery is frequently quite long. Id.

Nevertheless, since this provision would require the prosecution to establish a purchase price far below market value, a more sophisticated criminal presumption might be necessary to handle, for example, those situations where adequate business records are not available to help establish the purchase price. Accordingly, the Model Act contains a companion presumption that would give rise to an inference of recklessness whenever a dealer has made an unexplained purchase out of the ordinary course of business.<sup>402</sup> This presumption would apply on proof of unrecorded transactions, the retention of nonitemized or bogus receipts, the possession of altered merchandise, unusual methods of payment, purchases from noninstitutional sources, or similar conduct, that is viewed as purchasing behavior not in the "usual course of trade."<sup>403</sup> Since normal trade practices tend to vary by business, the presumption is cast in generalized terms to include the five preceding examples, yet also to retain sufficient flexibility to cover other unusual practices.<sup>404</sup> Similar presumptions should be enacted to help prosecutors establish the guilty state of mind in those jurisdictions that retain the stricter standard of criminal liability.

These statutory presumptions would, it is hoped, encounter little or no difficulty receiving judicial approval regardless of which evidentiary standard is applied.<sup>405</sup> In drafting such presumptions, it must be recognized that the constitutional constraints that preclude the operation of so-called true presumptions in criminal cases<sup>406</sup> do not prohibit legislatures from authorizing jury instructions that give additional strength to any particular statutory presumption.<sup>407</sup> Thus, although Congress<sup>408</sup> and state legislatures have been reluctant to exercise this power, it ought to be held constitutionally proper to provide that a jury be instructed, for example, that "although the evidence as a whole must establish the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury may arrive at that judgment on the basis of the presumption alone, since the law regards the fact giving rise to the presumption as strong evidence of the fact presumed."<sup>409</sup>

403. Id. See notes 331-33 supra and accompanying text. In particular, note 332 supra contains Hall's detailed list of circumstances that are often out of the ordinary course of business. On occasion, with respect to certain types of dealers (i.e., junk merchants or pawnbrokers), the law may require that certain procedures, such as record-keeping, be made part of the ordinary course of business, and attach specific consequences for failure to comply. See, e.g., FLA. STAT. ANN. § 812.051 (Supp. 1975).

This carefully-worded charge to the jury ought to be held satisfactory under the relevant constitutional limitations. First, an instruction that "the evidence as a whole must establish the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt" assures that the presumption is not given undue significance and protects a defendant's right to have the prosecution establish all elements of the alleged crime beyond a reasonable doubt. Second, a defendant's constitutional right to jury trial of all elements of the crime is guaranteed since the jury is not required to find the presumed fact on proof of the proved fact. Third, even though the "strong evidence" portion of the jury instruction certainly creates more pressure on the defendant to come forward and testify, his fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination still criminal presumptions to assist in proof of substantive elements of the offense. The only statutory presumption included in any of these statutes is concerned exclusively with interstate commerce, a jurisdictional element. 18 U.S.C.A. § 659 (Supp. 1976). See WORKING PAPERS 26-31. S.1 has finally proposed that, in the absence of a reasonable explanation, both "possession of property recently stolen" and the "purchase . . . of stolen property at a price substantially below its market value," constitute prima facie evidence of the knowledge element. S.1, § 101, at 148 (proposed § 1738 (b)). Nevertheless, since S.1 distinguishes between prima facie evidence and statutory presumptions by attributing strong inferential weight and authorizing a strong jury instruction only for presumptions, characterizing these fact patterns merely as prima facie evidence subordinates their evidentiary significance and eliminates a real opportunity for facilitating the prosecutorial effort. See S.1, § 102, at 345 (proposed Rule 25.1(a)). The present congressional proposal represents a reversal from the position initially advocated by the original drafters. See WORKING PAPERS, supra note 262, at 22, 935-37.

409. S.1, § 102, at 12 (proposed Rule 25.1(a)(4) (A)(ii)) (emphasis added). Although the Supreme Court in United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 71 n.7 (1965), has suggested that "the better practice would be to instruct the jurors that they may draw the inference unless the evidence in the case provides a satisfactory explanation . . . omitting any explicit reference to the statute itself in the charge" this has not been viewed as a constitutional requirement. See J. WEINSTEIN § 303[07], at 303-36. The drafters of S.1 viewed rule 25.1 and its required jury instruction as "a careful reconciliation of the prosecution's and the defendant's interests." See WORKING PAPERS 24. Since the "strong evidence" language used by the section does not achieve a significantly greater inferential effect than the statute approved by the Court in Gainey (providing that certain evidence "shall be deemed sufficient . . . to authorize conviction"), the proposed instructions probably do not go beyond the scope of current fifth amendment limitations. But see McCORMICK 832. Significantly, Justice Black, dissenting in Gainey, maintained that "[f]ew jurors could have failed to believe that it was their duty to convict under" a jury instruction to the effect that proof of the basic fact shall be deemed sufficient to authorize conviction. United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 77 (1965) (Black, J., dissenting).

has not been violated.<sup>410</sup> If a trial judge commenting on the evidence could, in the exercise of discretion, opine that a particular fact pattern is strong evidence of incriminating conduct, the legislature should have the right to make a similar observation through a statutory presumption read to the jury.<sup>411</sup> The pressure that would be exerted upon the defendant is essentially the same as that which would be applied if the inferential significance of the proved facts had been explained by an independent expert witness during the course of the trial, although where a witness testified it is true that the defendant would have an opportunity for cross-examination. In effect, once a statutory presumption has satisfied the relevant due process test, the fifth amendment challenge necessarily dissolves.

410. See United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. at 70-71; J. WEINSTEIN § 303[07], at 303-36.

411. While it is still generally thought that the older common law-position supporting comment obtains in the federal courts, note 333 supra, the issue was clouded by the Supreme Court's opinion in Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466 (1933), a decision soundly criticized by Wigmore. 9 J. WIGMORE, supra note 277, § 2551, at 508 n.7. The traditional rule of the Supreme Court was correctly stated in Vicksburg & Meridian R.R. v. Putnam, 118 U.S. 545, 553 (1886) (discretion to comment on evidence that is ultimately submitted to jury).

412. Strict liability for fencing offenses was considered and rejected by the federal government in 1930. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 228-29. Currently, S.1, "recogniz[ing] the force of arguments against the imposition of criminal liability where a person engages in conduct without culpability," has required that any legislation creating a title 18 strict liability offense "be manifest." S.1 REPORT 54. A provision that simply omits any reference to state of mind will not be considered a strict liability offense. See S.1, § 303, at 15. This formulation is probably consistent with the policy behind the Supreme Court's statutory construction decision in Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952), where the Court essentially said "that mens rea was presumptively to be implied in the statutory redefinition of offenses taken over from the common law." Packer, Mens Rea and the Supreme Court, 1962 SUP. CT. REV. 107, 120. It is probably fair to say that receipt is a "common law" offense, even though it developed late and only through statutory enactment.

413. One New York decision struck down on due process grounds a statute that imposed strict liability upon junk dealers. People v. Estreich, 272 App. Div. 698, 75 N.Y.S.2d 267 (1947), affd. mem., 297 N.Y. 910, 79 N.E.2d 742 (1948). This position, however, seems to be inconsistent with the Supreme Court's modern approach to the question of strict liability. See notes 415-17 infra and accompanying text. But see State v. DiRienzo, 53 N.J. 360, 376, 251 A.2d 99, 107 (1969) ("vulnerable to constitutional attack").

Court has acknowledged that the concept of mens rea is a well-established ingredient of the common law,<sup>414</sup> the principle does not yet have independent constitutional significance. Instead, the Court has characterized the strict liability issue as a question of legislative policy<sup>415</sup> and, in the absence of constitutional infringements,<sup>416</sup> has stated that "[t]here is wide latitude in the lawmakers to declare an offense and to exclude elements of knowledge and diligence from its definition."<sup>417</sup>

The power to legislate strict liability crimes has been repeatedly upheld in a series of so-called public welfare cases.<sup>418</sup> Emphasizing 414. See Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 250 (1952): "The contention that an injury can amount to a crime only when inflicted by intention is no provincial or transient notion. It is as universal and persistent in mature systems of law as belief in freedom of the human will and a consequent ability and duty of the normal individual to choose between good and evil." Similarly, it has been said that "[t]he existence of a mens rea is the rule of, rather than the exception to, the principles of Anglo-American criminal jurisprudence." Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 500 (1951). But see Packer, supra note 412, at 145-46 (deeply imbedded "principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse" is fundamentally "inconsistent with the asserted universality of mens rea").

415. Supreme Court decisions involving questions of strict liability have consistently focused on questions of legislative intent. See United States v. Park, 421 U.S. 658, 666-73 (1975); Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 263 (1951); United States v. Dotterweich, 320 U.S. 277, 279-85 (1943); United States v. Balint, 258 U.S. 250, 252-54 (1922); W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 218-19. Legislative intent has generally been subordinated only when strict liability has threatened the exercise of first amendment freedoms. See note 416 infra and accompanying text.

416. The Court has stated that, on occasion, "doctrines, in most applications consistent with the Constitution . . . cannot be applied in settings where they have the collateral effect of inhibiting the freedom of expression, by making the individual the more reluctant to exercise it." Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 150-51 (1959).

Thus, in Smith, a strict liability obscenity statute was struck down because it infringed upon the first amendment rights of booksellers and the public by inducing sellers to be extremely cautious with regard to the books they make available for public consumption. 361 U.S. at 152-55.

417. Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225, 228 (1957). See United States v. International Minerals & Chem. Corp., 402 U.S. 558, 564 (1970).

418. Sayre, Public Welfare Offenses, 33 COLUM. L. REV. 55 (1933), observes: "[W]e are witnessing today a steadily growing stream of offenses punishable without any criminal intent whatsoever. Convictions may be had for the sales of adulterated or impure food, violations of the liquor laws, infractions of anti-narcotic acts, and many other offenses based upon conduct alone without regard to the mind or intent of the actor." See United States v. Dotterweich, 320 U.S. 277 (1943) (shipment of adulterated drugs); United States v. Balint, 258 U.S. 250 (1922) (improper sale of narcotics); Shevlin-Carpenter Co. v. Minnesota, 218 U.S. 57 (1910) (cutting of timber on state lands). See also United States v. International Minerals & Chem. Corp., 402 U.S. 558 (1971) (application of ignorantia legis to transportation of dangerous acids); United States v. Freed, 401 U.S. 601, rehearing denied, 403 U.S. 912 (1971) (application of ignorantia legis to registration of dangerous firearms); United States v. Park, 421 U.S. 658 (1975) (strict and vicarious liability of president of food chain for rodent contamination). Strict liability statutes have generally received constitutional approval. See W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 221-22. Even so, the constitutionality of such legislation has been a favorite subject of debate among the need to protect important public interests, these decisions have considered it appropriate for legislatures to require selected individuals to take extreme precautions against illegal acts and to assume the risk of a strict liability conviction for "innocent" wrongdoing.<sup>419</sup> Conviction under these statutes usually carries relatively light punishment,<sup>420</sup> although this is not always the case.<sup>421</sup> leading scholars. See, e.g., Hart, The Aims of the Criminal Law, 23 LAW & CONTEMP. PROB. 401, 422-25 (1958); Packer, supra note 412, at 147-52.

Thus far, however, the only Supreme Court decision that has raised serious constitutional questions concerning the validity of strict liability legislation is Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225 (1957). In declaring unconstitutional a city ordinance that penalized the failure of ex-felons to register with police authorities, the Court distinguished the Dotterweich, Balint, and Shevlin-Carpenter Co. line of authority: "But we deal here with conduct that is wholly passive—mere failure to register. It is unlike the commission of acts, or the failure to act under circumstances that should alert the doer to the consequences of his deed." 355 U.S. at 228. This rationale, however, is inapplicable to fencing cases involving dealers, because such situations generally involve both affirmative conduct and circumstances that would alert the purchaser that he was buying stolen goods. See notes 123-25, 329-33 supra and accompanying text. Moreover, in applying the principles articulated in Dotterweich, even in the absence of such circumstances, a corporate officer could be held vicariously liable for the illegal conduct of one of his department store's buyers, where that buyer himself was being held strictly liable. Finally, the Lambert decision may be completely inapplicable to the question of strict liability with respect to attendant circumstances, since the case arguably involved an exception to the principle of ignorantia legis; the defendant had no knowledge of the law in question and could not, the court thought, be reasonably expected to inform himself. 355 U.S. at 229.

419. The Supreme Court's language in United States v. Dotterweich, 320 U.S. 277, 280-81 (1943), is precisely on point:

The prosecution to which Dotterweich was subjected is based on a now familiar type of legislation whereby penalties serve as effective means of regulation. Such legislation dispenses with the conventional requirement for criminal conduct—awareness of some wrongdoing. In the interest of the larger good it puts the burden of acting at hazard upon a person otherwise innocent but standing in responsible relation to a public danger. United States v. Balint. And so it is clear that shipments like those now in issue are "punished by the statute if the article is misbranded [or adulterated], and that the article may be misbranded [or adulterated] without any conscious fraud at all. It was natural enough to throw this risk on shippers with regard to the identity of their wares . . . ." (citation omitted) (emphasis added).

See United States v. Balint, 258 U.S. 250, 253-54 (1922). The court's explanation of Dotterweich in United States v. Park, 421 U.S. 658, 672-73 (1975), merits attention:

The [Food and Drug] Act does not, as we observed in Dotterweich, make criminal liability turn on "awareness of some wrongdoing." . . . The duty imposed by Congress on responsible corporate agents is, we emphasize, one that requires the highest standard of foresight and vigilance, but the Act, in its criminal aspect, does not require that which is objectively impossible. . . . If such a claim [of objective impossibility] is made, the defendant has the burden of coming forward with evidence, but this does not alter the Government's ultimate burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt the defendant's guilt, including his power . . . to prevent or correct the prohibited condition.

420. See S.1 REPORT 54-55.

421. In United States v. Balint, 258 U.S. 250 (1922), "the Court showed no concern about the imposition of severe criminal sanctions without proof of blameworthiness. There was not a whisper in the opinion about the maximum penalty under the Act: five years' imprisonment . . ." Packer, supra note 412, at 114 (emphasis added).

The felony-muder doctrine and statutory-rape provisions are examples of instances where strict liability principles are extended to more traditional crimes and where severe penal sanctions are provided.<sup>422</sup> Thus, there is precedent for developing a strict liability approach to a nonregulatory offense such as fencing. The imposition of strict liability, however, even upon a limited category of individuals, is somewhat of an anomaly in a criminal justice system that generally punishes only blameworthy individuals.<sup>423</sup> Since the constitutionality of such an approach does not necessarily mean that the approach is wise,<sup>424</sup> legislators must carefully evaluate whether the supposed increase in effective law enforcement, if any, will be won at the expense of society's normative standards. The Model Act does not adopt a strict liability approach, for the Act's provisions already greatly facilitate control of fencing schemes without abridging basic principles of criminal punishment.<sup>425</sup>

422. Misdemeanor-manslaughter and bigamy are also traditionally strict liability crimes that carry heavy penalties. Parker, supra note 412, at 140-42. See W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 220.

423. The role of mens rea in the criminal law has been the subject of much discussion. The consensus can be summarily stated: to punish conduct without reference to the actor's state of mind is both inefficacious and unjust. It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy. Consequently, on either a preventive or a retributive theory of criminal punishment, the criminal sanction is inappropriate in the absence of mens rea. Packer, supra note 412, at 109. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.05, Comment, at 140 (Tent. Draft No. 4, 1955). For an interesting discussion that attempts to reconcile these difficulties by limiting the applicability and impact of strict liability offenses, see Brady, Strict Liability Offenses: A Justification, 8 CRIM. L. BULL. 217 (1972). Significantly, since strict liability may not achieve any deterrent effect if the penalty imposed is too slight, Brady proposes the adoption of a gradation continuum that would impose sanctions according to the degree of culpability proved. Id. at 222-24. For a more detailed discussion of gradation principles, see notes 450-67 infra and accompanying text. While general Supreme Court jurisprudence would seem to argue that a strict liability offense here would be constitutional, there is authority pointing the other way. Compare People v. Estreich, 272 App. Div. 698, 701, 75 N.Y.S.2d 267, 270 (1947) ("illegal and arbitrary interference with a lawful business"), affd. mem., 297 N.Y. 910, 79 N.E.2d 742 (1948), with Kilbourne v. State, 84 Ohio St. 247, 95 N.E. 824 (1911). Estreich, however, is of questionable modern authority, since it is a "liberty of contract" due-process decision.

424. See Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 555-56 (1951) (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

425. A gradation scheme that imposes minimal penalties upon strict liability offenders could potentially be more effective if special sanctions were provided for recidivists. Thus, the recidivist could be subjected to increased penal sanctions and to revocation of his operating license. Moreover, even under a modified gradation system, strict liability might serve as a powerful incentive to take preventative steps, since a criminal prosecution would have an important collateral estoppel effect in the event of a subsequent civil suit for treble damages. See note 481 infra and accompanying text.

(v). Affirmative defense. A final possible approach to the mens rea problem would adopt the strict liability definition of receiving for retailers and wholesalers, but would provide an affirmative defense of due diligence.<sup>426</sup> Under such a statute, the prosecution would have a sufficient case for conviction on proof of the receipt of stolen property, but the defendant could still be acquitted by demonstrating his compliance with a legislatively-defined standard of care when purchasing the goods. Legislatures have traditionally been accorded considerable latitude in defining the elements of criminal conduct,<sup>427</sup> and since strict liability criminal statutes have received judicial approval,<sup>428</sup> a strict liability statute that provides an affirmative defense arguably should receive similar treatment.

Nevertheless, the affirmative defense technique in the past has been attacked as an unconstitutional shift of both the burden of producing evidence and the risk of nonpersuasion to the defendant<sup>429</sup> in violation of due process.<sup>430</sup> While it has now been clearly decided that states may constitutionally place the burden of producing evidence on the defendant, since it would be unreasonable to require the prosecution to introduce evidence negating every possible affirmative defense,<sup>431</sup> considerable controversy still surrounds allocation of the risk of nonpersuasion.<sup>432</sup> The Supreme Court's traditional position on whether the burden of persuasion may be shifted has been quite flexible:

The decisions are manifold that within limits of reason and fairness the burden of proof may be lifted from the state in criminal prosecutions and cast on a defendant. The limits are in substance these, that the state shall have proved enough to make it just for the defendant to be required to repel what has been proved with excuse or explanation, or at least that upon a balancing of convenience or of the opportunities for knowledge the shifting of the burden will be found to be an aid to the accuser without subjecting the accused to hardship or oppression.<sup>433</sup>

426. Due diligence could be defined as adherence to reasonable commercial standards, or, if this is still too demanding, as the absence of recklessness (defined in note 271 supra). Note, however, that even the reasonable commercial standards formulation may be too relaxed an approach, since prevailing commercial standards may be quite low. Accordingly, consideration should be given to imposing an even higher standard of care. See generally Bradly, supra note 423, at 224-26.

427. "[T]he courts have long been loath to interfere with the power of legislatures to define criminal conduct." S.1 REPORT 1092 (footnote omitted). See note 412 supra and accompanying text. But see Mullaney v. Wilber, 421 U.S. 684 (1975) (impermissible to shift burden of persuasion on issue of passion in homicide case); Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962) (impermissible to punish status of drug addiction).

Until recently, the leading decision on the constitutionality of shifting the burden of proof was Leland v. Oregon,<sup>434</sup> which manifested this flexibility. In Leland, the Court approved a state statute that required the defendant to prove beyond a reasonable doubt his affirmative defense of insanity to a first-degree murder charge. Leland's precedential value is less certain, however, after In re Winship,<sup>435</sup> which held that the prosecution must establish each element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt, and Mullaney v. Wilbur,<sup>436</sup> which held that the state cannot shift to the defendant the burden of persuasion on the issue of "heat of passion" as a mitigating factor in a homicide prosecution. An affirmative defense that denies the existence of an essential element of the prosecution's case would appear to be governed by Winship:<sup>437</sup> "For example, it is clearly a

However, Leland does suggest that the constitutionality of a defense on which the defendant has the burden of persuasion is measured under a broad, due process standard. Thus, the ultimate question is whether the allocation of proof is reasonable. In an appropriate case it should be possible to make a strong showing of legality. If such an affirmative defense is an integral part of a reasonable legislative solution to a difficult problem, and the evidence on the matter is particularly within the control of the defendant, it is submitted that due process standards are met.

437. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 48. The most recent attempt of the Supreme Court to essay the scope of Winship is Mullaney. The State argued that Winship should be limited to elements that bear on guilt, but not degree of guilt. The court rejected this distinction, observing that Winship was concerned with substance and not form, and illustrated its point by noting that otherwise the state would be wholly free "to redefine the elements that constitute different crimes, characterizing them as factors that bear solely on the extent of punishment." 421 U.S. at 698. The Court then held that the defendant's stake in liberty outweighed the state's inter-denial of due process to characterize alibi as a defense and then place the burden of persuasion on the defendant, for an alibi defense is nothing more than a denial that the defendant committed the crime."<sup>438</sup> It would be consistent, under this reasoning, to argue that the risk of nonpersuasion on the issue of insanity ought to remain on the prosecution since the defendant is in fact denying the requisite mens rea exists.<sup>439</sup> Yet the Winship rational need not necessarily be applicable where the affirmative defense does not deny the existence of an essential element of the crime but rather is more appropriately characterized as an excuse or justification for it—that is, as a form of confession and an avoidance. In this case, it may be constitutional to shift the burden of persuasion to the defendant since all elements of the crime have been established beyond a reasonable doubt.<sup>440</sup>

Although the distinction between affirmative defenses denying an element of the crime and those purporting to justify it is not always clear,<sup>441</sup> this approach has been adopted by several proposals to reform the criminal code and approved by some commentators. The Model Penal Code, for example, requires "the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence"<sup>442</sup> any affirmative de-est in facilitating its prosecutive burden. 421 U.S. at 701-02.

It is not clear how Mullaney would affect an affirmative defense of lack of knowledge of the stolen character of the property in a fencing prosecution. Clearly, the history of the due process clause would argue that knowledge is the essence of the "crime" of receiving. See 421 U.S. at 696. Shifting the burden of persuasion on that issue to the defendant would be hard to distinguish from Mullaney. Ironically, it may well be, therefore, that the Constitution here seen in an historical perspective is consistent, as presently interpreted, with strict liability on the issue of knowledge, but is not consistent with an affirmative defense on that issue. See State v. Giordano, 121 N.J.L. 469, 3 A.2d 290 (1939), where affirmative defense language of a New Jersey statute was construed to be a clarification of a common-law presumption in order to avoid declaring the statute an unconstitutional shift of the burden of persuasion. This demonstrates the general difficulty that is experienced when an effort is made to integrate the Supreme Court's strict liability cases with traditional notions of due process. It is ironic, too, that Mullaney and United States v. Park, 421 U.S. 658 (1975), the Supreme Court's most recent reaffirmations of the concept of strict liability, were handed down on the same day. This, in turn, argues for a different reading of Mullaney keyed to the distinction between a defense seen as a negation of an element of the offense and an affirmative defense seen as a form of confession and avoidance. See text at note 440 infra.

fense which "involves a matter of excuse or justification peculiarly within . . . [his] knowledge . . . on which he can fairly be required to adduce supporting evidence."<sup>443</sup> A similar affirmative defense provision is contained in S.1, the proposal to reform the federal criminal code.<sup>444</sup> Although the S.1 proposal is not expressly limited to cases of excuse or justification, the bill's legislative history clearly indicates the burden of persuasion is to be shifted only when these defenses are involved.<sup>445</sup> Interestingly, both the Model Penal Code and S.1 require that a defendant prove his affirmative defense by only a preponderance of the evidence. This formulation apparently is partly the product of tension between proponents of shifting the burden of persuasion beyond a reasonable doubt and those who would require that the prosecution establish beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the defendant's guilt, which includes proving all elements of its case as well as the lack of any affirmative defense once the defendant's production burden has been satisfied.

As an alternative to the negation-excuse or justification distinction, at least one commentator suggests it is constitutionally permissible to shift the risk of nonpersuasion where it is a "sensible middle position between a much broader statute or strict-liability-type of statute, on the one hand, and, on the other, a statute recognizing the defense and placing an impossible burden on the prosecution to establish the existence of facts within the special knowledge of the defendant."<sup>446</sup> Such an approach merits consideration because it properly recognizes the underlying substantive issues—the due process rights of the defendant and the need to facilitate effective law enforcement—often masked by the somewhat artificial negation-excuse or justification distinction. Under this approach, a strict liability statute for dealers coupled with an affirmative defense should receive constitutional acceptance because of the difficulties in proving guilty knowledge, the defendant's ready access to any exculpatory evidence, and the likelihood that statutory penalties will be light.

446. W. LAFAVE & A. SCOTT, supra note 14, at 49. See WORKING PAPERS 17-19.

One argument against the use of an affirmative defense approach is that it may be a legislative subterfuge functionally equivalent to an impermissible statutory presumption that effects an unconstitutional shifting of the burden of persuasion.<sup>447</sup> A response to this criticism can be made on both analytical and policy grounds. While the courts surely will not hesitate to expose a subterfuge for what it is, there should be different due process tests for a substantive approach that involves redefining the elements of the crime on the one hand and for a merely procedural approach on the other. Accordingly, in the case of affirmative defenses, the appropriate judicial focus for due process should concern whether the relevant provision is impermissibly designed to negate an element of the offense, and not whether it achieves the same procedural consequences as a statutory presumption.<sup>448</sup> More fundamentally, since legislatures have a large measure of freedom to abandon the mens rea element,<sup>449</sup> an analysis that applies the procedural due process test may leave defendants "materially worse off" by forcing the enactment of strict liability statutes with no provision for affirmative defenses.<sup>450</sup> Although the affirmative defense approach ought to satisfy due process, no such approach is taken in the Model Act because of serious doubts as to its constitutionality under prevailing analysis.

3. Sentencing Convicted Receivers

Redefining the substantive and procedural criminal law of fencing is a necessary first step but it will not bring about improved law

447. See J. WEINSTEIN § 303[04], at 303-23-24. Indeed, courts have construed apparent "affirmative defenses" as "permissible inferences" to avoid constitutional difficulties. See State v. Giordano, 121 N.J.L. 469, 3 A.2d 290 (1939); Mantell v. Jones, 150 Neb. 785, 36 N.W.2d 115 (1949). In addition to effecting a shift in the burden of persuasion, an affirmative defense provision may not have to comply with the rational connection test. See note 430 supra. But see Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975).

448. In other words, a different due process test ought to be applicable, depending upon whether a procedural or substantive enactment is involved. Nevertheless, while it is clear that statutory presumptions are procedural devices, affirmative defenses may be in somewhat of an intermediary position, particularly in light of their procedural consequences. It is not without significance, therefore, that the Supreme Court in Mullaney, 421 U.S. at 702 n.31 saw fit to rely on the presumption cases in striking down an affirmative defense. The Court seemed to feel that a "more exacting standard" was required in the affirmative defense area than in the presumption area.

449. See notes 259-63 supra and accompanying text.

450. Although this argument is sound on policy grounds, the Supreme Court has twice indicated that the mere fact that Congress has the "greater" power to define criminal conduct in a certain way is not determinative. The Court's constitutional analysis has traditionally focused on what Congress has done rather than on what that body could have done. See United States v. Romano, 382 U.S. 136, 144 (1965); Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463, 472 (1943).

enforcement unless accompanied by revision in sentencing procedures. Legislative and judicial attitudes to the punishment of convicted receivers exhibit the same fundamental misunderstanding of the significance of fencing that characterizes society's definition of the substantive crime.<sup>451</sup> In almost every state, criminal receivers and thieves are subject to the same penalties,<sup>452</sup> an approach that continues "to denigrate the role of the fence in the theft microcosm."<sup>453</sup> Further, there is evidence that in exercising their discretion under sentencing statutes, most judges frequently treat receivers leniently.<sup>454</sup> Fundamental to an effective criminal law of receiving, however, is a realization that fences, are a major cause of theft,<sup>455</sup> that fencing is a more serious crime than theft, and that, accordingly, the law ought to impose more severe penal sanctions upon criminal receivers,<sup>456</sup> at least where the goods are not received for personal consumption.

New legislation providing stiffer penalties for receivers would convey to judges the legislature's determination that fencing crimes are, indeed, serious and that lighter sentences for receivers are no longer appropriate.<sup>457</sup> Although modernization of sentencing provisions along these lines is a necessary reform, it alone is not sufficient. The criminal law of receiving must also make sophisticated distinc-

451. See notes 174-90 supra and accompanying text. For example, in eighteenth century England, thieves were punished more severely than fences. See Chappell & Walsh, "No Questions Asked" 162-63.

452. See REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 21; Hearings on Fencing 163-71. S.1 would continue this practice for those who traffic in stolen property (§ 1732) and lessen the penalties for those who merely possess it (§ 1733), presumably for personal consumption. Only the special sentencing provisions of § 2302(b) would work to impose higher penalties on certain offenders. See note 465 infra.

453. REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 21.

454. Id. Convicted fences are too often given suspended sentences, put on probation, or merely fined. "[I]ronically, 'burglars like to plead guilty to being receivers. Apparently, they are not as stigmatized by being receivers.'" Id. at 22 (quoting Los Angeles District Attorney).

455. Id. See notes 16-21 supra and accompanying text.

456. See REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 21.

457. One possibility is the use of mandatory sentences. Mandatory sentences, though often believed to be unwise, are generally thought to be a matter of legislative judgment. See, e.g., People v. Broadie, 37 N.Y.2d 100, 332 N.E.2d 338, 371 N.Y.S. 2d 471 (1975) (mandatory life for drug offender upheld). Appellate review by the prosecution would probably not be unconstitutional under the double jeopardy clause in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332 (1975) (appeal possible except where retrial of facts required). Nor would general due process considerations seem to militate against it. See generally Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 27 (1974); Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104 (1972). The policy considerations supporting a "mutual review" concept are ably set out in Testimony of Professor Livingston Hall on behalf of the A.B.A., Hearings on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 5364-69 (1973). On balance, appellate review seems preferable to mandatory sentencing.

tions among fences according to the degree of their culpability.<sup>458</sup> Illustrative of such a scheme is the Model Act, which sanctions differently receivers who purchase for consumption only,<sup>459</sup> those who purchase for resale,<sup>460</sup> and fences who both initiate thefts and arrange the redistribution of stolen merchandise.<sup>461</sup>

These suggested penal provisions have at least two somewhat interrelated advantages. First, by drafting three sets of penalty provisions instead of one, legislatures can better communicate to judges their determination of the relative seriousness of various fencing crimes. Second, multiple penal provisions would give judges more flexibility to tailor punishment to the crime, thereby presumably maximizing incapacitation, increasing deterrence, and reducing the risk of nullification by a jury not wishing, for example, to subject a consumer of stolen goods to the harsh sanction more properly reserved for a master fence.

Attempts to distinguish among receivers solely on the value of the stolen property received, the traditional approach to grading punishment in theft crimes, is inadequate for several reasons. First, establishing precisely how much stolen property a particular receiver has handled is often difficult, thus undermining the very basis of this approach to sentencing. Second, a scheme that emphasizes the particular economic function of the fence is a more accurate method of allocating punishment since, on the whole, it is highly probable that the value and volume of stolen property handled by a master fence is greater than that redistributed by a professional fence even though this may be difficult to prove. Third, a scheme that allocates punishment according to the value of the property stolen obscures distinctions based on personal blameworthiness. The occasional consumer of stolen goods is not generally an organizer of theft activity, and, by definition, his purchase is not for resale purposes. Consequently, his overall conduct is less blameworthy than that of an outlet fence or master fence because his adverse impact on society is considerably smaller. This difference in culpability, however, may not as a practical matter result in different penal treatment in a criminal code that looks only at value of the property handled. Thus, while it may often be true that distinctions based on value furnish 458. This proposal was initially made by Hall, but there has been little action on either the state or federal level. See J. HALL, supra note 5, at 155-57, 217-19. Hall, however, never went further to distinguish between a fence who was a mere dealer and one who was engaged in the trafficking of stolen goods.

459. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 2, Appendix B.

a preliminary means for evaluating the gravity of criminal conduct, value alone should not be determinative. Instead, the law ought to use distinctions based on value as a basis for differentiating sanctions within each category of receiver.<sup>463</sup>

Despite the obvious benefits of a scheme that grades criminal offenses more discriminately, most recent proposals for reforming the criminal laws have eschewed such an approach. Ironically, the Model Penal Code may have contributed to this failure. That proposal consolidates theft and receiving and then distinguishes various classes of thieves and receivers,<sup>463</sup> but treats identically thieves and receivers who are consumers, dealers, or brokers of stolen goods once a minimum level of value ($500) is involved.<sup>464</sup> Similar deficiencies are present in S.1, which generally provides equal penal treatment for thieves and fences and makes no enhancing distinction for penal purposes between categories of receivers for resale.<sup>465</sup> Ironically, S.1 does recognize a functional distinction between receiving and trafficking in stolen property,<sup>466</sup> but little effort is made to reflect the distinction in penal sanctions.

At the federal level, under current law such deficiencies are not as serious as they otherwise would be because title X of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 provides for sentences of up to

462. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 2(b)(2), Appendix B.

463. MODEL PENAL CODE § 223.1(2) (Proposed Official Draft, 1962) provides as follows:

Grading of Theft Offenses.

(a) Theft constitutes a felony of the third degree if the amount involved exceeds $500, or if the property stolen is a firearm, automobile, or other motor-propelled vehicle, or in the case of theft by receiving stolen property, if the receiver is in the business of buying or selling stolen property.

(b) Theft not within the preceding paragraph constitutes a misdemeanor .

This provision singles out dealers for particular treatment only when less than $500 is involved; the proposed statute also makes no attempt to impose heavier penalties on big-time fences when larger amounts are involved. Unfortunately, a similar, although more complicated, proposal was made by the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws. See REFORM COMMN., supra note 190, § 1735(2) (f). The Model Penal Code, at least, has already led, albeit unintentionally, to unwise reform at the state level. See note 190 supra. It remains to be seen whether the recommendations of the reform commission will be carried into law in a similarly unsophisticated fashion. See note 465 infra.

464. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 223.1(2) (Proposed Official Draft, 1962); notes 190, 452 supra and accompanying text. Provision is made, however, for an extended term. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 6.07 (Proposed Official Draft, 1962) (authorizing extended terms), § 7.03 (Proposed Official Draft, 1962) (criteria for extended terms).

465. See S.1, §§ 1731-1733. Provision is made, however, for an extended term. S.1, § 2301(c) (authorizing extended terms); S.1, § 2302(b) (criteria for extended terms). See also S.1, § 1801 (operating a racketeering syndicate); S.1, § 1802 (racketeering).

twenty-five years for certain "special offenders," a category that would include professional fences and large-scale organizers.<sup>467</sup> Not all criminal dealers are covered, however, and title X is, of course, not applicable to those convicted in state courts on state charges. Until reformers of the criminal law of receiving recognize and correct the existing inadequacies of our penal codes, therefore, the full benefits of any substantive and procedural reforms will not be realized.

B. Civil Remedies for Fencing Crimes

The only adequate approach to the criminal receiver is that which deals with him as an established participant in the economic life of society, whose behavior has been institutionalized over a span of more than two centuries in Anglo-American experience.<sup>468</sup>

Although modernization of the criminal law of fencing should facilitate enforcement, an exclusively criminal law approach to the problem is insufficient because it ignores the opportunities for improved social control offered by civil sanctions. Appropriate provisions for civil liability can both directly reinforce the effects of newly-enacted criminal statutes and add new dimensions to law enforcement efforts. As discussed in earlier sections, a comprehensive redefinition of the substantive criminal law of theft and fencing is necessary to make redistribution financially less profitable.<sup>469</sup> Civil statutes can play an important supplementary role in this process in at least two ways. First, by permitting and encouraging victims of theft to initiate civil suits under fencing statutes to recover damages against purchasers of their stolen goods, appropriately drafted civil provisions will increase the likelihood a violator will be discovered and will thus greatly enlarge his penalties. Second, at least to the extent that punitive damages are awarded, civil suits provide a means for sanctioning those receivers who cannot be convicted under criminal statutes. Private plaintiffs seeking damages from receivers enjoy important substantive and procedural advantages not available to the prosecution in criminal actions since most of the constitutional protections accorded a criminal defendant are not applicable in civil litigation.<sup>470</sup>

467. 18 U.S.C. § 3575-3578 (1970) provides procedures by which designated special offenders may be sentenced to a maximum of 25 years' imprisonment. See J. McCLELLAN, The Organized Crime Control Act (S.30) or Its Critics: Which Threatens Civil Liberties?, 46 NOTRE DAME LAW. 55, 146-88 (1970).

470. STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 13. See generally Comment, Organized Crime and the Infiltration of Legitimate Business: Civil Remedies for "Criminal Activity," 124 U. PA. L. REV. 124 (1975).

In most jurisdictions, only the common-law action for conversion is available to theft victims seeking recovery. A successful suit for conversion permits recovery of the market value of the goods at the time and place of their conversion on proof the defendant interfered with the plaintiff's control of the property.<sup>471</sup> Actions in conversion, however, have significant deficiencies in receiving cases that seriously impair the role of private enforcement as a method of control. The most significant obstacle to civil actions in conversion is the problem of proof that permeates many criminal fencing cases: A civil plaintiff generally finds it difficult to establish that his property has been converted since receivers legitimize and dispose of the goods rapidly. As a practical matter, therefore, if a civil suit is at all possible, a plaintiff's recovery is limited to the market value of those goods actually found in the defendant's possession.<sup>472</sup> Further, since plaintiffs in conversion cannot recover expenses of the suit, such as the costs of investigation and attorney's fees, victimized plaintiffs are never fully compensated. Punitive damages, although theoretically recoverable, are rarely awarded because of the difficulties in establishing the requisite aggravated state of mind.<sup>473</sup> The unfortunate result is that theft victims increasingly recover on insur-

471. D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF REMEDIES § 3.9, at 403 (1973); C. MCCORMICK, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF DAMAGES § 123, at 463 (1935) [hereinafter MCCORMICK ON DAMAGES]. Under the market value formula, the defendant would most often be liable for the wholesale value of the goods. Retail value would only apply when the goods were stolen from a noncommercial victim. To do otherwise would automatically give the commercial victim a guaranteed profit on every item converted. This would not be appropriate, since every merchant purchasing goods at wholesale prices incurs a risk that he will not be able to sell the items for a profit. Assuming that problems of proof could be overcome, see note 472 infra, the victim would, however, be able to recover the selling price of those goods that a commercial defendant had sold for profit. Although sometimes limited to the bad faith converter, this rule is an application of the common law doctrine of "waiver of the tort and suit in assumpsit," that is designed to prevent unjust enrichment. D. DOBBS, supra, § 5.15, at 414. See RESTATEMENT OF RESTITUTION § 154 (1937).

Finally, since the typical commercial defendant is normally not able to recover money from the thief or fence who made the initial sale, some deterrent effect is achieved because the receiver is effectively forced to pay twice for the same goods.

472. Immediate resale is an important attribute of any successful fencing operation. See note 131 supra and accompanying text. If the business purposefully avoids maintaining detailed records of its transactions, tracing the stolen goods that have already been resold may be impossible. Even when records have been maintained, if the stolen goods have been mixed with legitimate merchandise, tracing the goods so that the plaintiff can recover the defendant's sale price (waiving the tort and suing in assumpsit, see D. DOBBS, supra note 471, § 5.15, at 414) may be an equally difficult task. See notes 137, 226-32 supra and accompanying text.

473. See D. DOBBS, supra note 471, § 3.9, at 205; W. PROSSER, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORTS 9-10 (4th ed. 1971). In at least one case, however, purchase at a price substantially below market value and at an unusual hour of the night was considered sufficient to result in a jury award of punitive damages. See Hearings on Criminal Laws 310.

ance contracts, a convenient, less expensive alternative to civil litigation, and pass along increased insurance costs to consumers.<sup>474</sup> Thus, the increase in deterrence expected from private law enforcement is not realized.

Clearly, then, a new cause of action more favorable to plaintiffs needs to be created if private civil litigation is to play a substantial role in curbing fencing operations. The Model Act provides such a civil action by adopting an approach used by the federal antitrust statutes<sup>475</sup> and imposing civil liability on proof of the elements of a criminal violation.<sup>476</sup> Under the proposed statute, a receiver is liable for damages if the plaintiff establishes the receipt, requisite mens rea, and ownership of the property by a preponderance of the evidence. This lower evidentiary standard is especially important in cases where the prosecution decides not to file criminal charges against a purchaser of stolen goods because of the difficulties in establishing guilty state of mind beyond a reasonable doubt. The provisions for civil liability make it less likely that receivers will escape sanction since it is usually considerably easier for plaintiffs to establish the mens rea by a preponderance of the evidence.<sup>477</sup> To ease the burden of proof in civil cases, the statute extends to the civil context the presumption of recklessness<sup>478</sup> on proof of the possession of recently stolen property, of the purchase or sale of stolen property at a price substantially below fair market value, or of the purchase or sale of stolen property out of the regular course of business.<sup>479</sup> Finally, the proposed statute tolls the civil statute of limitations dur-

474. The Department of Commerce has recognized that "small firms are less able to afford the overhead required for extensive protective measures to absorb . . . losses [attributed to theft and fencing]." Hearings on Criminal Laws 374. Eventually, the pressure of increased insurance rates, which these competitive smaller firms cannot pass along to the public, may force many businesses to close. See note 51 supra and accompanying text. Unfortunately, insurance policies themselves do not achieve any deterrent effect. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 12 (money paid by insurers enriches criminal element of society).

477. See McCORMICK 793; Hearings on Criminal Laws 310.

478. Although the civil remedy provision may incorporate the same state of mind requirement contained in the criminal statute, this is not an absolute prerequisite. Liability could be imposed on the basis of a civil negligence standard, that is, a failure to exercise due care. See STAFF REPORT ON SMALL BUSINESS 13. Indeed, strict liability in a civil context should be given serious consideration. See generally W. PROSSER, supra note 473, at 493-95. In reality, the law already imposes strict liability with respect to attendant circumstances in conversion actions. Id. at 83. Significantly, a series of recent statutes authorizes the recovery of treble damages against any receiver of stolen property. For the source of this legislation see 33 SUGGESTED STATE LEGISLATION 111 (Council of State Governments 1974).

479. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 10 (incorporating § 5) Appendix B.

ing criminal prosecutions<sup>480</sup> and gives collateral estoppel effect to issues resolved against the defendant in a prior criminal trial on the same facts.<sup>481</sup> The effect of these last two provisions is to ensure that civil damage suits follow successful criminal prosecutions.

This statutory cause of action is not designed to replace the common law action in conversion, which would still be available to plaintiffs who could not prove the requisite state of mind by a preponderance of the evidence but could show a substantial interference with control of their property. Nevertheless, a most significant difference between the two causes of action that makes the statutory one more desirable is the measure of damages. As a financial incentive to sue, section 10 of the Model Act authorizes recovery of treble damages, reasonable attorney's fees, and costs of investigation and litigation.<sup>482</sup> The treble damages provision, a concept borrowed from

480. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 11(c), Appendix B.

481. Although most courts rejected extension of a collateral estoppel effect to a subsequent civil case because of the absence of mutuality, a few jurisdictions have refused to follow this reasoning. See F. JAMES, CIVIL PROCEDURE § 11.35, at 607 (1965). In any event, mutuality should no longer be a bar to the application of collateral estoppel because the doctrine of mutuality itself has declined considerably. See R. FIELD & B. KAPLAN, MATERIALS FOR A BASIC COURSE IN CIVIL PROCEDURE 859 (1973). Even so, many jurisdictions have been reluctant to apply collateral estoppel in this context. Consequently, a prior criminal conviction will often have no effect. Nevertheless, although not yet the majority rule, the trend of decisions "manifest[s] an increasing reluctance to reject in toto the validity of the law's factfinding processes outside the confines of res judicata and collateral estoppel." FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE FOR UNITED STATES COURTS AND MAGISTRATES rule 803(22), Advisory Committee Notes, at 132 (West 1975). Accordingly, these cases have permitted prior criminal judgments (or particular issues decided therein) to be admitted in evidence for consideration by the fact-finder. Id. See F. JAMES, supra, § 11.35, at 607; McCORMICK, supra note 331, at 740; Annot., 18 A.L.R.2d 1287, 1299-1307 (1951).

482. The concept of treble damages for theft is not new. Its origins lie in Roman criminal law. See 1 J. STEPHENS, A HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW 10 (1888). It can also be found in early American law. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Andrews, 2 Mass. 13 (1806). More is required, however, than the mere authorization of recovery. Although the spur provided by the possibility of treble damage suits would motivate many individual victims to institute civil proceedings, their ability to do so would be constrained by resource limitations. The investigation of theft and fencing activity and any subsequent litigation efforts would inevitably entail expending considerable time and resources. Since not every investigation or litigation effort will successfully result in a judgment awarding treble damages, costs, and fees, the individual victim may not be willing to risk his limited financial resources. Consequently, an industry-wide approach would seem to provide a more realistic way of coping with the inevitable investigatory and legal expenses inherent in any litigation effort. For example, an association of common carriers or shippers could maintain a separate fund to finance this type of litigation. Wherever successful, most of the resulting proceeds would be paid to the individual victim, while the remainder, a predetermined percentage, could be returned to the fund to finance future investigation and civil proceedings. Insurance companies would also have the resources necessary to investigate illicit activity and to bring suit against retail or wholesale receivers. An important question is whether an insurer, suing under subrogation principles, would be entitled to those damages that go beyond the amount paid in compensation to the insured—that is, whether an insurance company is entitled to the additional federal antitrust statutes,<sup>483</sup> provides for triple recovery of actual damages, including consequential and incidental losses,<sup>484</sup> instead of the mere market value of the converted goods.

Yet as a practical matter, this financial incentive to sue would not be adequately realized in many cases if a defendant's potential liability were limited to three times the value of stolen goods actually received.<sup>485</sup> Such an approach would permit networks of thieves gains of a treble damages action. Five different rules, ranging from one that gives the insurer the complete addition to one that grants the insured the complete addition, have been discussed by the courts. See R. KEETON, BASIC TEXT ON INSURANCE LAW, § 3.10(c), at 160-62. For obvious policy reasons, however, in the context of theft and fencing, the insurance company should be allowed to retain the additional gain. To do otherwise would remove the insurer's incentive to sue, an undesirable result since private parties may lack the resources necessary for this type of litigation. Moreover, if insurance companies were granted the profits of a treble damages action, they would be given the motivation to initiate prosecutions against fences instead of, as is the prevailing practice today, attempting to buy the goods back from them at a good price.

483. Clayton Act § 4, 15 U.S.C. § 15 (1970).

484. Of course, special damages must be proven, but in view of the extensive indirect costs that theft and fencing activity generate, the potential recovery will always be quite large. See notes 50-56 supra and accompanying text. Under the language of some legislation, business competitors who have suffered no theft loss could conceivably bring suit on unfair competition grounds against an establishment dealing in stolen goods. See S.13. 93d Cong., 1st Sess. § (2)(i) (1973); CAL. PENAL CODE § 496 (West Supp. 1975). In such a case, the plaintiff would be entitled to three times his lost profits. Most often, however, problems of proof would preclude recovery, since the plaintiff must be able to establish both his relative share of the market in comparison to the defendant's and the extent to which the defendant's sales at lower prices resulted in decreased profits. Such an effort would only be worthwhile when the amount of lost profits was high. The plaintiff committed to this mode of action would attempt to apply an antitrust-type measure of damages. See Hearings on Criminal Laws 328-31.

In many cases, the size of the recovery will simply reflect a measure of threefold the wholesale value of the stolen goods, a direct application of the conversion market value formula. See authorities cited note 471 supra. Currently, once a loss has occurred, the prevailing practice is for the shipper to file a claim with his insurer. The insurer pays the claim and then proceeds against the carrier or the carrier's insurance company. The matter is then settled by these parties, by court action or otherwise. Under the treble damages approach, any of these parties—the shipper, his insurer, the carrier, or its insurance company—depending on which one incurs the ultimate loss, could sue the receiver on a conversion theory. The shipper's right to sue would be based simply on its status as the owner of converted property. The right of the shipper's insurance company to sue would be based on traditional subrogation principles. See generally R. KEETON, supra note 482, § 3.10 (1971). If necessary, the carrier's right to sue could be based on his status as a bailor. See MCCORMICK ON DAMAGES, § 123, at 463-65; The Winkfield, Court of Appeal, 1901 [1902], at 42. Finally, his insurance company's right to sue could also be based on subrogation principles. In the event that the carrier's liability to the shipper is limited to a designated amount by law or by contract, the thief or criminal receiver would not be able to limit his liability to this amount, since well-established bailment principles hold that this is a matter strictly between the bailor and bailee. The Winkfield, Court of Appeal, 1901 [1902], at 42.

485. At least two potential measures of damages could be applied, depending on the statutory language. If the statute authorizes a recovery based on the value of the goods, and the law limits the defendant's liability merely to goods received rather and fences to avoid the impact of the treble-damages provision by channeling the stolen merchandise through a large number of receivers. Thus, there would be little incentive to sue unless a substantial number of these receivers were located. One possible solution to this problem is to hold each receiver jointly and severally liable for the value of the entire shipment on proof it redistributed some of the stolen goods. Under this approach, a producer need only locate one large receiver with sufficient assets to satisfy a judgment. A drawback to such an approach, however, might be the apparent unfairness of imposing treble-damages liability on a receiver of only a small part of the total shipment.

The proposed statute attempts to provide the financial incentives needed to realize the deterrence value of private enforcement and yet minimize the inequities of excessive liability. For purposes of analysis, it is necessary to consider, on the one hand, receivers who purchase stolen property for personal consumption, and those who purchase for redistribution, and, on the other, receivers who both participate in the theft and redistribute the property. According to section 10 of the Model Act, receivers who purchase for personal consumption or redistribution, and who did not participate in the theft, are treated similarly: they are liable in treble damages for the value of the property actually received or redistributed. On the other hand, receivers who both participate in the theft and purchase for redistribution are liable for three times the value of the total amount stolen. These receivers are treated as joint tortfeasors with their thieves and are therefore jointly and severally liable for the entire theft.<sup>486</sup> One crucial determination for purposes of liability, than all of the goods stolen, the measure of damages would be three times the value of the goods received. If the statute authorizes a recovery based on actual damages, but imposes liability only to the extent of goods received, the measure of damages would be based on the plaintiff's actual losses on a prorated basis reflecting the defendant's proportionate share of responsibility for the victim's damages. Either formulation based on limited liability is so impractical, from a societal viewpoint, that no serious legislative consideration should be given to it. In the absence of a specific legislative directive authorizing such limited liability, the contrary legislative intent should be presumed. Anti-trust damages are joint. See, e.g., Noerr Motor Freight, Inc. v. Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference, 166 F. Supp. 163 (E.D. Pa. 1958), revd. on other grounds, 365 U.S. 127 (1961). A similar rule should be followed here. In addition, given the role played by receipt, particularly receipt for resale, it does not seem unreasonable to hold him who receives as a joint tortfeasor, for the full value of what was stolen, rather than merely for the part that was received. It would not be necessary to apportion damages among joint tortfeasors. W. PROSSER, supra note 473, § 52, at 314. Here, it is only necessary to conceptualize the tort as "theft-receipt" rather than "receipt" to achieve this result. Clearly, this is the better view both economically and legally.

486. See W. PROSSER, supra note 473, § 46, at 291-92. The traditional rule was that there could not be contribution between joint tortfeasors. Id. § 50, at 306.

therefore, is whether the receiver "initiates, organizes, plans, finances, directs, manages, or supervises the theft."<sup>487</sup> A professional fence, however, may also be liable for the entire theft if he has established a working relationship with the thieves, even though he was unaware of the particular theft beforehand. This aspect of civil liability under the Model Act recognizes that as a practical matter an established fencing relationship is an incentive for theft. Hence, it follows that if the thief and receiver deal at "arm's length," the fence will not be liable for the entire theft. This would be the case for a legitimate businessman who only infrequently trades in stolen goods and never has an interest in a particular theft.

If the model statute is enacted, the prospect of treble-damages recovery and corresponding large legal fees will probably spur the growth of a substantial body of private attorneys specializing in plaintiffs' fencing claims, similar to the growth of plaintiffs' antitrust attorneys. A private fencing bar may develop improved litigation and investigation techniques and thereby help facilitate enforcement of the fencing laws. By the same token, plaintiffs' attorneys may supply law enforcement officials with information to help convict receivers in the hope of benefiting by collateral estoppel from a criminal prosecution. While law enforcement officials might not be as able or as willing to reciprocate with valuable information until they have successfully prosecuted the defendants, the evidence should eventually be turned over in the interest of achieving maximum deterrence,<sup>488</sup> as is frequently done by the Justice Department after an investigation into criminal antitrust violations. Ultimately, once the full deterrent effect of this dual approach to the problem of theft and fencing is recognized, prosecutors will probably routinely name retail and wholesale businesses in prosecutions for receiving, even if their successful prosecution may not be possible, since merely list-

Among conscious wrongdoers, the law would not help the parties share the damages. Id. § 46, at 291-92. A full recovery, for example, for treble damages against one department store for the entire value of a theft would obviously end the matter. Yet it seems clear that the others who received part of the goods stolen should be given an incentive not to participate in the trade in stolen property. Suit by the first store against the others would provide the extra push that is needed. Consequently, here, if not elsewhere, the "no contribution" rule should be relaxed.

487. See MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT § 4(a)(2), Appendix B.

488. Since a lower burden of proof governs civil cases, note 477 supra, prosecutors may turn materials over to private parties at an early stage, because a criminal conviction may be too difficult to attain under the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard. Such material is not always easy to uncover, even by public bodies. See Application of State of California to Inspect Grand Jury Subpoenas, 195 F. Supp. 37 (E.D. Pa. 1961).

ing them will give private attorneys notice of their potential vulnerability to a civil suit.<sup>489</sup>

Realizing the potential benefits from private law enforcement, a few states have, in fact, recently enacted legislation that subjects criminal receivers to a civil liability for treble damages, court costs, and reasonable attorney's fees.<sup>490</sup> At the federal level, congressional enactment of title IX of the Organized Crime Control Act, which provides that any person or entity whose business is injured by so-called racketeer-influenced organizations may recover treble damages, costs and fees,<sup>491</sup> indicates at least a preliminary acknowledgement of the role of civil suits in controlling serious crime problems. In addition to allowing treble damages, title IX authorizes the attorney general to institute civil proceedings for the purpose of obtaining injunctive relief against any act that violates the statute.<sup>492</sup> If necessary to restrain violations of this act, the court may order any person (or entity) "to divest himself of any interest . . . in any enterprise" and may prohibit any individual from engaging in any business activity that comes within the scope of the legislative prohibition.<sup>493</sup> The statute further provides that prior criminal convictions are to be given a collateral estoppel effect "in any subsequent civil proceedings brought by the United States."<sup>494</sup> Finally, to remove unduly burdensome jurisdictional and procedural constraints to civil actions by the attorney general, the statute contains liberal venue and subpoena-power provisions and permits nationwide service of process.<sup>495</sup>

489. See note 488 supra. The traditional practice of some prosecutors of securing the names of unindicted co-conspirators may present legal problems. See United States v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (5th Cir. 1975) (beyond the power of the grand jury). It may be necessary in light of Briggs to name the unindicted person as "John Doe" and to reveal his name, if at all, only through the bill of particulars.

490. See, e.g., CAL. PENAL CODE § 496 (West Supp. 1976). Arizona passed similar legislation providing for costs and fees, but only for a sum twofold the market value of the property. It is also not apparent whether the measure of loss in Arizona is limited to those stolen goods actually received by the defendant, or whether liability extends to the entire stolen shipment. ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-621B (Supp. 1975).

Some states have authorized the recovery of damages without providing any treble damage incentive to sue. See, e.g., N.C. GEN. STAT. § 99A-1 (Supp. 1975); Note, Torts—Recovery of Damages for Interference with Property Rights Under G.S. 99A-1, 10 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 340 (1974).

Title IX, however, is primarily concerned with curbing the infiltration of legitimate businesses by organized crime.<sup>496</sup> Consequently, any derivative civil attack on fencing activity under this statute can be accomplished only in an oblique manner.<sup>497</sup> Nevertheless, the statute's extensive substantive and procedural provisions for civil relief have provided a basic model for recent congressional proposals designed to deal more directly with the problem of theft and fencing.<sup>498</sup>

Prior to the drafting of S.1, a bill called S.13 was introduced in an attempt to amend both 18 U.S.C. § 1964, the civil remedies section of title IX, and 18 U.S.C. § 659, the most commonly used federal anti-fencing provision.<sup>499</sup> The bill proposed that section 1964 retain its basic provisions authorizing treble damages and appropriate judicial relief to prevent violations of title IX, and that section 659 be amended to provide treble damages recovery and injunctive relief and include liberal venue and process procedures.<sup>500</sup> Other proposed amendments to both sections would have allowed the federal government to sue for actual damages whenever it has been "injured in its business or property by reason of any [statutory] violation;"<sup>501</sup> permitted the attorney general to "intervene in any [privately initiated] civil action or proceeding" that he considers to be of "general public importance;"<sup>502</sup> authorized private injunctive relief, including divestiture, "to prevent and restrain violations" of either sec-

496. Despite this principal orientation, neither the civil nor the criminal provisions of this legislation are limited to the infiltration of legitimate business by organized crime. Notwithstanding a recent federal decision to the contrary, Barr v. WUI/TAS, Inc., 66 F.R.D. 109 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) (limited to organized crime), these provisions encompass "any person" who comes within their prohibition. See United States v. Campanole, 518 F.2d 352, 363 (9th Cir. 1975) (not limited to organized crime). This is why the term "person" was so broadly defined. See 18 U.S.C. § 1961(3) (1970). See United States v. Altese, 19 CRIM. L. RPTR. 2319 (2d Cir. July 21, 1976) (not limited to legitimate business).

497. 18 U.S.C. § 1962 (1970) (emphasis added) makes it unlawful for any person, through a pattern of racketeering activity or any income derived therefrom, to acquire any interest or control of any enterprise engaged in interstate commerce. Racketeering activity is defined to include any conduct that is indictable under three federal statutes dealing with theft and fencing. See 18 U.S.C. § 1961(1) (1970). See generally note 185 supra. tion;<sup>503</sup> and given collateral estoppel effect to previous criminal convictions of defendant in civil actions instituted by private parties.<sup>504</sup> Nevertheless, because of inaction by the House Committee on the Judiciary, S.13 never became law despite unanimous approval by the Senate.<sup>505</sup>

The proposals contained in S.13 are potentially important means for controlling criminal activity through civil litigation, and they have been adopted in modified form by the Model Act.<sup>506</sup> The availability of injunctive relief to "any person"<sup>507</sup> threatened by theft activity, for example, would allow businesses to take steps to avoid theft. Thus, under the broad language of these amendments, shippers could conceivably obtain injunctions requiring carriers to take appropriate security measures against theft, and carriers could seek injunctive relief directing shippers to identify their goods with appropriate markings.<sup>508</sup> Although S.1 would authorize injunctive relief upon petition by the attorney general, as well as the recovery of treble damages, costs, and fees by victims of crime, neither the four amendments contained in S.13, nor the proposed extension of procedural benefits to private parties suing under section 659, are contained in the new proposal.<sup>509</sup> The failure to give collateral estoppel effect to criminal convictions in private litigation and to provide for private injunctive relief may not be of major significance since they are arguably available under the present common law.<sup>510</sup> But the failure

508. In seeking injunctive relief, both the carrier and the shipper would base their arguments on parallel grounds. The shipper would argue that his business could not survive if his goods could not be shipped. Since there are only a limited number of carriers, all of whom have demonstrated their failure to take adequate security precautions, the court should require that appropriate precautionary measures be taken as a condition of doing business. Similarly, the carrier seeking injunctive relief would argue that since he is required to accept all goods delivered to him for shipment, the court should require proper packaging and identification as a condition for any shipper doing business with the carrier.

510. For a discussion of the current common law with respect to the collateral estoppel effect of issues decided in a prior criminal case, see note 481 supra. Whether there is a right to private injunctive relief in this context is not clear. A well-established rule is that equity will not enjoin criminal conduct. D. DOBBS, supra note 471, at 115-16. This reluctance was based on the theory that an adequate remedy was available at law in the form of a criminal prosecution, and that an injunction, enforceable by contempt, will usually be granted only after a nonjury trial. Id. at 117-18. An early exception developed in both public and private nuisance cases "where a plaintiff sought to enjoin a crime that invaded his property interest." Id. at 116 (emphasis added). When a public nuisance was involved, plaintiff had stand-to extend liberal venue and process rules to private parties will inevitably hamper their litigation efforts.

III. CONCLUSION: BASIC TACTICS AND STRATEGY FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT

Successful control of crimes against property ultimately requires a realization that the redistribution of stolen property is not a victimless white-collar crime.<sup>511</sup> Current misunderstandings concerning the impact of theft and fencing understandably reflect the same shortsighted economic view of receiving long conspicuous in our substantive laws. The private business sector must voluntarily undertake reforms on an industry-wide basis to supplement public enforcement efforts,<sup>512</sup> and consumers must not remain indifferent to the ing to sue only if he could demonstrate "special damage, in addition to that suffered by the public at large." Note, Equitable Devices for Controlling Organized Vice, 48 J. CRIM. L.C. & P.S. 623, 627 (1958). Today, injunctions against crime seem to be granted whenever the court is willing to characterize the conduct as a nuisance. D. DOBBS, supra note 471, at 116. Since there has been no hesitancy in allowing the state to enjoin the operation of houses of gambling and prostitution, it would seem that a private citizen asserting special damages to a property interest could similarly obtain injunctive relief against such a public nuisance. See Note, supra, at 624-27. By characterizing fencing activity as a public nuisance, it would not be inappropriate for a court, drawing an analogy between fencing and a continuous trespass, to enjoin this type of conduct. See generally D. DOBBS, supra note 471, at 59-60, 348-49.

In the case of a shipper seeking an injunction against a carrier, or vice versa, the case for private injunctive relief is even stronger, since the court would not be enjoining the commission of a criminal act, but, rather, would be prohibiting conduct that facilitates the commission of theft and fencing activity. The party subject to the injunction obviously would not be a criminal defendant; he would be a shipper, or a carrier who is responsible for transporting the goods. Note that in either case, adequate relief might not be available at law, since stolen goods are often impossible to locate or identify. In the absence of proper identification, criminal prosecutions are doomed to failure and civil relief will not be available. See notes 226-34 supra and accompanying text.

511. See REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 28. The public may tend to view the fence as "providing a much-needed social service for the hard-pressed consumer." Chappell & Walsh, Receiving Stolen Property 492. See notes 45-47, 49 supra and accompanying text. Expressions of public approval, demonstrated by the consumer's continued willingness to buy stolen goods, have caused at least some fences to view their activity as a victimless crime. See C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 147-50.

512. For example, recent Senate committee hearings, investigating criminal fencing systems, elicited the following observation:

No greater truism has been highlighted in this committee's extensive hearings on cargo theft and fencing than the fact that law enforcement working alone cannot get the job done in this area of crime. The transportation industry must assume the responsibility for preventing thefts and accounting for the goods left in its care for transfer. Without industry's help, law enforcement's job of apprehending and successfully prosecuting thieves—not to mention the fences who induce and encourage thievery—is a most difficult task at best.

REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 12.

Appropriate industry reforms should be initiated in at least the following areas: hiring practices, personnel policies, packaging techniques, cargo verification procedures, inventory control, accounting and bookkeeping, employee supervision, and economic consequences of their illegal purchases.<sup>513</sup>

Legislatures should assume responsibility for encouraging new attitudes<sup>514</sup> and give private citizens a significant financial stake in detecting and reporting fencing activity. Thus, a modernization of our fencing laws to recognize that redistribution systems operate on traditional economic principles and vary considerably in sophistication and impact is a prerequisite to more effective control of modern theft and fencing operations.

Nevertheless, legislative reform alone will not guarantee success because these reforms, however well-designed, will have to be properly implemented. For instance, since fencing is now to a significant extent an interstate crime, effective investigations require increased cooperation between federal and state enforcement agencies.<sup>515</sup> More fundamentally, however, law enforcement agencies must restructure their priorities so that emphasis is placed on convicting the fence rather than the thief. This will frequently mean granting so-called use immunity to thieves in order to gather incriminating evidence against major fences. Additionally, law enforcement agencies must assign different priorities to the different types of receivers. No special effort should be made against neighborhood fences, since their economic impact is relatively slight and they are often detected in the course of other investigations anyway. Master fences have the gravest consequences for our society, but they are by far the most physical plant security. A detailed discussion of security-oriented proposals for industry-wide adoption is beyond the scope of this study. Nevertheless, extensive recommendations have been made for the transportation and securities industries. See CARGO THEFT AND ORGANIZED CRIME 43-61; Dept. of Justice Release, Suggestions by the Dept. of Justice for Safe Handling of Marketable Securities by Financial Institutions, Including Hints for Detecting Counterfeit, Forged, Worthless, and Spurious Securities (Dec. 23, 1974); A REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT ON THE NATIONAL CARGO SECURITY PROGRAM 4-6 (1976).

To the extent that industry is unwilling to implement the necessary reforms, legislative consideration should be given to establishing administrative controls. Compliance with administrative regulations could be made a condition of doing business. On the federal level, agencies currently regulating the transportation industry and the security field provide an existing structure from which controls could be imposed.

513. But see C. KLOCKARS, supra note 12, at 150.

514. Gallup Polls have repeatedly indicated that Americans consider crime one of the most important national problems, even more important than economic issues. See, e.g., Richmond Times Dispatch, July 27, 1975, at A-20, col. 1 (number one). Political leadership seems unable to translate that concern into more effective crime control programs. For a number of concrete proposals, see J. WILSON, THINKING ABOUT CRIME (1975).

515. "[F]ences . . . are no respectors of boundaries established by local and State criminal justice agencies. Vast amounts of stolen property are regularly transported across State and even National borders . . . as part of a redistribution system developed by fences." REPORT, THE IMPACT OF CRIME 11. difficult to convict. To gather the evidence necessary to convict these receivers, police must frequently employ extensive undercover and electronic surveillance operations. As a practical matter, therefore, enforcement efforts are best directed at professional fences since their apparently legitimate operations can be pierced relatively easily with the help of informants and with electronic surveillance.<sup>516</sup> Preliminary investigation is obviously needed to obtain the probable cause required for a court order authorizing electronic surveillance, but this should not be a major barrier because professional receivers lack the protective insulation of master fences. Concentrating on professional fences also should result in the apprehension of their suppliers, who are themselves a potentially valuable source of information about other fences. Consequently, by establishing priorities along these lines, authorities can employ their limited resources in the most efficient manner.

This review of the history and development of theft and fencing has documented the need for reform in the substantive law and in law enforcement practices. The current state of the law is simply not equipped to cope with a problem that is already extremely serious, and that can only get worse. America has too much crime of all kinds. It is time that action be taken to control it. What needs to be done is relatively clear. All that stands in the way of reform is political will.

516. A "bug," rather than a wiretap, should be used because the professional fence usually conducts his illegal transactions on a person-to-person basis in his store. the telephone is not as frequently used for fencing matters.

APPENDIX A
Analysis of Uniform Crime Reports Statistics:
Stolen and Recovered Property 1960-75

For a number of years, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (F.B.I.) has collected, on a limited basis, statistics on the amount of property stolen and recovered annually. This information, however, has apparently never been comprehensively analyzed. This appendix, based on F.B.I. statistics for the years 1960 through 1975,<sup>1</sup> attempts to identify the major trends in the incidence of crimes against property and to evaluate the effectiveness of existing law enforcement efforts to recover stolen property.

The F.B.I. statistics analyzed in this appendix were collected each year from various local and state law enforcement agencies.<sup>2</sup> Six categories of statistics are reported: clothing, currency, fur, jewelry and precious metals, locally stolen automobiles, and "miscellaneous." The "miscellaneous" category includes all property not included in the other categories, such as office equipment, televisions, radios, stereophonic equipment, firearms, household goods, consumable goods, and livestock.

For purposes of this appendix, the statistics have been grouped into three broad categories: (1) automobiles; (2) miscellaneous; and (3) "all other," which includes clothing, furs, currency, and jewelry. To facilitate comparison of yearly figures, the absolute dollar amounts first have been adjusted to report the dollar value per 100 persons, in order to account for increases in population, and then converted into "constant 1960 dollars" to account for inflation.<sup>3</sup> Where appropriate, however, values are

1. These statistics are reported annually by the F.B.I. in its series of Uniform Crime Reports under the title CRIME IN THE UNITED STATES (as part of the Uniform Crime Reporting Program which was initiated in 1930). All figures are taken from the table, entitled "Type and Value of Property Stolen and Recovered."

2. During the fifteen year period under study, the number of local enforcement agencies reporting to the F.B.I. increased significantly. In 1960, reporting agencies represented a population base of only 120.8 million people; by 1975, this population base had increased to 162.4 million. Before 1969, only statistics from cities with a population of at least 25,000 were reported, but the F.B.I.'s yearly statistical reports since then have included data from cities of at least 2,500 persons. It is also possible to use these F.B.I. data to estimate a total crime against property figures. The population for the United States in 1974 was, for example, 211.9 million people. U.S. DEPT. OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES: 1975 Table No. 2, at 5 (U.S. Bureau of the Census, 95th ed. 1974). This projects to a total figure of $336,285,300. It is less than the estimate employed by the Department of Commerce. See note 32 supra. Its estimate included more factors. F.B.I. figures are limited to index offenses (burglary, robbery, larceny over $50, and auto theft); the Commerce Department made an effort to be comprehensive. Finally, it is recognized that the F.B.I. figures are subject to substantial understatement. See Appendix A, note 4 infra.

3. These factors were derived from the information pertaining to consumer prices reflected in U.S. DEPT. OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES, 1975, at 414 (96th ed. 1975) (Purchasing Power of the Dollar: 1940 to 1975, Table No. 678).

quoted in both "current 1975 dollars," that is, dollar amounts not adjusted to reflect inflation, and "constant 1960 dollars."

A. The Statistics Presented

Graph 1 and tables 1 and 2 report that the current 1975 dollar value of property stolen per 100 persons rose from 502 dollars in 1960 to 1796 dollars in 1975, an increase of approximately 294 per cent. Measured in terms of constant 1960 dollars, the value of property stolen per 100 persons increased from 502 dollars to 1061 dollars, or approximately 111 per cent. Table 3 gives percentage composition of total goods stolen.

The increase in the value of stolen property reflects an across-the-board increase in all three categories reported in tables 1 and 2. Very significantly, however, the data in table 2 show the increase in the value of miscellaneous items stolen was by far the most pronounced. The value of miscellaneous property stolen in constant dollars per 100 people increased from 112 dollars to 435 dollars, or 288 per cent, during the fifteen year period. In sharp contrast, the increases in the value of stolen automobiles and "all other" items were, respectively, 60 per cent and 59 per cent.

Table 4 represents the percentage of stolen property recovered during the fifteen-year period. It shows a decline from 52.4 per cent to 29.9 per cent. Between 1960 and 1966, however, the recovery rate actually increased to a high of 55 per cent; but since then the rate has dropped by an average of more than 2.5 per cent per year.

Table 5 illustrates that the relative composition of stolen property recovered has remained remarkably similar. In 1960, automobiles accounted for 87 per cent of stolen property recovered, miscellaneous items accounted for 8.3 per cent, and "all other" property accounted for 4.7 per cent. In 1975, these percentages were 77.3 per cent for autos, 16.6 per cent for miscellaneous, and 6.1 per cent for "all other" property stolen.

B. Observations<sup>4</sup>

(1) There is a high correlation between increases and decreases in the value of miscellaneous property stolen and increases and decreases in

4. When analyzing this material, several factors necessarily qualify any conclusions. First, it can safely be assumed that since 1960 improvements in crime detection techniques and in the collection of statistics are responsible for some part of the apparent increase in crime, although the F.B.I. has tried to minimize this factor. Second, since F.B.I. figures necessarily reflect only those crimes that are actually reported to law enforcement agencies, the data used are not completely accurate indicators of the incidence of particular crimes. Recently, the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration and the Bureau of the Census have endeavored to calculate the extent of unreported crime, but until their work is completed and carefully analyzed it must be assumed that the theft of personal property is one area where this phenomenon is most apparent. See CRIMINAL VICTIMIZATION: SURVEYS IN 13 AMERICAN CITIES (U.S. Dept. of Justice: LEAA 1975). The rate of reported crime in Boston was, for example, robbery, 33 per cent; theft, 28 per cent, burglary, 56 per cent; and auto theft, 68 per cent. Id. at 22. Finally, statistics are gathered from only the most heavily populated and highest crime areas. This means the results may overstate theft rates and understate recovery rates.

the total value of property stolen. This correlation is most dramatically revealed by the data since 1966, which shows that a sharp rise in the theft rate for miscellaneous property accounts for a substantial, simultaneous increase in the overall property theft rate.

(2) By 1973, the value of miscellaneous property stolen was almost as large as the value of automobiles stolen. This is a significant reversal of a trend observable in the first half of the period studied, when the value of automobiles stolen was approximately twice as large as the value of miscellaneous items stolen. Significantly, this reversal may be largely explained by the very rapid increase in the theft of miscellaneous items.

(3) The recovery rate was constant until 1966, when it began to drop significantly. This continuous decline in the recovery rate during 1967-1975 coincides with the sharply increasing theft of miscellaneous property stolen.

(4) Despite the changes in the composition of stolen property between 1960 and 1975, the composition of property recovered has remained relatively similar. The primary explanation for this difference is the inability of law enforcement agencies to recover a substantially greater amount of stolen miscellaneous and other property even though thefts of this type of property have increased significantly.

(5) The recovery of automobiles consistently accounts for the greatest percentage of recovered property. The relative success of police in recovering stolen automobiles, however, is a misleading indicator of the ability of authorities to deal with theft for resale purposes. Very few automobiles are in fact taken with an intent permanently to deprive their owners of possession, and F.B.I. statistics include automobiles taken by joyriders or other persons needing quick, temporary transportation. After a brief time, these vehicles are abandoned and recovered. Further, stolen automobiles cannot be easily concealed because of their size; cannot be easily legitimized because they are required by statute to be marked with several permanent serial numbers; and can be relatively easily identified because they must be registered with state agencies and because there exists a national system to identify and recover stolen vehicles.<sup>5</sup>

(6) The theft of miscellaneous and other property is a better indicator of the incidence of theft for resale. The sudden upsurge in the theft of these items is undoubtedly the result of many factors.<sup>6</sup> Unlike automobiles, most miscellaneous and other items are small and therefore easy to conceal and to transport; most are not marked with serial numbers and therefore can be easily legitimized and resold without detection. Further, most of these kinds of thefts are not reported to the National Crime Information Center.

5. These observations are not meant to underrate the increasing problem of auto theft for profit. Statistics indicate that only 62 per cent of the cars stolen in 1975 were recovered, whereas more than 90 per cent were recovered in 1960. The sharp decrease in percentage of recovered stolen autos would seem to be related largely to two factors: the smaller percentage of joy ride thefts that has accompanied the installation of wheel locks and the growing practice of theft by professionals of autos for stripping that has accompanied the use of computer assisted auto part sales.

6. Of course, different factors will not affect all items (e.g., firearms, stereo equipment, etc.) in the same way.

MODEL THEFT AND FENCING ACT<sup>1</sup>

[Insert appropriate enacting clause].

[Statement of Purpose and Intent]

[It is the purpose of this Act to curtail theft and dealing in stolen property through the imposition of appropriate criminal sanctions and the provision of suitable civil remedies.]

[It is intended that this Act be construed neither strictly nor liberally, but in light of its purpose, and that its moderate sanctions be fully utilized.]

Sec. 1 [Short Title] This Act shall be known and may be cited as the "Theft and Fencing Control Act of [insert date]."

Part A

Sec. 2 [Theft]

(a) [Offense] A person is guilty of theft if he obtains or uses [, or endeavors<sup>2</sup> to obtain or use,] the property of another, with intent:<sup>3</sup>

(1) to deprive the other person of a right to the property or a benefit of the property; or

(2) to appropriate the property to his own use or to the use of another person.

(b) [Grading] A person who commits theft:

(1) shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both, if the property stolen has a value in excess of $100,000;

(2) shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, if the property stolen has a value in excess of $500 but not more than $100,000 or, regardless of its value, the property consists of:

(i) a firearm, ammunition, or a deadly weapon;

(ii) a vehicle, except as provided in subsection (b)(4);

(3) shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, if the property stolen has a value in excess of $100 but not more than $500; or

(4) shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, if:

(i) the property has a value of $100 or less; or

(ii) the property is an airplane, a motor vehicle or a vessel, the defendant is less than eighteen-years-old, and the defend-

2. The optional use of the word "endeavor" here and elsewhere in the Act avoids the incorporation of the common-law learning on impossibility. See United States v. Osborn, 385 U.S. 323 (1966).

3. Unless otherwise stated, the statute is drafted on the assumption that the state of mind requirement to be implied for conduct is "knowing" and for attendant circumstances is "recklessness." Compare MODEL PENAL CODE art. 2 (Proposed Official Draft 1962); S.1, ch. 3.

ant intended to deprive or appropriate the property only temporarily rather than permanently.<sup>4</sup>

Sec. 3 [Possession of Altered Property]

(a) [Offense] A person is guilty of possession of altered property if he is a dealer in property and he possesses property the identifying features of which, including serial numbers or labels, have been removed or in any fashion altered, without the consent of the manufacturer of the property.

(b) [Grading] A person who commits possession of altered property shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Sec. 4 [Dealing in Stolen Property]

(a) [Offense] A person is guilty of dealing in stolen property if he:

- (1) traffics in [,or endeavors to traffic in,]; or
- (2) initiates, organizes, plans, finances, directs, manages, or supervises the theft, and traffics in [, or endeavors to traffic in,] the property of another that has been stolen.

(b) [Grading] A person who deals in stolen property in violation of:

- (1) subsection (a)(1) shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both; or
- (2) subsection (a)(2) shall be fined not more than $15,000 or imprisoned not more than 15 years, or both.

Sec. 5 [Evidence]

(a) [Permissible inferences] In an action for theft or dealing in stolen property:

(1) Proof of possession of property recently stolen, unless satisfactorily explained, gives rise to an inference that the person in possession of the property was aware of the risk<sup>5</sup> that it had been stolen or that the person in some way participated in its theft;

(2) Proof of the purchase or sale of stolen property at a price substantially below its fair market value, unless satisfactorily explained, gives rise to an inference that the person buying or selling the property was aware of the risk that it had been stolen;

(3) Proof of the purchase or sale of stolen property by a dealer in property, out of the regular course of business, or without the usual indicia of ownership other than mere possession, unless satisfactorily explained, gives rise to an inference that the person buying or selling the property was aware of the risk that it had been stolen.

(b) [Accomplice Testimony] The testimony of an accomplice, if

4. Not all states key the grading of their conspiracy statutes to the substantive offense. Where conspiracy is a misdemeanor, it is recommended that a special felony level conspiracy provision be drafted. In addition, consideration should be given, if necessary, to abolishing any common-law rule that would make the receiver's conviction dependent upon the conviction of the thief.

5. On the constitutionality of this and other similar statutory presumptions, see Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837 (1973), holding that a recent possession inference is constitutional.

believed beyond a reasonable doubt, is sufficient for a conviction for conduct constituting an offense in violation of this Act.<sup>6</sup>

Sec. 6 [Entrapment]

It does not constitute a defense to a prosecution for conduct constituting an offense in violation of this Act that:

(1) stratagem or deception, including the use of an undercover operative or law enforcement officer, was employed;

(2) a facility or an opportunity to engage in such conduct, including offering for sale of property not stolen as if it were stolen, was provided; or

(3) mere solicitation that would not induce an ordinary law-abiding person to engage in such conduct was made by a law enforcement officer to gain evidence against a person predisposed to engage in such conduct.<sup>7</sup>

Sec. 7 [Definitions]

As used in this part:

(a) "dealer in property" means a person who buys and sells property as a business.

(b) "obtains or uses"<sup>8</sup> means any manner of:

(1) taking or exercising control over property;

(2) making an unauthorized use, disposition, or transfer of property; or

(3) obtaining property by fraud, and includes conduct previously known as theft, stealing, larceny, purloining, abstracting, embezzlement, misapplication, misappropriation, conversion, obtaining money or property by false pretenses, fraud, deception, and all other conduct similar in nature.

(c) "property" means anything of value, and includes:

(1) real property, including things growing on, affixed to, and found in land;

(2) tangible or intangible personal property, including rights, privileges, interests, and claims; or

(3) services.

(d) "property of another" means property in which a person has an interest upon which another person is not privileged to infringe without consent, whether or not the other person also has an interest in the property.

(e) "services" means anything of value resulting from a person's physical or mental labor or skill, or from the use, possession, or presence of property, and includes:

6. Some jurisdictions follow the rule that an accomplice's testimony in a theft or fencing prosecution must be corroborated to be sufficient for conviction. This provision should, if necessary, be included in the Act to preclude the application of this rule to prosecutions under this Act.

7. This provision guarantees that mistaken interpretations of the law will not frustrate legitimate law enforcement efforts to investigate the operations of professional fences.

8. The phrase is broad enough to cover the situation where property stolen in another jurisdiction is brought into a state. It would also include possession.

- (1) repairs or improvements to property;
- (2) professional services;
- (3) private or public or government communication, transportation, power, water, or sanitation services;
- (4) lodging accommodations; or
- (5) admissions to places of exhibition or entertainment.

(f) "stolen property" means property that has been the subject of any criminally wrongful taking.

(g) "traffic" means:

(1) to sell, transfer, distribute, dispense or otherwise dispose of to another person;

(2) to buy, receive, possess, or obtain control of or use with intent to sell, transfer, distribute, dispense or otherwise dispose of to another person.

(h) "value" means value determined according to the following:

(1) Except as otherwise provided, value means the market value of the property at the time and place of the offense, or if such cannot be satisfactorily ascertained, the cost of replacement of the property within a reasonable time after the offense.

(2) The value of a written instrument which does not have a readily ascertainable market value shall, in the case of an instrument such as a check, draft or promissory note, be deemed the amount due or collectible on it, and shall, in the case of any other instrument which creates, releases, discharges, or otherwise affects any valuable legal right, privilege or obligation, be deemed the greatest amount of economic loss which the owner of the instrument might reasonably suffer by virtue of the loss of the instrument.

(3) The value of a trade secret that does not have a readily ascertainable market value shall be deemed any reasonable value representing the damage to the owner suffered by reason of losing an advantage over those who do not know of or use the trade secret.

(4) If the value of property cannot be ascertained beyond a reasonable doubt pursuant to the standards set forth above, the trier of fact may find the value to be not less than a certain amount, and if no such minimum value can be thus ascertained, the value shall be deemed to be an amount less than $500.

(5) Amounts of value involved in thefts committed pursuant to one scheme or course of conduct, whether from the same person or several persons, may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense.

Part B

Sec. 8 [Alternative Fine]

(a) [Twice Gain or Loss] In lieu of a fine otherwise authorized by law, a defendant who has been found guilty of conduct constituting an offense in violation of this Act through which he derived pecuniary value or by which he caused personal injury or property damage or other loss, may, upon motion of the [insert appropriate phrase] be sentenced to pay a fine that does not exceed twice the gross value gained or twice the gross loss caused, whichever is the greater, plus the costs of investigation and prosecution.

(b) [Hearing] The court<sup>9</sup> shall hold a hearing to determine the amount of the fine to be imposed under subsection (a).

(c) [Pecuniary Value] As used in this section, "pecuniary value" means:

(1) anything of value in the form of money, a negotiable instrument, a commercial interest, or anything else the primary significance of which is economic advantage; or

(2) any other property or service that has a value in excess of $100.

Part C: Injunctions and Damages

Sec. 9 [Injunctions]

(a) [General] In addition to what is otherwise authorized by law, the [insert appropriate phrase] shall have jurisdiction to prevent and restrain conduct constituting an offense in violation of this Act. The [insert appropriate phrase] may issue appropriate orders, including:

(1) ordering any person to divest himself of any interest in any organization;

(2) imposing reasonable restraints on the future conduct of any person, including making investments or prohibiting any person from engaging in the same type of organization involved in the offense; or

(3) ordering the dissolution or reorganization of any organization, making due provision for the rights of innocent persons.

(b) [Application by [insert appropriate phrase]] The [insert appropriate phrase] may institute proceedings under subsection (a). In any such proceeding, the [insert appropriate phrase] shall move as soon as practicable to a hearing and determination. Pending final determination, the [insert appropriate phrase] may at any time enter such restraining orders or prohibitions or take such other actions as are in the interest of justice.

(c) [Application by Private Party] Any person may institute a proceeding under subsection (a). In such proceeding, relief shall be granted in conformity with the principles that govern the granting of injunctive relief from threatened loss or damage in other civil cases, except that no showing of special or irreparable damage to the person shall have to be made. Upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an injunction improvidently granted and a showing of immediate danger of significant loss or damage, a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction may be issued in any such action before a final determination on the merits.

Sec. 10 [Damages]

(a) [Suit by the [insert appropriate phrase]] If the [insert appropriate phrase] is injured by reason of any conduct constituting an offense in violation of this Act, the [insert appropriate phrase] may bring a civil action and recover damages as specified in subsection (c) and the cost of the action.

(b) [Suit by a Private Person] If a private person is injured by reason of any conduct constituting an offense in violation of this Act, the private person may bring a civil action and recover damages as specified in subsection (c), attorney's fees and costs of investigation and litigation, reasonably incurred.

12. Authorization to employ electronic surveillance is essential in complex fencing investigations. Existing legislation does not always make it clearly available. See THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL, supra Appendix B, note 11, at 34-36. While twenty-three states authorize electronic surveillance in specific instances, surveillance in fencing investigations may not be permitted in all situations. See, e.g., FLA. STAT. OF THE UNITED STATES

War On Organized Crime Faltering -- Federal Strike Forces Not Getting The Job Done

Department of Justice

Organized crime still flourishes, despite 10 years of work by Federal strike forces to combat it. Why?

- Consumer demand for organized crime's goods and services provide it with billions of dollars of income each year.
- Federal work against organized crime is not planned, organized, or directed efficiently.
- Most convictions obtained by strike forces have resulted in no prison sentences or sentences of less than 2 years.

The Department of Justice agrees that the Federal effort against organized crime can be better managed.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON, D.C. 20548

B-178618

To the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives

This report addresses the Federal effort to coordinate the fight against organized crime through the Justice Department's strike forces and makes recommendations for improvement. Strike forces are located in areas of major organized crime activity and are composed primarily of representatives from Federal investigative agencies and attorneys of the Justice Department. Our report covers the operations of six strike forces located in Cleveland, Detroit, Los Angeles, New Orleans, Brooklyn, and Manhattan.

We made this review to determine the efficiency of the strike force program. Our review was made pursuant to the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (31 U.S.C. 53), and the Accounting and Auditing Act of 1950 (31 U.S.C. 67).

Copies of this report are being sent to the Director, Office of Management and Budget, and to the heads of the departments and agencies directly involved in the strike force program.

ACTING Comptroller General of the United States

D I G E S T

Organized crime is a serious national problem. The Federal Government is making a special effort to combat it with 13 joint-agency strike forces around the country, whose goal is to launch a coordinated attack against this problem. This goal has not been accomplished. About $80 million is spent each year to investigate and prosecute organized crime figures. Although the Federal Government has made some progress in the organized crime fight, organized crime is still flourishing.

Elimination of organized crime will be difficult, if not impossible. But more could be done if Federal efforts were better planned, organized, directed, and executed.

The escalated war on organized crime began in 1966 when the President directed the Attorney General to develop a unified program against racketeering. The idea was to coordinate the resources of all Federal law enforcement agencies. In 1970 the National Council on Organized Crime was established to formulate a strategy for eliminating organized crime. The Council met for only 1 year and failed to formulate a strategy.

Work at strike forces in Cleveland, Detroit, Los Angeles, New Orleans, and New York (Brooklyn and Manhattan) showed that:

- The Government still has not developed a strategy to fight organized crime. (See p. 9.)
- There is no agreement on what organized crime is and, consequently, on precisely whom or what the Government is fighting. (See p. 8.)
- The strike forces have no statements of objectives or plans for achieving those objectives. (See p. 10.)

- Individual strike forces are hampered because the Justice attorneys-in-charge have no authority over participants from other agencies. (See p. 11.)
- No system exists for evaluating the effectiveness of the national effort or of individual strike forces. (See ch. 3.)
- A costly computerized organized crime intelligence system is, as the Department of Justice agrees, of dubious value. (See ch. 5.)

Strike forces have obtained numerous convictions; however, sentences generally have been light. At the strike forces reviewed, 52 percent of the sentences during a 4-year period did not call for confinement, and only 20 percent of the sentences were for 2 years or more. (See ch. 4.)

GAO presents detailed recommendations that point out the need to:

- Identify what and whom the strike forces are combating.
- Develop a national strategy for fighting organized crime.
- Centralize Federal efforts--give someone the responsibility and authority for developing plans and overseeing their implementation.
- Establish a system for evaluating the effectiveness of the national and individual strike force efforts.

The Department knows the program is in trouble. In a recent study it concluded that although the program had been in operation for nearly a decade, no one could seriously suggest that organized crime had been eliminated or even controlled. The Department of Justice therefore agrees that the Federal effort against organized crime can be better managed. (See app. VII.)

The Department stated that formulating a universally applicable and acceptable definition of organized crime will be difficult, although necessary, because of the special purpose for which the strike forces were created. In practice, the work done by strike forces has been hampered by this problem of definition. Since strike forces were established for a special purpose, there is little reason why an acceptable definition cannot be agreed upon. (See p. 14.)

The Department also stated that it is making management changes to improve its program and that the National Council on Organized Crime, if convened as recommended by GAO, need not therefore undertake a management function. According to the Department, the Council should serve rather as a forum where general matters are discussed and where an overview of organized crime strategy is developed. (See p. 14.)

Because the Attorney General has the role of coordinating the fight against organized crime, the Department of Justice should continue to manage the strike force program. However, because the Council includes officials from all participating agencies, it could be the vehicle to bring about a more coordinated Federal effort. The Council could produce a clear statement on what is expected of the strike force program, set specific ways to most effectively meet program objectives, and establish the commitment of resources necessary from the agencies to carry out the program's objectives. (See pp. 14 and 15.)

The Department of Justice has been conducting its own review of the program since January 1976 and said that changes in managers of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section and in the strike forces' operations respond to many of GAO's concerns.

The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice characterized organized crime as follows:

"Organized crime is a society that seeks to operate outside the control of the American people and their governments. It involves thousands of criminals, working within structures as complex as those of any large corporation, subject to laws more rigidly enforced than those of legitimate governments. Its actions are not impulsive but rather the result of intricate conspiracies, carried on over many years and aimed at gaining control over whole fields of activity in order to amass huge profits."

Organized crime affects the lives of millions of citizens and derives billions of dollars in illegal income annually from its activities. The Federal Government is currently spending about $80 million each year to investigate and prosecute organized crime figures and their associates.

To combat organized crime nationwide, the Attorney General created 18 Federal strike forces. In this report, our first on strike force activities, we reviewed six strike forces in Cleveland; Detroit; Los Angeles; New Orleans; and Brooklyn and Manhattan, New York. (See app. I.) Specifically, we discuss:

- How strike forces are organized and operated.
- The planning and direction of strike force efforts.
- The need to evaluate the program's success in reducing organized crime.
- The Department of Justice's organized crime intelligence system.

ORGANIZED CRIME IN THE UNITED STATES

The Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 (Public Law 91-452) states that organized crime threatens the domestic security and undermines the general welfare of the Nation. Although exact figures are not available, the Department of Justice estimated that organized crime derives as much as $50 billion a year from gambling in addition to income from narcotics and loan sharking operations.

Income from organized crime is used to make inroads into legitimate business and labor unions. The President's Commission reported that organized crime uses illegitimate methods--monopolization, terrorism, extortion, and tax evasion--to drive out lawful ownership and leadership and to exact illegal profits from the public. To carry out its activities, organized crime often corrupts public officials. The Law Enforcement Assistance Administration reported that payments for corruption probably represent the largest single expense of organized crime, and without corruption organized crime could not exist.

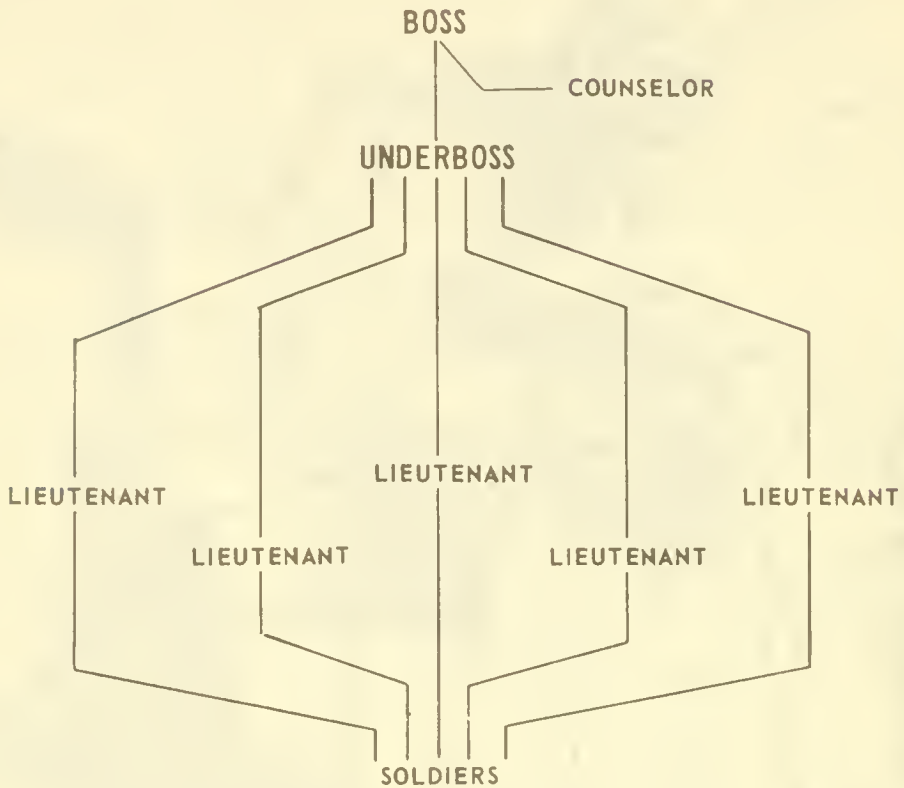

As reported by the President's Commission in February 1967, the core of organized crime, frequently referred to as La Cosa Nostra, consists of 24 "families" located in major cities throughout the country. Each family works with, and often controls, other organized crime groups operating within its area. Membership in the families varies from about 20 to 700.

The following charts were extracted from the President's Commission study and show where organized crime is concentrated, how the families are organized, and the types of activities in which they engage.

FEDERAL EFFORTS AGAINST ORGANIZED CRIME

Federal efforts against organized crime began in the office of the Attorney General. In July 1954 the Attorney General established within the Criminal Division an Organized Crime and Racketeering Section (OCRS) to

- coordinate enforcement activities against organized crime,
- initiate and supervise investigations,
- accumulate and correlate intelligence data,
- formulate general prosecutive policies, and
- assist Federal prosecuting attorneys throughout the country.

In 1966 the President, directing Federal law enforcement officials to review the national program against organized crime, designated the Attorney General to be the focal point for developing a unified program against racketeering.

Because conventional methods of law enforcement had proven ineffective against organized crime, between January 1967 and April 1971 OCRS established 18 Federal strike forces, staffed with Justice Attorneys and representatives from other Federal investigative and law enforcement agencies. As of December 1976, strike forces were operating in Boston, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Miami, Newark, Philadelphia, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C. Strike forces were terminated in Baltimore (1974) and, after our review, in Manhattan, New Orleans, Pittsburgh, and St. Louis (1976).

In addition to OCRS, the following Federal organizations participate in the strike force program:

- Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms
- U.S. Customs Service
- Department of Labor
- Drug Enforcement Administration
- Federal Bureau of Investigation
- Immigration and Naturalization Service
- Internal Revenue Service

--Securities and Exchange Commission

--U.S. Postal Service

--U.S. Marshals Service

--U.S. Secret Service

The Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 provided Federal law enforcement officials and the courts with additional legal weapons to use against organized crime, including the authority to --establish special grand juries to investigate organized criminal activities within their districts and to issue reports on these investigations at their discretion and

--impose extended prison sentences of up to 25 years for "dangerous special offenders."

In addition, in 1970 the National Council on Organized Crime was established to formulate a national strategy to eliminate organized crime. The Council, chaired by the Attorney General, is composed of high-level representatives of Federal departments and agencies having major responsibilities affecting or affected by the activities of organized crime.

CHAPTER 2STRIKE FORCE PROGRAM NEEDS ANATIONAL STRATEGY AND CENTRALIZEDDIRECTION

Organized crime strike forces were created to launch a coordinated attack against a serious national problem. They were unsuccessful, however, for a number of reasons.

The Department of Justice established the strike force program because it knew that a national approach to combating organized crime was needed. In 1970 the Attorney General stated that he intended to deal with and eventually eliminate organized crime and that this goal could best be achieved through a national strategy implemented by the strike forces.

A national effort, however, has been unsuccessful because

- the National Council on Organized Crime has not developed a national strategy to fight organized crime and has not met since June 1971,
- Justice's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section has not adequately planned and directed the efforts against organized crime and thus has limited any national coordinated effort to fight this problem, and
- limited authority over participating agencies precludes attorneys-in-charge of strike forces from assuming a more active role.

These factors and the lack of agreement as to what "organized crime" is suggest that Federal efforts against organized crime are more the result of individual decisions made at the local level than the result of a national strategy, as originally envisioned. In essence, there is no coordinated Federal effort to fight organized crime. In practice, each participating agency fights organized crime as it sees fit and uses strike force attorneys for advice and prosecution. (App. II describes how a strike force operates.)

A 1976 Justice study of the OCRS intelligence system stated that, although the strike force program had been in operation for nearly a decade, no one could seriously suggest that the problem of organized crime had been eliminated or even brought under control.

NO AGREEMENT ON DEFINITION OF "ORGANIZED CRIME"

Before a problem can be dealt with, it must be adequately defined. Participating Federal agencies cannot completely agree on what the term "organized crime" encompasses.

In 1970, to define the relationship between U.S. attorneys and strike forces, the Attorney General defined organized crime as

"* * * all illegal activities engaged in by members of criminal syndicates operative throughout the United States, and all illegal activities engaged in by known associates and confederates of such members."

Despite this definition, a study issued by the U.S. Attorneys' Advisory Committee in 1974 noted that 47 of 88 U.S. attorneys said that organized crime was not sufficiently defined to delineate prosecutive responsibility. Some felt that a definition should be based on

- the type of crime involved,
- a list of known organized crime figures, or
- particular statutes.

At the operational level, problems of definition also exist. An internal Justice report issued in 1974 stated that confusion existed over the scope of the strike force's jurisdiction; i.e., the definition of organized crime.

Definitions of organized crime provided by Federal agency personnel participating in the program varied widely. At one extreme the term was defined to include only members of La Cosa Nostra, while at the other extreme organized crime included any group of two or more persons formed to commit a criminal act.

Following are some of the definitions agency officials provided:

- Any organized group involved in the commission of a crime.
- Activities normally associated with La Cosa Nostra figures or with corrupt public officials.
- Any criminal activity performed on a large and sophisticated scale, such as gambling.

--A continuous pattern of criminal activity by the same group or individual which has a monopolistic impact on an industry or area.

The lack of a uniform definition has resulted in problems with prosecutorial jurisdiction and, more importantly, in not applying consistent criteria nationwide for selecting the targets of the strike forces.

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON ORGANIZED CRIME
FAILED TO ESTABLISH A NATIONAL STRATEGY

On June 4, 1970, Executive Order 11534 established the National Council on Organized Crime and made it responsible for formulating an effective, coordinated, national strategy to eliminate organized crime.

Although relationships among agencies participating in the strike force program had developed at the operational level, the fight against organized crime under the new Council would now have the necessary strategic as well as tactical planning. The Council, providing impetus to the fight and uniting all agencies in a cooperative venture, established as its goal the elimination of organized crime by 1976.

Chaired by the Attorney General, the Council was composed of high-level representatives of Federal departments and agencies having major responsibilities affecting or affected by the activities of organized crime. The Council established an executive committee and seven working committees. (See app. III.) The executive committee was to direct the Council's work while the working committees were to --analyze needs,

--identify fruitful areas of endeavor,

--support the various departments on budget and manpower requests, and

--coordinate all departments while attempting to eliminate rackets.

The Council met five times but failed to formulate a national strategy to fight organized crime. It has not met since June 1971. A Justice official said that the Department does not know why the Council failed to develop a national strategy and that there are no plans to reconvene the Council.

The Council has made, thus far, only two achievements. First, proposals were made and accepted to establish strike forces in Pittsburgh, Baltimore, San Francisco, and Kansas City. Second, one working committee, the Gambling Rackets Committee, initiated an investigation into nationwide sports gambling, which resulted in the arrest of 27 persons and the seizure of over $2.3 million in currency, securities, checks, and notes.

OCRS IS NOT DEEPLY INVOLVED IN PLANNING AND DIRECTING THE STRIKE FORCE PROGRAM

In spite of the Council's lack of overall program planning and direction, OCRS has not (1) developed a national strategy to fight organized crime, (2) adequately defined organized crime, or (3) formulated objectives for its strike forces.

In July 1974 a committee appointed by the Attorney General reported that organized crime activities by their very nature were nationwide and, consequently, that centralized Federal direction and planning were essential.

In 1976 the Office of Management and Finance reported, however, that OCRS and strike force officials generally believed there was no national strategy against organized crime. Strike force agents said they knew of no national strategy promulgated by OCRS or their own agencies. The report noted that field agents seemed to use the traditional reactive approach of investigating individual suspects and specific offenses and that the apparent effort against organized crime was one of attrition.

The Office of Management and Finance further reported that OCRS did not have a unit to conduct, analyze, or produce the information necessary to support the planning or operations of a nationwide program to fight organized crime.

The Office of Management and Finance report pointed out that, to develop a meaningful national strategy, there has to be a reliable information base on organized crime. According to the report, every agency involved in the Federal effort against organized crime admits that such information is not available. If it were, the following unresolved policy issues could be addressed:

- What is society's ultimate objective concerning organized crime? Do we intend to eliminate organized crime, to control it by containing it at some current level or by rolling it back to some lower level, or to accept a tolerable level of organized crime?

--How will the strategy chosen be executed and how will execution be monitored?

OCRS has furnished little formal written direction to its strike forces. An exception to this occurred in August 1974, when OCRS advised the strike forces of the importance of prosecuting gambling violations, because gambling is organized crime's main source of income. OCRS outlined guidelines for reworking all gambling cases for the previous 5 years.

OCRS officials said that planning and establishing objectives were best accomplished by the individual strike forces, although OCRS does not require them to do so. Six strike forces reviewed had not established definitive objectives covering their operations. Further, although we agree that goals for individual strike forces are necessary, we believe that they should be developed within an overall framework encompassing the national problem.

STRIKE FORCE ATTORNEYS-IN-CHARGE CANNOT DIRECT INVESTIGATIVE PRIORITIES

In the absence of a national strategy or overall policy direction from Washington, the responsibility for planning rests with the strike forces. However, strike force attorneys-in-charge do not have authority to direct investigative priorities within their jurisdictions and, as pointed out on page 8, they are faced with various interpretations of the term "organized crime."

In January 1967 Justice established a pilot project in Buffalo, New York--the forerunner to the existing strike force program. The project brought together a team of supervisory attorneys and investigators from Federal law enforcement agencies to mount an attack against local organized crime.

This team jointly

- identified the power structure of the local organized crime "family,"
- targeted individuals whose removal would most severely damage criminal operations, and
- initiated prosecutions in areas in which prosecution would be successful and would seriously curtail the activities of the criminal organization.

The pilot project operated until 1968, and the assistant attorney general in charge of the Criminal Division at that time described it as "the most fruitful technique available for major impact on organized crime." On the basis of the success of the Buffalo project, the Attorney General decided to locate strike forces throughout the country.

In establishing the strike force program, however, the Attorney General did not promulgate formal operational guidelines for the participating Federal agencies or define authority and responsibilities of the attorneys-in-charge. The strike force attorney-in-charge has little discretionary power over what is investigated in his jurisdiction and on what activities investigative priorities are established. These decisions are made by the participating agencies, not by the strike force, and the agencies decide at what stage in an investigation strike force attorneys will become involved.

A House Government Operations Committee study (H. Rept. 1574, June 30, 1968) recognized that Justice generally does not have line authority over the investigative and law enforcement operations of other Federal agencies.

The strike force attorney-in-charge cannot require participating Federal agencies to conduct specific investigations or assign additional manpower and other resources to the strike force program. With the exception of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, strike force personnel are not under the control of the attorney-in-charge. Some representatives do not work full time on strike force matters and do not work out of the strike force office.

The program appears dependent to a great extent on the cooperation of participating agencies and development of personal relationships. The degree of cooperation, however, is not mandated. An internal Justice evaluation in 1974 identified as one of the program's weaknesses many instances of uneven participation by the agencies represented on the strike forces. We believe that until participating agencies' roles are delineated--such as objectives defined, cooperation circumscribed, investigative criteria developed, and resources committed--the Federal effort will remain uncoordinated.

CONCLUSION

Because agencies participating on the strike forces cannot uniformly agree on the definitive scope of the term "organized crime," the crime problem cannot be adequately defined nor can progress toward its solution be measured. The National Council did not establish a national strategy for fighting organized crime, nor has Justice filled the void.

There is furthermore no central direction of the strike force program, including established goals and priorities. Limited authority over participating agencies precludes the strike force attorney-in-charge from assuming a more active role in planning strike force efforts. Federal efforts will remain uncoordinated until agencies' roles are delineated and resources committed.

RECOMMENDATIONS

We recommend that the Attorney General:

- Define organized crime so that consistent criteria may be applied nationwide for selecting the targets of the strike forces.
- Reconvene the National Council to develop specific goals as well as a unified approach to fighting organized crime and set specific priorities in a clear mission statement to be used by all strike forces.
- Develop, in conjunction with the other participating agencies, agreements delineating each agency's (1) role in the strike forces, including the role of the attorney-in-charge, and (2) commitment of resources.
- Seek a Presidential order requiring the other agencies' cooperation and commitment, should he not receive satisfaction from these agencies.

AGENCY COMMENTS AND OUR EVALUATION

Department of Justice

The Department of Justice, in commenting on our report (see app. VII), stated it shares our concern that organized crime still flourishes. The Department agrees that the Federal effort against organized crime can be better planned, organized, directed, and executed and said that it is working toward these objectives. The Department, however, stated that law enforcement can deal with only one side of the organized crime equation. Organized crime is a business which depends, as do all businesses, on customer acceptance and patronage. The Department said it must be understood and emphasized that whatever program is designed by law enforcement, that program can only deal with the "supply" side of the equation; the "demand" side is, in the final analysis, dependent on the actions and reactions of the American public. The Department added that even if it perfected an optimum method of "planning, organizing, executing, and directing" an organized crime program, organized crime may well continue to "flourish" in the above sense.

Addressing our recommendation for a workable strike force definition of organized crime, the Department said that to formulate such a universally applicable and acceptable definition of organized crime is difficult. But it recognizes that the special purpose for which the strike forces were created requires a clear and uniform articulation of investigative objectives. Although the strike forces were created for the special purpose of providing a coordinated national effort to fight organized crime, in practice this effort has been hampered because of definitional confusion as noted on pages 8 and 9. And since strike forces were established for a special purpose, there is little reason why an acceptable definition of the strike forces' targets cannot be agreed upon.

The Department initiated a requirement in early 1976 that it review prospective strike force investigations before they are begun rather than after they are completed. We agree with the Department that reviewing case initiation reports will be helpful in determining the legitimacy of cases for strike force efforts.

However, since participating agencies determine at what investigative stage strike force attorneys become involved, an investigation could be nearly completed before the case is presented to the strike force as an organized crime case. Therefore, we believe that for strike force efforts to be more effective, agency investigations should be brought to the strike forces' attention early so that decisions can be made concerning (1) their merit, (2) the need for other agency involvement and coordination, and (3) additional prosecutive requirements.

As a result of management changes in efforts to improve program effectiveness, the Department of Justice believes that if the National Council on Organized Crime is convened, the Council need not undertake a management function. The Department said the Council should serve as a forum where general matters are discussed and where an overview of organized crime strategy is developed.

We believe that, because the Attorney General has the role of coordinating the fight against organized crime, overall management of the strike force program should remain in the Department of Justice. We believe, however, that because the Council includes officials from all participating agencies, it could be the vehicle to bring about a more coordinated Federal effort. The Council could produce a clear mission statement on what is expected of the strike force program; set specific priorities on how to arrive most effectively at meeting program objectives; and establish the needed agency commitment of resources necessary to carry out the program's objectives. Specifying where the program is going and how it intends to get there is prerequisite to evaluating its progress.

The Department said that the concept of interagency cooperation as originally conceived for strike forces is a good one. However, in practice, the effectiveness of strike forces has been limited somewhat by the inability of the attorney-in-charge to task each agency investigatively. This problem will continue to some extent, since an organizational entity cannot be given responsibility without authority. The Department said, however, that interagency cooperation is increasing. The Department added that if satisfaction is not received, it will seek assistance from progressively higher levels of authority in its efforts to acquire the cooperation and commitment of agencies.

We believe that, to achieve a Federally coordinated effort, the participating agencies need agreements setting forth goals, objectives, and a system for allocating resources to meet program expectations. Such agreements could also promote continuity even when changes in management occur. Although agreements have been reached when disputes have arisen, agreements delineating agency participation will aid in minimizing future disputes and program disruptions. As the coordinator and focal point for the Federal organized crime effort, the Attorney General should know, as a minimum, how each participating agency plans to fight organized crime and the resources it plans to commit.

Internal Revenue Service

In commenting on our report, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) was concerned that our observations and recommendations could seriously affect IRS' participation in the strike force program. (See app. VIII.) Its concern was that IRS resources assigned to the strike force program would now be controlled by the strike force's attorney-in-charge and the Justice Department.

We believe that control of any agency's resources by another agency is limited by the laws governing that agency's mandate. We therefore are not suggesting that Justice have the authority to control IRS' resources. We believe, however, that since the Attorney General is the coordinator and focal point for the Federal organized crime effort, he should be knowledgeable of each participating law enforcement agency's plans to fight organized crime and the resources it plans to commit to this fight.

Although the IRS-Department of Justice cooperation agreement of January 8, 1976, is important for providing the Attorney General with the information needed to perform coordination functions, several additional factors should be formalized into the agreement to make it more useful and comprehensive. For example, IRS commented that it is preparing an internal manual supplement setting forth its strike force program's objectives and specifying the criteria to be used in determining individuals to be investigated. These objectives and criteria should be formalized into the agreement. Moreover, the present agreement needs a system for allocating resources to help carry out the program. This system could help in program planning by creating a resource base available to execute the program. On page 12 of this report, we have clarified the essential elements we believe necessary for such an agreement.

Department of the Treasury

The Department of the Treasury, in commenting on this report (See app. IX), stated that Justice attorneys do exercise authority in determining which investigation will be conducted under the authority of the strike force. While the strike force attorney can influence an investigation by suggesting the type of evidence needed for conviction or by advising the investigator of the difficulty in getting convictions, he has little discretionary power over what is to be initially investigated or what activities merit investigative priority. Currently, the agency decides at what investigative stage the strike force attorney will become involved.

CHAPTER 3THE EFFECTIVENESS OF STRIKE FORCESHAS NOT BEEN EVALUATED

The Attorney General is the focal point for Federal efforts against organized crime but, to date, no system has been established to evaluate the strike force program. There are no criteria against which to measure effectiveness nor sufficient data to quantify the results of strike force efforts. As a result, Justice does not know the extent to which the strike force program has reduced organized crime in the United States and what changes are needed to improve the program.

In 1968 the House Committee on Government Operations recognized the need to measure the effectiveness of OCRS' activities. The Committee pointed out that the President's Crime Commission believed it was essential to be able to measure law enforcement's effects on crime so that officials could plan and establish prevention and control programs.

In the absence of a formal evaluation system, the strike forces we reviewed had adopted a number of informal measures, some of which appeared to be relatively superficial for assessing their operations.

OCRS HAS NOT ESTABLISHED AN EVALUATION SYSTEM

OCRS has not (1) clearly defined "organized crime," (2) established quantitative or qualitative goals against which the effectiveness of strike force operations can be measured, or (3) developed a system to accumulate the data needed to assess strike force results. Thus, OCRS cannot determine how effective the program has been in reducing organized crime and, for management purposes, which strike forces have been most effective. We were told that organized crime has become more sophisticated since the strike force program began in 1967, but complete and reliable data is not available on the number of organized crime figures in particular areas, their position within the organization, and the extent of their criminal activity. This lack of data precludes making "past and present comparisons" and establishing a baseline from which trends may be spotted and evaluations performed. The lack of a more specific definition of organized crime, as noted in chapter 2, also makes it difficult to define the problem the strike forces were created to reduce.

OCRS has not established qualitative or quantitative goals for its strike forces, nor has it identified the information needed to assess strike force results. The attorney-in-charge of planning and evaluation said it was mandatory that strike forces send data to OCRS on every person indicted and on every person convicted as a result of strike force activities. However, this information was incomplete and, in some cases, inaccurate. An informal OCRS study showed that in fiscal year 1974 strike forces reported to OCRS only 64 percent of their indictments.

Until 1976 OCRS did not receive data on active strike force investigations until the decision was made to seek an indictment. On March 12, 1976, however, the Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division and OCRS instructed all strike forces to submit a case initiation report when an investigation was opened. This report is designed to describe an investigative or prosecutive matter which the attorney-in-charge of the strike force believes merits the assignment of an attorney.

OCRS reports annually on the indictments and convictions obtained by its strike forces but conceded that such statistics do not give a complete picture of overall accomplishments. For one thing, these statistics do not reflect the quality of the convictions. For example, OCRS designates convictions as "high echelon" if they involve a member of a Cosa Nostra family. We believe this designation is misleading, however, because it includes "family" members at any level of authority but fails to include other, perhaps more powerful, organized crime figures who are not members of a family.

The Chief, OCRS, does not believe it is possible to establish overall program goals and then measure progress toward attaining those goals. He stated that goals should be set by individual strike forces. However, this is not being done.

HOW STRIKE FORCES EVALUATE OR PLAN TO EVALUATE THEIR ACTIVITIES

In the absence of a formal evaluation system, strike force attorneys-in-charge were employing various informal procedures to assess their operations. These procedures appeared to be of limited use in determining whether organized criminal activity was declining or in comparing one strike force's accomplishments with another. Generally, the attorneys-in-charge favored a qualitative, rather than quantitative, approach to evaluating effectiveness, although they could not translate this type of evaluation into specific procedures.

None of the strike forces reviewed had established definitive goals which would enable them to determine their impact on organized crime. The evaluations performed were relatively limited, generally subjective, and undocumented. For example, strike force personnel made the following evaluative comments:

- The existence or lack of "good press" can provide a strike force with an indication of whether it is reducing organized crime.
- A strike force is operating effectively if its personnel are adequately discharging their responsibilities, in terms of attitude, enthusiasm, and propensity to work.
- A review of conviction, dismissal, and reversal rates will tell an attorney-in-charge if a strike force is successful.
- A strike force is effective if it convicts key organized crime figures identified by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Two attorneys-in-charge proposed qualitative approaches based on the use of intelligence data; however, neither approach has been implemented, although they both appear promising. One approach involves identifying a particular organized criminal activity in the strike force jurisdiction and then, a year or so later, determining what was done in terms of indicting and convicting participants in that activity.

The other approach involves followup based on intelligence data. If a strike force indicts and convicts a key figure or figures in a criminal operation, intelligence sources would find out if the operation was continuing or had ceased to exist. This information could be useful to indicate whether the strike force was disrupting organized crime and indicting and convicting the right people.

Prior reviews of strike force operations

We reviewed three reports discussing the strike force program prepared by the following groups:

- U.S. Attorneys' Advisory Committee to the Attorney General.
- Committee to Evaluate Department of Justice Policy with Respect to Organized Crime Strike Forces.

--Internal Revenue Service Internal Audit Division.

The U.S. Attorneys' Advisory Committee examined the concept and structure of the strike forces with respect to the problems inherent in having these forces functioning relatively independent of the U.S. attorneys' offices in those districts. The 1974 report stated that the concept was sound and that strike forces had been successful but recommended that:

--No additional strike forces be established.

--Existing strike forces in the larger districts be phased out and consolidated into units within the U.S. attorney's office.

--The need for strike forces in other districts be reviewed on an individual basis with cognizant U.S. attorneys.

The report further stated that the entire criminal justice system was well served by competent, energetic, and largely independent U.S. attorneys and any impetus toward eroding their historical prerogatives would only harm the effectiveness of the Federal law enforcement effort.

The committee to evaluate Justice's policy regarding strike force operations was established at the Attorney General's request to address the recommendations set forth in the U.S. Attorneys' Advisory Committee report. The committee concluded in 1974 that the strike force concept was sound in both theory and practice and, accordingly, the strike forces should be continued at their present numbers and present form. Nevertheless, the committee recommended that the Criminal Division:

--Review the need for perpetuating, as presently constituted, the strike forces in each of the cities and geographical regions served.

--Encourage greater participation by agencies represented on the strike forces.

--Review the definition of the term "organized crime."

In addition to the above reports, the Internal Revenue Service reviewed its participation in the strike force program and issued a report in January 1975. Its review disclosed a need to --clearly define specific goals of IRS strike force efforts,

- establish specific strike force target criteria, and
- review reports of IRS strike force accomplishments to provide more detailed information to management in its evaluation of the program's effectiveness.

CONCLUSION

The failure of Justice to (1) define criteria to measure strike force effectiveness and (2) obtain adequate data on program results makes it difficult to determine what field level changes should be made to make the program more effective. With specific criteria and an evaluation system, program operations could be more easily directed so that increased effectiveness could be achieved with the resources available. In addition, a systematic evaluation would enable Justice to (1) assess participating agencies' contribution toward accomplishing the overall goals set for the strike force program, (2) monitor strike force efforts, and (3) identify alternatives which would contribute to program effectiveness.

RECOMMENDATION

We recommend that the Attorney General develop specific criteria and establish the required information system to evaluate the effectiveness of the national and individual strike force efforts.

AGENCY COMMENTS AND OUR EVALUATION

Department of Justice

The Department of Justice said (see app. VII) that it recognizes the importance of an information system that effectively measures performance but also recognizes the extreme difficulty of measuring quantitatively the success of an organized crime program in purely statistical terms. It does not want to fall prey to demands to measure strike force performance simply by a blizzard of statistics which may, read one way or another, indicate more or less progress is being made. The Department said that some proposed approaches discussed in this report, while not fully providing a qualitative measure of effectiveness, are steps in that direction, and that it is continuing to look for criteria which will aid in measuring the qualitative effectiveness of organized crime programs.

Department of the Treasury

The Department of the Treasury stated (see app. IX) that indictment and conviction numbers could provide a good basis for evaluating the program and that statistics could be developed to show trends and provide a measure of quality.

Although statistics are useful, we do not believe that quantitative measures alone are a sufficient basis to measure strike force effectiveness. Other factors, such as the importance of the person convicted and the degree of disruption to a criminal activity, are more important in evaluating the program.

As stated on page 17, the Department of Justice has not established, however, qualitative and quantitative goals for its strike forces, nor has it identified the information needed to assess strike force results. Consequently, program effectiveness cannot be measured.

Internal Revenue Service

IRS commented (see app. VIII) that it is completing a manual supplement that:

- a. Sets forth the objective for IRS' participation in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program.
- b. Delineates the responsibilities of the national office, regional offices, district offices, and individual strike force representatives.
- c. Provides for the coordination and states the general procedures which are to be followed in investigations and examinations conducted jointly by the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service in accordance with the guidelines established in the January 8, 1976, agreement between IRS and the Department of Justice on the conduct of joint investigations.
- d. Specifies the criteria for IRS' selection of strike force cases for Audit Division examination and Intelligence Division investigation.

IRS recently completed a cost-benefit analysis of the impact of the strike force program on IRS resources. However, this analysis was limited since IRS did not have a comprehensive system that would track the results of Audit Division examinations made on strike force cases.

IRS is currently developing a comprehensive reporting system that will track the results of its Intelligence Division and Audit Division investigations and examinations made on strike force cases. In addition, IRS is now conducting a study that will track the results of Audit Division examinations and Intelligence Division investigations made on strike force cases during fiscal year 1972. This study will compare dollars assessed with dollars collected from Audit Division examinations. A similar study on the results of Intelligence Division investigations will be made on these cases.

CHAPTER 4STRIKE FORCE PROSECUTIONSOF ORGANIZED CRIME FIGURES OFTEN RESULTIN LIGHT SENTENCES

Although Justice considers the indictment, conviction, and imprisonment of organized crime figures as one means of disrupting organized crime operations, the sentences imposed in 52 percent of the strike force convictions we reviewed called for no time in jail. A sentence requiring confinement of 2 years or less occurred in 58 percent of the cases. Strike forces do not control sentencing, but light sentences could hinder their attempts to disrupt organized crime.

ANALYSIS OF INDICTMENTS, CONVICTIONS, AND SENTENCES AT SIX STRIKE FORCES

During fiscal years 1972-75, the 6 organized crime strike forces reviewed obtained indictments against 2,967 of the 6,727 persons indicted by all strike forces. While these indictments covered a variety of offenses, about 37 percent were for illegal gambling. (Detailed information on the offenses which resulted in indictments appears in app. IV.) The disposition or status indictments as of September 1, 1975, were as follows:

Disposition or status	Number of defendants
Pled guilty or no contest (note a)	953
Convicted after trial	330
Acquitted	250
Dismissed or prosecution decision not to proceed with case (note b)	736
Convicted-appeal pending	136
Awaiting trial	436
Other	126
Total	2,967

a/Nolo contendere.

b/Nolle prosequi.

Based on cases which had been closed as of September 1, 1975, which includes dismissals but not cases in which an appeal is pending, the six strike forces achieved "conviction" rates of from 38 percent to 71 percent. (See app. V.)

The number of dismissals was significant but dismissals did not always involve a "lost" case. Sometimes the dismissal was beyond the control of the strike force. For example, some dismissals and nolle prosequis involved cases in which the original indictment was not pursued but the strike force obtained a superseding indictment.

The following factors were also cited by strike force attorneys as having resulted in the dismissal of indictments:

- Improperly obtained wire tap evidence.
- Death of defendant.
- Defendant pled guilty to non-strike force charges.
- Defendant granted immunity to return for testimony against other defendants.
- Charges under one indictment dismissed if defendant was convicted under another indictment.

Including all dismissals may not be realistic when calculating the conviction rate. However, considering the large number of superseded indictments and other dismissal factors, the reported number of indictments obtained by the strike forces may be misleading.

Of 1,283 defendants who pled guilty or no contest or were convicted after September 1, 1975, 1,226 had been sentenced. Of these, 48 percent (586) received prison sentences, whereas 52 percent (640) received sentences calling for no confinement.

Of those who received jail terms, 58 percent (338) received 2 years or less. The following is a summary of the sentences imposed.

Sentence	Defendants	Percent of defendants
Less than 6 months	207	35
6 months to 1 year	63	11
More than 1 year to 2 years	68	12
More than 2 years to 5 years	178	30
More than 5 years	70	12
Total	586	100

The length of the prison sentences imposed overstate the periods of incarceration since individuals are eligible for parole after serving one-third of their sentence.

Of the 640 defendants whose sentences called for no jail time, about 79 percent (507) received probation alone or probation with a fine. The remaining 21 percent (133 defendants) received only a fine. About 64 percent of these defendants were fined $1,000 or less. In one case, the fine was $25. (Detailed information on the sentences obtained, by individual strike force, appears in app. VI.)

ANALYSIS OF SENTENCES IMPOSED ON
"HIGH-ECHELON" ORGANIZED CRIME FIGURES

The Attorney General reports annually on the number of convicted persons he designates as "high-echelon" organized crime figures to add a quality indicator to overall convictions statistics. Generally, persons designated as high-echelon are believed to be members of La Cosa Nostra. These are individuals whose incarceration would in most instances seriously disrupt organized criminal activities. We could obtain sentencing data on only 128 of the 241 high-echelon strike force convictions during fiscal years 1969-75. Of these, 51 percent received no jail time or sentences of less than 2 years in jail.

We examined 56 high-echelon convictions during fiscal years 1974 and 1975 involving the 6 strike forces in terms of the --maximum jail sentence possible and

--actual sentence imposed.

The sentences imposed represented only a small fraction of the maximum sentence possible. The following table presents this comparison in more detail.

Comparison of 56
Strike Force "High-Echelon" Convictions
(fiscal years 1974 and 1975)

COMMENTS ON SENTENCES IMPOSED IN STRIKE FORCE CASES

Sentencing is an important yet controversial part of the criminal justice process and, as a result, we obtained wide-ranging views on the reasonableness of sentences imposed in strike force cases.

According to many attorneys-in-charge of strike forces and their special attorneys, the sentences imposed were too light because:

- The judiciary is extremely liberal.
- Organized crime is often considered to be nonviolent. Many defendants were convicted of what are considered "victimless crimes," e.g., gambling.
- There are no mandatory minimum sentences in Federal courts, and prosecutors are rarely asked to recommend sentences.
- Severe sentences are frequently appealed, and the judiciary does not want to clog its court calendars with appeal proceedings.

Members of the Federal judiciary contacted did not believe that sentences in organized crime cases were inappropriate but that the judiciary attempts to allow a person convicted of a crime to straighten himself out. Thus, judges impose a period of probation rather than confinement. This is especially true for first-time offenders, who are often the defendants in many cases prosecuted by the strike forces. One judge, on the other hand, stated that judiciary members are generally too liberal and resist sending individuals to jail. For this judge, mandatory minimum sentences appeared to be a possible solution.

Prior studies have discussed various aspects of the sentencing process. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice reported that gambling is the largest source of revenue for the criminal cartels and that members of organized crime know they can operate free of significant punishment. Judges are reluctant to jail bookmakers and lottery operators. Even when offenders are convicted, the sentences are often very light. Fines, paid by the organization, are considered a business expense.

LIMITED USE OF PROVISIONS OF THE ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1970

Under two major provisions of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, Federal officials are:

- Required to impanel special grand juries to investigate organized crime in specific areas and to issue reports on these investigations at their discretion.
- Authorized to prosecute individuals as special felony offenders so that they can be given extended sentences of up to 25 years.

Special grand juries

Although the act requires that a special grand jury be summoned at least once every 18 months in each district court located in a judicial district containing more than 4 million inhabitants, none had been impaneled in one district. However, when it was brought to the chief judge's attention, he said he would convene a special grand jury in the near future to investigate organized crime.

The other strike forces reviewed had employed special grand juries to investigate organized crime, but none of these grand juries had issued reports on its investigations.

Special offender provision

Five of the six strike forces reviewed had obtained no indictments under the special offender provision and in the few cases that had been prosecuted, only two resulted in convictions. One of these was being appealed at the conclusion of our review.

Attorneys-in-charge of the strike forces offered various reasons for not using this provision more frequently, including:

- Appropriate cases have not occurred.
- The provision has been attacked as unconstitutional.
- Many organized crime figures have previously been indicted but not convicted and, therefore, cannot be prosecuted under the special offender provision.

CONCLUSION

Strike forces have indicted and convicted numerous organized crime figures and their associates; however, the final sentence generally involved no incarceration. Sentencing is not under the control of the strike forces, but if incarceration is intended to disrupt organized crime, light sentences could preclude their efforts to disrupt organized crime to any great extent.

CHAPTER 5THE ORGANIZED CRIME INTELLIGENCESYSTEM IS NOT ADEQUATE

The Organized Crime and Racketeering Section established a computerized intelligence system to collect and store information on organized crime gathered by all Federal agencies. The system, however, has not met initial objectives and its use is limited because of an incomplete data base. A Justice study, issued in March 1976, stated that the system must be improved if it is to fulfill its objectives. The need for the system has also been questioned, since it duplicates data in the intelligence files of other agencies.

WHAT IS THE SYSTEM AND WHAT WAS IT DESIGNED TO DO?

To assist Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies, the Intelligence and Special Services Unit was created in 1961 to establish within OCRS a centralized source of data on organized crime. The system was computerized in 1969, and in 1972 a racketeer profile sheet was devised to facilitate entering data into the system. The racketeer profile sheet is supposed to be prepared for everyone under investigation by agencies participating in the strike force program.

The system was designed to provide tactical and strategic intelligence. Tactical intelligence contributes directly to the success of an immediate law enforcement objective and affects ongoing cases and investigations. Strategic intelligence, on the other hand, is concerned with broader policy matters and provides an overview of a situation and a definition of the problem's magnitude.

As of November 1976, the system had data on some 24,000 individuals who were or had been under investigation. This information included

- name and address;
- aliases and nicknames;
- vehicles and firearms owned;
- education, military, and employment records;
- hobbies;
- illegal activities;

--known bank accounts; and

--names of associates.

QUESTIONABLE NEED FOR THE SYSTEM AND USEFULNESS OF ITS DATA

The system has not met its initial objectives, and the adequacy of the system has been questioned. The OCRS intelligence unit receives an average of about 2,000 information requests each month, of which about 50 percent originate at the strike forces. Of the total requests, about 95 percent request all information in the system on a particular individual or business. The system could provide data on only 25 percent of the 2,000 requests.

An OCRS official said that some Federal agency representatives on the strike forces are not completing the racketeer profile sheet for all persons under investigation because the process is too time consuming. In 1974 OCRS began assigning intelligence analysts to the strike forces to speed up the input of intelligence data and, as of February 1976, 11 strike forces had full-time analysts. Despite this assistance, the Chief of the Intelligence and Special Services Unit said that less than half of the needed data had been computerized.

In March 1976 Justice's Office of Management and Finance completed a study of the intelligence system. It reported that, except for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, information exchange was haphazard, rarely written or preserved, and heavily dependent upon the rapport established among participating agency representatives. This informal system, the report concluded, resulted in an untimely and incomplete exchange of intelligence information.

Strike force representatives questioned the data's usefulness in the fight against organized crime. Most attorneys and other participants in the strike force program we contacted said that the intelligence system provided little assistance in their day-to-day operations. One attorney-in-charge stated that, during his several years with three strike forces, he seldom had found any data in the intelligence system which could assist him in the investigative process. Personnel at each strike force complained that the information received from the system is often already known and provides only background data on an individual as opposed to "hard" intelligence.

According to the Office of Management and Finance study, strike force personnel generally believed that racketeer profile data was not necessary for the current program of investigation and prosecution of organized crime figures. In addition, some agencies have their own intelligence systems and do not need the OCRS system. The OCRS system duplicates much of the information already available in these other data banks, particularly the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which account for about 90 percent of the intelligence data in the OCRS system.

The Office of Management and Finance report also stated that the existing data collection was directed more toward evidence gathering than toward intelligence information which, if properly processed and analyzed, could lead to selecting investigative approaches which would have a greater impact on the organized crime problem. The report said that OCRS data analysis is extremely limited and that analysts assigned to the strike forces are not intelligence analysts but are merely "computer input specialists."

CONCLUSION

OCRS' intelligence system is not adequate because it has not met initial objectives and is of limited use. Additionally, the system duplicates information contained in other agencies' intelligence systems.

RECOMMENDATION

We recommend that the Attorney General reevaluate the need for an intelligence system devoted solely to organized crime figures. If needed, the system's quality and usefulness of data should be improved.

AGENCY COMMENTS AND OUR EVALUATION

Department of Justice

The Department of Justice said (see app. VII) that it agrees with our recommendation. The Criminal Division feels that the intelligence apparatus devised for use in the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section is being maintained at a cost and commitment of resources far in excess of any foreseeable return on its operation. Consequently it is giving serious consideration to altering the scope of the computerized operation consistent with bona fide intelligence needs.

Internal Revenue Service

The Internal Revenue Service told us (see app. VIII) that it is also concerned with the need and utilization of the computerized intelligence system. In June 1976 IRS requested and received detailed information from Justice concerning the creation, purpose, and utilization of the racketeer profiles maintained in this computerized system. It is currently studying the extent of its role, if any, in participating in this system. One of IRS' considerations relates to the disclosure of confidential information. Of particular concern is the possible unauthorized disclosure of tax-related information. Upon completion of its study, IRS will decide the extent to which it will participate in this computerized intelligence system.

CHAPTER 6SCOPE OF REVIEW

We performed our review at the Criminal Division's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, Department of Justice, in Washington, D.C., and at strike forces in Cleveland, Detroit, Los Angeles, New Orleans, and New York City (Brooklyn and Manhattan). We examined agency records and held discussions with agency officials.

We also talked with headquarters and regional officials of Federal agencies participating in organized crime strike force activities and with U.S. Attorneys and members of the Federal judiciary. In addition, we performed limited work at strike forces in Boston, Chicago, and Washington, D.C.

Most of our field work was performed between December 1975 and May 1976.

HOW A STRIKE FORCE OPERATES

Strike forces generally operate in the same manner. Their operations usually involve: (1) initial agency investigation, (2) investigation after strike force involvement, and (3) indictment and prosecution.

INITIAL AGENCY INVESTIGATION

Participating agencies generally initiate investigations, although the strike force attorney-in-charge occasionally suggests investigations. Agency investigations originate after criminal activity has been identified. The investigating agency determines the stage an investigation is brought to the strike force's attention. Sometimes investigations are made known to the strike force shortly after initiation; in other instances, the investigation may already be completed. At times, strike force attorneys may meet with participating agencies to review their ongoing efforts and suggest that promising matters be developed further.

The process of bringing an agency investigation to the strike force is usually very simple. An agency representative discusses the investigation with a strike force attorney, who decides whether or not it is a strike force matter.

INVESTIGATION AFTER STRIKE FORCE INVOLVEMENT

Once an investigation is accepted by the strike force, it is assigned to an attorney(s). The attorney reviews the investigation and identifies whether additional evidence is required to obtain an indictment. He may recommend such things as electronic surveillance, i.e., wiretaps, to obtain needed evidence; or he may request the assistance of other agency representatives if there are indications that violations in their statutory areas have occurred.

After the investigation is completed, the strike force attorneys evaluate whether the offense(s) warrants prosecution. If the attorney believes it does, he prepares a prosecutive memorandum setting forth the particulars in the case, laws involved, statements of facts and evidence, problems of evidence, and conclusions and recommendations.

After review by the attorney-in-charge, prosecutive memorandums are sent to the respective U.S. attorney and to OCS for review and approval. The assistant attorney general of Justice's Criminal Division makes the prosecutive decision should any conflicts arise on the case's prosecutive merit.

INDICTMENT AND PROSECUTION

After prosecutive approval is obtained, the strike force attorney(s) presents the case before a grand jury, which determines whether to issue indictments, how many, and to whom. This determination is generally made by subpoenaing witnesses, records, and compelling testimony.

If the grand jury issues indictments, the case is prosecuted generally by strike force attorneys who may be assisted by U.S. attorneys or Justice attorneys with special expertise in certain types of cases.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

JAN 14 1977

Address Reply to the Division Indicated and Refer to Initials and Number

Mr. Victor L. Lowe
Director
General Government Division
United States General Accounting Office
Washington, D. C. 20518

Dear Mr. Lowe:

This letter is in response to your request for comments on the draft report titled "The War on Organized Crime is Faltering--Federal Strike Forces Are Not Getting the Job Done."

With minor exceptions, we are in general agreement with the findings and recommendations of the report and share GAO's concern that organized crime still flourishes. While our comments express some disagreement with portions of the draft report, it is important to point out that we have gained considerable insights ourselves from the report and, more importantly, from the discussions held with the GAO staff responsible for its preparation.

We find GAO's findings and recommendations to be generally consistent with the findings and recommendations contained in previous internal studies undertaken within the Department of Justice. The GAO draft report refers to these studies in a number of the areas covered by the report. The studies conducted by the Department of Justice include:

- United States Attorneys' Advisory Committee to the Attorney General
"Report of the Subcommittee on Department of Justice Field Operations: Organizational Concepts and Relationships with United States Attorneys," 1974
- Report of the Attorney General's Committee on the Evaluation of the Organized Crime Strike Forces ("Hoiles Committee"), July 1974

- Management Programs and Budget Staff Report, "Organized Crime Intelligence: An Analysis and Management Review of the Organized Crime Intelligence Program," March 1976

We have been aware of management deficiencies in the organized crime area and have been constantly evaluating and implementing organizational improvements within the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section to ensure that our limited resources are being directed against targets of major interest. Since January 1976, we have been conducting our own intensive internal review of the organized crime program and we welcomed the views of the GAO staff in connection with this effort. Changes in management personnel have been made in the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section within the past 3 months. We believe recent changes in Strike Force operations, as well as the management of the Section, are responsive not only to our own concerns about the program but to many of the concerns articulated in the GAO draft report.

As an initial comment, we agree that the Federal effort against organized crime can be better planned, organized, executed and directed and we are working toward these objectives. However, law enforcement can only deal with one side of the organized crime equation. Unlike street crime and other more conventional offenses, organized crime is a business which depends, as do all businesses, on customer acceptance and patronage. Activities such as illegal gambling, narcotics trafficking, loan sharking and fencing transactions, prostitution, pornography, etc., all depend upon willing purchasers or customers for the goods and services which organized crime sells. Organized crime will thus continue to "flourish" until the American citizenry chooses to withdraw its patronage from these multi-million dollar sources of income, and from the influence and power of those who control organized crime in this nation. It must be understood and emphasized that whatever program is designed by law enforcement, it can deal only with the "supply" side of the equation; the "demand" side is, in the final analysis, dependent on the actions and reactions of the American public.

Thus, even if an optimum method of "planning, organizing, executing, and directing" an organized crime program is perfected by the Department of Justice, organized crime may well continue to "flourish" in the above sense. Nonetheless, we must never be deflected from the goal of seeking to improve the method of dealing with the spectre of organized crime by this realization.

GAO recommends that the Attorney General develop a definition of organized crime so that consistent criteria may be applied nationwide on who the targets of the Strike Force should be. The draft report notes that in 1970 the Attorney General defined organized crime as ". . . all illegal activities engaged in by members of criminal syndicates operative throughout the United States, and all illegal activities engaged in by known associates and confederates of such members." However, GAO did not believe that this definition was specific enough to allow consistent criteria to be applied nationwide on who the "targets" of the Strike Force should be.

We recognize the difficulty of formulating a universally applicable and acceptable definition of organized crime and further recognize that the special purpose for which the Strike Forces were created requires a clear and uniform articulation of investigative objectives. However, because of the subjective nature of perceptions about organized crime, we believe that problems would exist with any definition of organized crime. Like pornography, organized crime is difficult to define, but "you know it when you see it" if each determination is subjected to an appropriate review. The use of a working definition in conjunction with a viable means of applying it appears to offer a reasonable solution.

Prior to 1976, prosecutive and investigative priorities were left to meander and be determined ad hoc on a basis that reflected, more often than not, the relationship between a given Strike Force and the investigative agency with which it was dealing or with the United States Attorney. In early 1976, a requirement was adopted that investigations undertaken by Strike Forces would be reviewed before they were commenced rather than after they were completed. The initiation of the required reports at the outset of investigations provides Strike Force Chiefs and the management of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, as well as United States Attorneys, with a viable means by which to actually apply the definition promulgated by the Attorney General.

The GAO report further recommends that the National Council be reconvened to develop a unified approach to fighting organized crime. Organized crime is not a monolithic structure, cast in hierarchial form, and directed by a single "godfather" or Chairman of the Board. In business terms, the more apt analogy would be a conglomerate--a criminal conglomerate--which relies on loose lines of authority between various "business enterprises" in different geographic areas of the country. Moreover, the "line of business" which may be pre-eminent will vary from one section to another. In addition, the participants in the largesse of these enterprises may vary with the area under scrutiny, admitting some ethnic strains in some parts of the country and other ethnic strains elsewhere.

What the above obviously suggests is that the mode of dealing with organized crime must vary from region to region and must take into account the particular activities upon which racketeering figures are concentrating within that area. Thus, programs designed to combat one kind of organized crime in a particular locale are not necessarily desirable or effective to combat different kinds of activity in other locales throughout the nation.

It is these perceptions which guide the present efforts being undertaken within the Criminal Division to make sure that the Strike Forces program is flexible enough to meet these differentiations. Rather than attempting to develop a nationwide, unified approach for all strike forces, the Criminal Division is constantly evaluating the program, in the qualitative sense, to ensure that limited resources are being directed against targets of major interest and concern.

To achieve our goals, we have spent considerable time discussing our deficiencies and methods of overcoming them with the chiefs of the Section, their deputies, and selected Strike Force attorneys-in-charge. While new management has been installed within the past 3 months, we recognize that not all these deficiencies have yet been satisfactorily resolved. Admonitions have been and will continue to be constantly forthcoming to the management of the Section and Strike Force Chiefs that they must insure that every opportunity is taken to see that their resources are focused only on major organized crime investigations. It has been suggested, for example, that Strike Force Chiefs review the cases in their inventories, referring to the United States Attorneys' offices for prosecution those matters which appear to be routine in nature and/or do not involve major organized crime figures. New guidelines have been established by the Attorney General and will appear in the new United States Attorneys' Manual, which will clarify this requirement. The end result desired is to see that Strike Force offices do not become "bogged down" in the trial of a great number of mundane, routine cases, no matter who the defendant may be, but will be able to focus their resources on extensive and sophisticated grand jury investigations of major organized crime enterprises within their districts.

The role of coordinating the battle against organized crime is centralized in the Attorney General's Office and the Department of Justice. Our prime goal is to maximize the use of the resources available to us and to make as flexible as possible the response of those engaged in the organized crime program to the changing face of organized crime and to its differing manifestations from region to region throughout the country. In view of the new measures we are taking, we believe that if the Council on Organized Crime is convened, it should not undertake to perform any management function. Instead, it should serve as a forum where general matters may be raised and where an overall view of organized crime strategy may be developed.

The report also recommends that the Attorney General in conjunction with the other participating agencies develop agreements delineating each agency's (1) role in the strike forces including the role of the attorney-in-charge and (2) commitment of resources." The report further recommends that the Attorney General "seek an order from the President requiring the other agencies cooperation and commitment, should he not receive satisfaction from the other agencies."

The concept of interagency cooperation as originally conceived for strike forces is a good one. However, as noted by GAO, in practice the effectiveness of strike forces has been limited somewhat by the inability of the attorney-in-charge to task each agency investigatively. This problem will continue to exist to some extent since an organizational entity cannot be given responsibility without authority. However, we believe that this situation is improving and interagency cooperation is increasing. Agreements have, for example, been reached when disputes arose with the Internal Revenue Service over their participation in the Strike Force program. The Criminal Division is called upon everyday to interact with the investigative agencies over their use of resources and allocation of priorities. If, however, satisfaction is not received from the other agencies, we will seek assistance from progressively higher levels of authority in our efforts to acquire the cooperation and commitment of the other agencies.

The report also recommends that the Attorney General develop specific criteria and establish the required information system to evaluate the effectiveness of the national and individual Strike Force efforts. We recognize the importance of an information system that effectively measures performance, but we also recognize the extreme difficulty of measuring quantitatively the success of an organized crime program in purely statistical terms. We do not want to fall prey to demands to measure strike force performance simply by a blizzard of statistics which may, read one way or another, indicate more or less "progress" is being made. To date, we have not found a workable way to measure our accomplishments qualitatively. This is particularly difficult in an area such as organized crime where the conviction of a "quality" defendant can outweigh the effect of a whole mass of minor offenders being brought to the bar of justice. As the GAO report indicates, there are some proposed approaches, qualitative in nature, based on the use of intelligence data. While not fully providing a qualitative measure of effectiveness, they are steps in that direction. We are continuing to look for criteria which will aid us in measuring the qualitative effectiveness of organized crime.

Although the title of the draft report infers that the war on organized crime is faltering, we believe our quantitative statistics indicate that extensive accomplishments have been made in the Government's continuing campaign against the hoodlum element. Among these statistics are the FBI's accomplishments of (1) over 6,000 organized crime convictions during the past 5 years, including top La Cosa Nostra functionaries in New York City, New England, New Jersey, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Denver, and Los Angeles; (2) confiscation of more than $20,000,000 worth of cash, property, weapons, and wagering paraphernalia in organized crime cases since 1971; and (3) dissemination of criminal intelligence information to other Federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies over the same 5-year span, leading to some 15,000 arrests by the recipient agencies and the recovery or destruction of more than $187,000,000 worth of illicit drugs and narcotics, the seizure of approximately $8,000,000 worth of cash and gambling paraphernalia, and the assessment of tax liens against $19,000,000 worth of property arising out of Federal gambling cases investigated by the FBI.

The report also states that the costly computerized organized crime intelligence system appears to be of dubious value. The recommendation is made that the Attorney General reevaluate whether an intelligence system devoted solely to organized crime figures is needed, and that if it is, steps be taken to improve the quality and usefulness of data in the system.

We are in complete agreement with GAO on this recommendation. It is the present feeling of the management of the Criminal Division that the intelligence apparatus devised for use in the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section is being maintained at a cost and commitment of resources far in excess of any foreseeable return on its operations. As a consequence, we are giving serious consideration to altering the scope of the computerized operation consistent with bona fide intelligence needs.

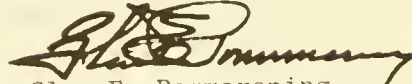

We appreciate the opportunity to comment on the draft report. We are aware that there are deficiencies in the organized crime program. We are equally aware of the continued threat which organized crime and racketeering poses to the stability of our society and its institutions. Changes which have been effected, those which are on the drawing board, and those which have not yet been accomplished, are all designed to upgrade the quality of the organized crime program--both through the use of Strike Forces, where appropriate, and through service to the investigative agencies and the United States Attorneys' offices. It is our primary endeavor to ensure that a comprehensive effort is being pursued consistently to deal with every aspect of organized crime which comes to our attention.

OCT 5 1976

Mr. Victor L. Lowe
 Director, General Government Division
 U. S. General Accounting Office
 414 G Street, N. W.
 Washington, D. C. 20548

Dear Mr. Lowe:

Mr. Wilbur DeZerne, Director, Office of Audit, Office of the Secretary, Department of the Treasury has forwarded to me a copy of your transmittal letter to the Secretary of the Treasury and the related draft report for such action as deemed appropriate.

We have reviewed the draft of the GAO report to Congress on the Department of Justice's (DOJ) Organized Crime Strike Forces and are forwarding to you our detailed comments. These are included in the attachment to this letter.

The Internal Revenue Service is particularly concerned that this report presents observations and recommendations which could potentially result in serious impact on the IRS participation in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program (Chapter 2). These concerns pertain to the control of IRS resources assigned to the Joint Agency Strike Force Program and the control of IRS over its own operations as part of this coordinated joint investigation effort.

On January 8, 1976, the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice signed an agreement titled "Department of Justice-Internal Revenue Service Guidelines Regarding Cooperation in Joint Investigations." These guidelines, among other things, delineate the roles of IRS and DOJ and cover the commitment of resources in joint investigations. Since these guidelines are an accomplished fact, a Presidential order - a GAO report recommendation contingent on the development of the type of agreement consummated between DOJ and IRS - is unnecessary and could produce undesirable results.

We want to emphasize that these guidelines provide (1) that the Internal Revenue Service will retain control over its own operations and its own resources assigned in joint investigations with DOJ and other participating agencies and, (2) that the participation of IRS personnel in Strike Force investigations will be coordinated by the Strike Force attorney who will also assist in the formulation of enforcement policies and the selection of cases for potential investigation. However, final authority concerning taxpayers to be investigated by IRS will be vested in IRS.

We believe that the provisions contained in this agreement accomplish the following objectives:

- a. ensure efficient use of IRS resources employed in the Strike Forces;
- b. ensure that IRS resources will be employed in cases concerning tax violations which are within the enforcement jurisdiction of the Service; and
- c. maintain proper control in the IRS over the use of its resources in the Strike Forces.

We strongly believe that the use of IRS resources as delineated in the DOJ-IRS agreement will not only lead to better coordination of Strike Force efforts in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program but will also tend to ensure that the Service will have control over its workload.

This agreement thus contains necessary safeguards against possible misuses of IRS resources in joint investigations involving other than criminal violations, which are clearly outside the enforcement jurisdiction of the Service.

We believe that the FBI should play the primary role in the organized crime strike forces. Under 18 U.S.C. 533 and 534, the FBI has the responsibility to investigate those Federal offenses which are not specifically assigned by law to another agency. Although certain other agencies have investigative authority over specific offenses (e.g., IRS - tax offenses; Immigration and Naturalization Service - immigration offenses; Secret Service - counterfeiting offenses; Drug Enforcement Administration - drug offenses), the FBI has investigative authority and responsibility over most other Federal offenses involved in racketeering, such as those contained in Titles VIII and IX of the Organized Crime Act of 1970, P.L. 91-452, as well as such organized crime activity as bribery, hijacking, interstate transportation of stolen property, bankruptcy, fraud, unlawful activities with respect to labor unions and pension and welfare funds, and obstruction of Federal law enforcement (see 18 U.S.C. 152, 201, 204, 659, 664, 1461-1465, 1501-1510, 2314, 2315).

The Joint Agency Strike Force Program is designed, through the concerted efforts of participating agencies, to investigate and prosecute persons engaged in organized crime activities who commit criminal offenses (Title 18 and 26 violations). On account of this broad objective, we believe that the FBI should be the primary agency for the investigation of organized crime strike forces. At the same time, IRS, because of its special expertise, will furnish all available assistance in the aspect of criminal violations of the tax laws.

Although we do not have complete data on the resources assigned by participating agencies to the organized crime strike forces, we believe that the IRS contribution of resources is as great or greater than any other participating agency's contribution. Table 1 attached to the detailed comments shows the annual IRS contribution of resources, from FY 1971 through FY 1974, to the organized crime effort including the Joint Agency Strike Force Program and Other Racketeer Cases (FY 1974 is the most recent year for which complete statistics are available). By fiscal years, 1,552, 1,783, 2,152, and 2,071 staff years were assigned by IRS to the overall organized crime effort. In FY 1974, for example, approximately 1,800 staff years were devoted to the Joint Agency Strike Force Program.

Thank you for affording us an opportunity to comment on this draft of the GAO report to Congress on the Department of Justice's Organized Crime Strike Forces. We hope that you will give us an additional opportunity to review the final version of this report in advance of its publication.

With kind regards,

Sincerely,

Commissioner

Enclosure

Internal Revenue Service Comments on GAO Draft of Report to the Congress of the United States
 On the Department of Justice's Organized Crime Strike Force

1. The following portions of the GAO report pertain to observations and recommendations about the authority of the Department of Justice's attorneys-in-charge over the personnel assigned by other participating agencies in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program and over the cases selected for investigation in their jurisdictions:

- a. Page ii of the Digest:

"The operations of individual strike forces are hampered because the Justice attorneys-in-charge have no authority over the participants from other agencies. (See ch. 2)."

- b. Page 15, Chapter 2:

"In the absence of a national strategy or overall policy direction from Washington, the responsibility for planning rests with the strike forces. However, strike force attorneys-in-charge do not have authority to direct investigative priorities within their jurisdictions."

- c. Page 16, Chapter 2:

"In establishing the strike force program, however, the Attorney General did not promulgate formal operational guidelines for the participating Federal agencies and did not define authority and responsibilities of the attorneys-in-charge. The strike force attorney-in-charge has little discretion over what is investigated in his jurisdiction and on what activities investigative priorities are established. These decisions are made by the participating agencies, not the strike force, and these agencies decide at what stage in an investigation strike force attorneys will become involved.

A House Government Operations Committee study (House Report No. 1574 dated June 30, 1968) recognized that Justice generally does not have line authority over the investigative and law enforcement operations of other Federal agencies.

The strike force attorney-in-charge has no authority to require participating Federal agencies to conduct specific investigations or to assign additional manpower and other resources to the strike force program. With the exception of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, personnel assigned to strike forces from participating agencies are not under the control of the attorney-in-charge."

d. Pages 17 and 18, Chapter 2:

"We recommend that the Attorney General

...in conjunction with other participating agencies develop agreements delineating each agency's (1) role in the strike forces including the role of the attorney-in-charge and (2) commitment of resources; and

...seek an order from the President requiring the other agencies' cooperation and commitment, should we not receive satisfaction from other agencies."

IRS Comments:

On January 8, 1976, the Deputy Attorney General and the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service signed an agreement entitled: Department of Justice-Internal Revenue Service Guidelines Regarding Cooperation in Joint Investigations. This agreement, among other things, delineates the roles of IRS and DOJ, including the role of the attorney-in-charge, in joint investigations undertaken in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program. This agreement also covers the commitment of resources of IRS and DOJ to this program. Since this agreement is an accomplished fact, a Presidential order is unnecessary and could produce undesirable results.

This agreement establishes the general procedures which are to be followed in investigations and examinations conducted jointly by the Department of Justice, including the Office of United States Attorneys, and the Internal Revenue Service. Within this framework of cooperation, this agreement recognizes that the mission of the Internal Revenue Service is the fair and effective administration and enforcement of the tax laws of the United States.

We emphasize that these guidelines provide (1) that the Internal Revenue Service will retain complete control over its own operations and resources in its participation in joint investigations with DOJ and other participating agencies, including those in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program; (2) that IRS agents will be assigned by IRS managers; (3) that the participation of IRS personnel in Strike Force investigations will be coordinated by the Strike Force attorney who will also assist in the formulation of enforcement policies and the selection of cases for potential investigation. However, final authority concerning taxpayers to be investigated will be vested in IRS.

We believe that the FBI should play the primary role in the organized crime strike forces. Under 18 U.S.C. 533 and 534, the FBI has the responsibility to investigate those Federal offenses which are not specifically assigned by law to another agency. Although certain other agencies have investigative authority over specific offenses (e.g., IRS - tax offenses; Immigration and Naturalization Service - immigration offenses; Secret Service - counterfeiting offenses; Drug Enforcement Administration - drug offenses), the FBI has investigative authority and responsibility over most other Federal offenses involved in racketeering, such as those contained in Titles VIII and IX of the Organized Crime Act of 1970, P.L. 91-452, as well as such organized crime activity as bribery, hijacking, interstate transportation of stolen property, bankruptcy, fraud, unlawful activities with respect to labor unions and pension and welfare funds, and obstruction of Federal law enforcement (see 18 U.S.C. 152, 201, 204, 659, 664, 1461-1465, 1501-1510, 2314, 2315).

The Joint Agency Strike Force Program is designed, through the concerted efforts of participating agencies, to investigate and prosecute persons engaged in organized crime activities who commit criminal offenses (Title 18 and 26 violations). On account of this broad objective, we believe that the FBI should be the primary agency concerned with organized crime strike forces. At the same time, IRS, because of its special expertise, will furnish all available assistance in the aspect of criminal violations of the tax laws.

Although we do not have complete data on the resources assigned by participating agencies to the organized crime strike forces, we believe that the IRS contribution of resources is as great or greater than any other participating agency's contribution. Table 1 attached shows the annual IRS contribution of resources, from FY 1971 through FY 1974, to the organized crime effort including the Joint Agency Strike Force Program and Other Racketeer Cases (FY 1974 is the most recent year for which complete statistics are available). By fiscal year, 1,552, 1,783, 2,152, and 2,071 staff years were assigned by IRS to the overall organized crime effort. In FY 1974, for example, approximately 1,800 staff years were devoted to the Joint Agency Strike Force Program.

Finally, in connection with the IRS cooperation with United States attorneys and Department of Justice attorneys in developing cases concerning tax violations which are within the enforcement jurisdiction of the Service, the Service will provide these attorneys with any information obtained during a tax investigation, relating to the possible commission of nontax crimes to the extent that this information is in accordance with the provisions on disclosure of confidential information contained in Section 6103 of the Internal Revenue Service Code and the regulations thereunder, as recently amended by the Tax Reform Act of 1976. Under this amendment, for example, the Service will continue to furnish the Justice Department upon request tax returns and other tax return information with respect to the taxpayer whose civil or criminal tax liability is at issue. Written request is required in criminal or civil tax cases other than refund cases and in criminal or civil tax cases other than those referred by the IRS.

2. Page 25, Chapter 3: The GAO report states the following:

"In addition to the above reports, the IRS reviewed its participation in the strike force program and issued a report in January 1975. The review disclosed a need to:

- clearly define specific goals and objectives of the IRS' strike force efforts;
- establish specific strike force target criteria; and
- review reports of IRS strike force accomplishments to provide more detailed information to assist management in the evaluation of the effectiveness of the program.

CONCLUSION

The failure of Justice to define criteria to measure strike force effectiveness and obtain adequate data on program results inhibits obtaining knowledge at the field level of those aspects of program operations which could be changed to be more effective against organized crime."

IRS Comments:

The Internal Revenue Service is finalizing a manual supplement that:

- a. Sets forth the objectives for the Service's participation in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program.
- b. Delineates the responsibilities of the National Office, regional offices, district offices and the individual Strike Force representatives.
- c. Provides for the coordination and states the general procedures which are to be followed in investigations and examinations conducted jointly by the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service in accordance with the guidelines established in the January 8, 1976 agreement between IRS and DOJ on the Conduct of Joint Investigations.
- d. Specifies the criteria for the Service's selection of Strike Force cases for Audit examination and Intelligence investigation.

With respect to the evaluation of the effectiveness of the Service's participation in the Joint Agency Strike Force Program, the Service has recently made a cost/benefit analysis of the impact of this program on IRS resources. However, this analysis was limited since IRS did not have a comprehensive system that would track the results of audit examinations made on Strike Force cases from the dollars recommended by its Audit Division, through the assessment stage, and, finally, to collection.

The Service is currently developing a comprehensive reporting system that will allow it to track the results of its Intelligence and Audit investigations and examinations made on Strike Force cases. In addition, the Service is now conducting a study that tracks the results of Audit examinations and Intelligence investigations made on Strike Force cases examined by Audit in FY 1972. This study will track these cases from the audit examination results in terms of dollars recommended, to the assessment results in terms of dollars assessed, and, finally, to the collection results in terms of dollars collected. A similar follow-through on the results of Intelligence investigations will be made on these cases.

4. Page 26, Chapter 3: The GAO report makes the following recommendation:

"RECOMMENDATION

We recommend that the Attorney General develop specific criteria and establish the required information system to evaluate the effectiveness of the national and individual strike force efforts."

IRS Comments:

We suggest that this information system consider, among other things, the statutory restrictions on the IRS disclosure of confidential information as contained in Section 6103 of the Internal Revenue Code and the regulations thereunder, as amended by the Tax Reform Act of 1976.

For example, this amendment provides that tax information can be disclosed to the Justice Department and other Federal agencies for nontax criminal purposes only by order of a U.S. District Court.

5. The following portions of the GAO report pertain to a discussion of the usefulness of a computerized intelligence system developed, maintained, and operated by the Intelligence and Special Services Unit within OCRS, to collect and store information on organized crime gathered by all Federal agencies.

a. Page ii, Digest

"--A costly computerized organized crime intelligence system appeared to be of dubious value. (See ch. 5)."

b. Page 39, Chapter 5: The GAO report states that:

"In a study of the intelligence system issued in March 1976, Justice's Office of Management and Finance reported that, with the exception of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, information exchange is haphazard, rarely written or preserved and heavily dependent upon the rapport established between participating agency representatives. This informal system, the study concluded, results in an untimely and incomplete exchange of useful intelligence."

c. Page 40, Chapter 5: The GAO report states that:

"The Office of Management and Finance Study report stated that the overall assessment of strike force personnel was that racketeer profile data was not necessary for the current program of investigation and prosecution of organized crime figures."

d. Page 41, Chapter 5: The GAO report makes the following recommendation:

"RECOMMENDATION

We recommend that the Attorney General reevaluate whether an intelligence system devoted solely to organized crime figures is needed. If it is, steps should be taken to improve the quality and usefulness of data in the system."

IRS Comments:

The Internal Revenue Service is also concerned with the need and utilization of this computerized intelligence system. In June 1976, the Service requested and received detailed information from DOJ concerning the creation, purpose and utilization of the Racketeer profiles maintained in this computerized system. The Service is currently studying the extent of its role, if any, in participating in this system. One of the Service's considerations relates to the disclosure of confidential information which must be in accordance with the statutory provisions under Section 6103 of the Code and the regulations thereunder, as amended by the Tax Reform Act of 1976. Of particular concern is the possible unauthorized disclosure of tax-related information.

Upon completion of the IRS study, a determination will be made as to the extent, if any, that IRS will participate in this computerized system.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

WASHINGTON D.C. 20220

OCT 20 1976

Dear Mr. Lowe:

As suggested by your letter of August 12, 1976, to Secretary Simon, we have prepared the following comments on your draft report on the Organized Crime Strike Forces.

Although it is my understanding that the report is an assessment of the activities of the Federal Strike Forces, a large part of the draft is devoted to the activities of the National Council on Organized Crime and the sentencing practices of the Federal courts. While these topics are germane to a broad analysis of the problem of organized crime in the United States, they are beyond the control of the Strike Forces or the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Department of Justice. Perhaps the discussion of those topics could be included more appropriately in an appendix where it would be ancillary to the report on the Strike Forces. In that way, it would be less likely that what may be perceived as the failings of the Council and the courts would be attributed to the Strike Forces.

The discussion pertaining to the Strike Forces seems to imply that, since they have not eliminated organized crime in the United States, the Strike Forces have been unsuccessful. I do not agree. The mission of the Strike Force program has been to combat organized crime by prosecuting those who violate Federal criminal statutes; an expectation that prosecutions and convictions alone can effect total elimination of organized crime in a large and diverse population, such as we have, is unrealistic.

In my opinion, the number of indictments and convictions secured by the Strike Forces could be used to provide a good basis for evaluating the program. Statistics could be developed to show trends and provide a measure of quality. I am sure that these figures will show that the Strike Forces have constituted the most successful vehicle thus far developed by the Federal Government for combatting organized crime.

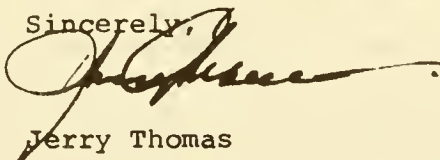

The report states that the operations of the Strike Forces are hampered because the Justice Attorneys-in-Charge have no authority over the participants from other agencies. We disagree with that statement. The Justice attorneys do exercise authority in determining which investigations will be conducted under the authority of the Strike Force. Usually the investigative agencies will propose an investigation that meets with the approval of the Justice attorney. But, the Attorney-in-Charge can decline any investigation that he believes to be inappropriate. Of course, in many instances, the agency still has the option of undertaking such an investigation on its own authority but that investigation would not be a Strike Force case.

We feel that a Strike Force should be a cooperative venture by the agencies involved and should be closely coordinated by the Department of Justice. This, however, does not mean that the Justice Department should exercise administrative supervision of the investigators working with the Strike Forces. Each agency has expertise in its particular field of investigation. It is not reasonable to expect that a small group of Justice attorneys will be more knowledgeable about investigative matters than all of the agency experts who participate in a Strike Force. The Strike Force attorneys supply the prosecutive skills. The division of responsibilities is effective and precludes an unwarranted concentration of authority in any one individual, including the chief Strike Force attorney.

While we believe that the discussion of sentencing would be more appropriately included in an appendix, we would also like to point out that the statistics cited would be more useful if the percentage of convictions that did not result in imprisonment was shown separately rather than having those cases grouped with others that resulted in light sentences as they are on page 31 of the draft report.

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on your draft.

Sincerely,

Jerry Thomas

DISQUALIFICATION OF ATTORNEYS: MULTIPLE REPRESENTATION

(By Institute on Organized Crime, Cornell University School of Law)

OUTLINE

Summary.
 Introduction.
 Right to Counsel.
 Freedom to Associate to Retain Counsel.
 Right to Practice Law.
 Right to Investigate and Prosecute.
 The Integrity of the Legal System.
 State's Obligation to Protect Individual's Rights.
 Concluding Statement.

SUMMARY

1. The basic remedy for a prosecutor faced with a multiple representation situation is a motion to disqualify.

2. The trial court has authority to disqualify an attorney based on the court's inherent power to supervise the attorneys practicing before it.

3. The standard by which the motion is judged is a balancing test weighing the interests of the state against those of the attorney and client.

4. A number of interests have been considered, but of primary importance are the individual's right to counsel and the state's interest in an effective criminal justice system.

5. A decision on these important rights cannot be made without procedural safeguards which generally include a full hearing on the motion accompanied by affidavits as a minimum.

6. The basic problem of prosecutors in the multiple representation situation has been succinctly stated by Earl J. Silbert, U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia:

"Too often, we have seen a lawyer known to represent Mr. Big in narcotics come down to represent one of his lieutenants who has been arrested. The result: the chances of the lieutenant deciding in his interest to cooperate and turn state's evidence against Mr. Big are eliminated. Too often, in cases involving business corporations or labor unions, one lawyer represents targets of the investigation and witnesses, multiple representation, which in our view fosters obstruction of justice, criminally preventing prosecutors from penetrating to the top of organized criminal conspiracies.

"Some lawyers are simply oblivious to the legal and ethical problems of multiple representation. A few, aware of the problems, deliberately ignore them for monetary reasons. Others, also aware of the problems, reject what appears to them to be the efforts of prosecutors to dictate whom they can represent."<sup>1</sup>

It is conceivable that a reminder to the offending attorney of the conflicts of interest created by his multiple representation, or an opinion from the A.B.A. may produce desired changes in some situations.<sup>2</sup> Nevertheless, the basic tactic for a prosecutor faced with the multiple representation situation is a motion to disqualify the offending attorney.<sup>3</sup>

7. The authority to disqualify an attorney comes from the inherent power of the trial judge to supervise the attorneys practicing before him.<sup>4</sup> The order of the trial judge is a matter of discretion based on all the facts and circumstances, and is reversible only as an abuse of discretion.<sup>5</sup> There are relevant statutes in some jurisdictions (e.g. Virginia), and the Code of Professional Responsibility is a standard everywhere (incorporated either by reference or through the court rules). In practice the actual standards for disqualification vary considerably among jurisdictions, but basically rest on a balancing test weighing—

- (1) the right of individuals to counsel of their choice:

(2) the right of individuals to freely associate in order to obtain counsel; and

(3) the right of attorney to practice his profession;

as compared to:

(1) the right of the state to effectively investigate and prosecute criminal activity;

(2) the interest of the state in maintaining the integrity of its courts and the legal profession; and

(3) the obligations of the state to protect the constitutional rights of individuals.

Courts have tended not to define explicitly the weight given to each factor,<sup>6</sup> but rather have either lumped all the considerations together, or focused almost exclusively on one factor. The issues dealt with most frequently are discussed below.

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

8. The right to counsel is guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment, but

"Although the right to counsel is absolute, there is no absolute right to particular counsel.<sup>7</sup> Desirable as it is that a defendant obtain private counsel of his own choice, that goal must be weighed and balanced against an equally desirable public need for the efficient and effective administration of justice."<sup>8</sup>

In Pirillo v. Takiff, 341 A.2d 896 (Pa., 1975), twelve policemen under grand jury investigation for bribery were represented by one lawyer who was paid by the Fraternal Order of Policemen (F.O.P.) thereby creating potential conflicts of interests among the witnesses, and between the witnesses and the F.O.P.<sup>9</sup> The court required each witness to obtain separate counsel not related to the F.O.P.<sup>10</sup> As explained by a lower appellate court following the Pirillo decision,

"The Court concluded that the value of a witness' right to counsel of his choice was minimal when chosen counsel was inherently unable to commit himself to act in the best interests of his client."<sup>11</sup>

The court also emphasized that the infringement of the right to counsel was the minimum necessary to protect important state interests in these circumstances.<sup>12</sup>

9. Those courts which have denied a motion for disqualification because of violation of the right to counsel have most frequently based their decision on finding of lack of evidence sufficient to warrant denial of such important rights.<sup>13</sup> These cases raise questions of procedural requirements discussed below,<sup>14</sup> and also frequently deal with the issue of the individual's right to waive conflict-free counsel.<sup>15</sup>

10. In Glasser v. U.S., 315 U.S. 70 (1962), the Supreme Court enunciated the right to assistance of counsel free from conflicts of interest. Various lower

<sup>9</sup> The conflict from representing multiple witnesses is basically that it may be in one witness' interest to turn State's evidence, but the attorney would be unable to advise him or bargain for him without prejudicing his other client(s). The conflict with respect to payment by the F.O.P. while representing witnesses is that it divides the attorney's loyalties (or at least gives the appearance of such impropriety) insofar as the interests of the witness(es) and the F.O.P. diverge. Here this second conflict was particularly apparent because the F.O.P. had actively opposed the investigation, cooperation with which might well have been in a witness' best interest.

The Code of Professional Responsibility DR 5-105(e) says:

"A lawyer may represent multiple clients if it is obvious that he can adequately represent the interests of each, and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure * * *"

This provision is much cited and little discussed in cases apparently reflecting an attitude in courts that the rule is only of general advisory value.

courts have found that right to be waivable<sup>16</sup> (relying primarily on Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975)).<sup>17</sup> In Garcia v. U.S., 517 F.2d 272 (5th Cir., 1975), the question of waiver was given thorough consideration. The court held that the district court's decision to disqualify because of the need to protect defendants from conflicts of interest was premature in that evidence had not been taken as to whether or not they would choose to waive the right to counsel without conflicts. The court (relying on Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938), and Brady v. U.S., 397 U.S. 742 (1970)), then stated:

"Individuals are free to waive the constitutional protections otherwise afforded them, regardless of their motivation as long as the waiver is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent."<sup>18</sup>

The court then elaborated on the required procedure.

"The trial court should actively participate in the waiver decision. The Supreme Court recognized the need for affirmative judicial involvement in the waiver process in Von Moltke v. Gillies, 332 U.S. 708, 723-24, 168 S.Ct. 316, 92 L.Ed. 309, 320-21 (1948). . . . [A] judge must investigate as long and as thoroughly as the circumstances of the case before him demand. The fact that an accused may tell him that he is informed of his right to counsel and desires to waive this right does not automatically end the judge's responsibility. To be valid such waiver must be made with an apprehension of the nature of the charges, the statutory offenses included within them, the range of allowable punishments thereunder, possible defenses to the charges and circumstances in mitigation thereof, and all other facts essential to a matter. A judge can make certain counsel is understandingly and wisely made only from a penetrating and comprehensive examination of all the circumstances under which such a plea is tendered.

"In accordance with the foregoing principles, we instruct the district court to follow a procedure akin to that promulgated in F.R. Crim. P. 11 whereby the defendant's voluntariness and knowledge will be manifest on the face of the record. Most significantly, the court should seek to elicit a narrative response from such defendant that he has been advised of his right to effective representation, that he understands the details of his attorney's possible conflict of interest and the potential perils of such a conflict, that he has discussed the matter with his attorney or, if he wishes, with outside counsel, and that he voluntarily waives his Sixth Amendment protections."<sup>19</sup>

11. Although waiver completely negates the state interest in protecting an individual's right to conflicts-free counsel, the other state interests can still outweigh the competing rights so that disqualification can be granted.<sup>20</sup>

FREEDOM TO ASSOCIATE TO RETAIN COUNSEL

12. This right, derived from the First Amendment, is cited primarily with reference to United Mine Workers v. Illinois State Bar Association, 389 U.S. 217 (1967)<sup>21</sup> and N.A.A.C.P. v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963).<sup>22</sup> As summarized by the Pirillo court,

"Both Button and United Mine Workers specifically addressed the issue of potential conflicts inherent in the selection of lawyers by an organization to

"When the administration of the criminal law * * * is as hedged about as it is by Constitutional safeguards for the accused, to deny him in the exercise of his free choice the right to dispense with some of these safeguards * * * is to imprison a man in his safeguard and call it the Constitution."

<sup>20</sup> In Pirillo the Court found it unnecessary to decide whether there had been effective waiver. In his fundamental work, Legal Ethics (1953), Drinker, then Chairman of the A.B.A. Ethics Committee, cited numerous A.B.A. opinions for the proposition that, in a conflicts situation, "Consent [is] unavailable where the public interest is involved." At 120. See also, In Re Abrams, 56 N.J. 271, 266 A.2d 275 (1970); and Abzo v. Wearer, 39 N.J. 412, 189 A.2d 27 (1963).

<sup>21</sup> The Bar Association's attempt to have prohibited as unauthorized practice of law the union practice of hiring an attorney to represent any member who had a Workman's Compensation claim was denied.

represent individual defendants. The selection procedures discussed there were similar to the method by which the F.O.P. recommends and pays qualified attorneys to represent individual members of the Order. The United States Supreme Court recognized that a state may act pursuant to its broad power to regulate the practice of law to prevent a serious conflict of interest from arising in the legal representation of its citizens, but held that the record below, in each instance, failed to demonstrate that any actual danger existed or that the state regulation was sufficiently narrow to meet only the particular form of danger present. The primary objectionable feature of state regulation in the First Amendment area is vagueness and overbreadth which result in regulation. Commonwealth v. Dell Publications, Inc., 427 Pa. 189, 233 A.2d 840 (1967); Smith v. Cramlish, 207 Pa. Super. Ct. 516, 218 A.2d 596 (1966). Thus, if regulations affecting First Amendment rights are no greater than necessary to eliminate the substantive evil and protect the substantial governmental interests and individual rights, then the regulation can be constitutionally tolerated. McMullen v. Wohlgemuth, 453 Pa. 147, 308 A.2d 888 (1973)."<sup>23</sup>

13. In practice these cases have been cited for the two general propositions (1) that the individual's right to associate for the purpose of obtaining counsel is protected by the First Amendment and is not to be lightly disregarded, and (2) that organizations are not prohibited from providing legal services for their members, but that a balancing test is employed to weigh whether the harm likely to result in particular cases outweighs the value of the right. The conclusion of the Pirillo court (quoted above) that proper tailoring of the court's order could avoid most problems is probably a narrower construction of First Amendment requirements than other courts would hold. The court in In Re Investigation Before the April 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600 (D.C. Cir., 1976), on evidence similar to that available in Pirillo dismissed a motion to disqualify as premature because important rights of the defendants could not be infringed upon without a full record<sup>24</sup> and until other alternatives had been exhausted.<sup>25</sup>

RIGHT TO PRACTICE LAW

14. Like the freedom of association issue, this right has received substantial reference and minimal discussion in court opinions. The Pirillo court observed:

"Unquestionably the right to pursue the occupation of one's choosing may not be curtailed without due process of law. The interest in a profession, being akin to a property right, may not be removed arbitrarily. Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114 (1889); Moore v. Jameson, 451 P.A. A.T. 308, 306 A.2d A.T. 288."<sup>26</sup>

The Pirillo court applied a balancing test, and as explained by the court in In Re January 1974 Special Investigating Grand Jury, 361 A.2d 325, 328 (Pa. Super., 1976), found that "an attorney's right to practice his profession was minimal when such practice at best operated on the margin of ethics."

RIGHT TO INVESTIGATE AND PROSECUTE

15. There is no question as to the state's right to efficiently and effectively operate its criminal justice system, and to move to disqualify an attorney whose multiple representation is impeding that function. Since this right is evaluated by a balancing test, questions do arise as to the degree of likelihood of harm, and the degree of harm likely to result. It is difficult to generalize about court's evaluations of these questions because they are so tied to the circumstances of individual cases which are often subtle and intricate. As extremes on the matter of likelihood of harm In Re Special February 1975 Grand Jury, 406 F.Supp. 194 (N.D. Ill., 1975): "I am of the opinion that for the purposes of depriving a person of his choice of counsel, there must be actual conflict, not just the appearance of it," contrasts with State v. Galati, 64 N.J. 572, 319 A.2d 220 (1974), "the cause and effect impact upon the public consciousness is almost, perhaps quite, as important as the actual fact."

Most cases take a middle course allowing the court "to nip any potential conflict of interest in the bud,"<sup>27</sup> but requiring more than mere hypotheticals and unsubstantiated allegations.<sup>28</sup> The degree of harm is of particular importance with respect to the procedural alternatives discussed below.<sup>29</sup>

THE INTEGRITY OF THE LEGAL SYSTEM

16. It is unquestioned that the general supervisory power of the court to project its integrity includes the power to disqualify an attorney with conflicts of interest. Representation in situations like U.S. Attorney Silbert's example has resulted in suspension<sup>30</sup> and disbarment,<sup>31</sup> but the standards for acceptable conduct appear to be different in a disciplinary proceeding from those used when a client's right to counsel is at stake. In In Re Abrams, 56 N.J. 271, 266 A.2d 275 (1970), a disciplinary proceeding to review an attorney's conduct of accepting payment from a numbers banker to represent those runners who got arrested, it was said that:

"... it is no answer that Canon 6 of the Canons of Professional Ethics permits the representation of conflicting interests 'by express consent of all concerned given after a full disclosure of the facts,' or that Canon 38, restated in affirmative terms, would permit the acceptance of compensation from others with 'the knowledge and consent of his client after full disclosure.' Neither rule is relevant when the subject matter is crime and when the public interest in the disclosure of criminal activities might thereby be hindered. It is inherently wrong to represent both the employer and the employee if the employee's interest may, and the public interest will, be advanced by the employee's disclosure of his employer's criminal conduct. For the same reasons, it is also inherently wrong for an attorney who represents only the employee to accept a promise to pay from one whose criminal liability may turn on the employee's testimony."

17. The statement from In Re Abrams, supra, at 278 that: "Appearances too are a matter of ethical concern, for the public has an interest in the repute of the legal profession,"<sup>32</sup> has been quoted with approval in Pirillo and explicitly rejected in February 1975 Grand Jury, supra. Between these two outer limits probably lies the majority view, but judging from the quantity and quality of the discussion the integrity of the legal system receives in these opinions on disqualification, it would seem that it is not a matter of great weight.

STATE'S OBLIGATION TO PROTECT INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

18. This matter has received a considerable amount of attention in the opinions in a variety of forms. The basic application to the multiple representation situation is that if the state recognizes that conflicts of interest exist such that an individual's right to counsel is threatened, it is the state's duty to protect the individual.<sup>33</sup> To fulfill this duty the state can act to disqualify the individual's attorney.<sup>34</sup> As discussed above with respect to Garcia, this obligation can be satisfied by the court's proper supervision of a competent waiver. It has also been held that a motion to disqualify on the grounds of protecting a defendant from being deprived of conflict-free counsel cannot be granted unless the defendant has had the opportunity to waive that right. U.S. v. Armedo-Sarmiento, 524 F.2d 591 (20 Cir. 1975).

19. Courts have established various procedures to insure that individual's rights will be safeguarded. In February 1975 Grand Jury, supra, the court rejected a disqualification motion based on allegations in the motion papers and required affidavits as a minimum. In January 1974 Grand Jury, supra, after reversing a disqualification for lack of evidence when based only on an unrecorded in camera hearing and a single letter from counsel indicating the intent of his three clients to resist any immunity offers. The court said, at 330:

"We do not imply that, in support of his petition to disqualify an attorney, it will be necessary for the special prosecutor to produce the witnesses whose

testimony allegedly supports an inference that multiple representation will lead to contrived "stonewalling" of the grand jury and frustration of its purpose. It would be acceptable if, by affidavit attached to his petition, the special prosecutor set forth the substance of the testimony, the salient facts, supporting his petition for disqualification, without disclosing particulars such as the names of witnesses who provided such testimony. The hearing on the petition could then be limited to whether the allegations are sufficient to justify the disqualification of the attorney in question. At least that procedure would assure the affected parties an opportunity for a meaningful hearing and an effective appeal.'

20. The court in April 1975 Grand Jury, supra, required far more action on the part of the prosecutor before disqualification could be granted. The prosecutor was faced with a situation where one hundred workers represented by one attorney paid by the union were making blanket assertions of the right to silence. The prosecutor moved to disqualify and require separate counsel. He argued that (1) the current management was denying workers adequate representation,<sup>35</sup> and (2) was impeding investigation by producing unwarranted assertions of the Fifth Amendment privilege, and by promoting "stonewalling." In reversing the district court's grant of the motion the court decried "what is strikingly absent from the record,"<sup>36</sup> explaining,

"* * * there is no testimony or other evidence in the record indicating which of the subpoenaed witnesses consider Mr. Rosen to be their personal legal representative; how the witnesses would characterize the nature of their attorney-client relationship with Mr. Rosen; whether they are personally aware of the potential conflicts of interest inherent in Mr. Rosen's multiple representation; whether given such conflicts of interest they would still prefer to be represented by Mr. Rosen rather than another attorney; and, finally, whether they would expect to continue to assert the privilege against self-incrimination even if, denied Mr. Rosen's services, they elected to dispose with counsel entirely or to retain separate and exclusive counsel."<sup>37</sup>

The court then proceeded to tell the prosecutor how to go about getting the required information.

"These problems with the record might have been avoided had the Government pursued the traditional method of dealing with witnesses who make 'blind, indiscriminate and legally unwarranted assertions' of the privilege against self-incrimination. The Government could have brought each witness before the District Court for a ruling with respect to whether the privilege was properly asserted * * *.

"At a hearing determining the applicability of the privilege to particular questions asked by the grand jury, the District Court would certainly be free to inform itself about the Government's allegations of conflicts of interest and inadequate representation by inquiring whether the witness was represented by Mr. Rosen, whether the witness was aware of the limitation on Mr. Rosen's ability to negotiate immunity in exchange for testimony, whether given that limitation the witness would prefer counsel other than Mr. Rosen, and whether the witness proposed to continue to assert the privilege under all circumstances."<sup>38</sup>

21. The above procedure is essentially the same requirement of a formal hearing on a motion to disqualify for conflicts of interest as applied in other cases.<sup>39</sup> With respect to the stonewalling problem, however, though the court recognized the difficulty, it left the prosecution with the grant of immunity as its almost exclusive remedy in the situation.

"It seems to us that the circumstances of this case present precisely the type of situation for which Congress intended to provide the Government with an effective tool for discovering the truth without risking violations of the Constitution in the delicate areas of freedom of association and representation by counsel of one's choice. As the Second Circuit has recently observed, '[t]he accommodation between the right of the Government to compel testimony, on the one hand, and the constitutional privilege to remain silent, on the other, is the immunity statute.' United States v. Tramunti 500 F.2d 1334, 1342, cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1079, 95 S.Ct. 667, 42 L.Ed.2d 673 (1974). Until accommodation in that manner has been demonstrated to be not feasible or contrary to the public interest, it is surely premature to seek it through disqualification of counsel."<sup>40</sup>

22. The role of the immunity statute in the multiple representation situation is a recurring problem which has not yet been fully discussed in the opinions. The general factual context is one where lawyer (L) represents A and B and the prosecutor is able to get a grant of immunity for either A or B and thereby compel his testimony.<sup>41</sup> Conflicts arise at two stages. The first stage is when the prosecutor approaches L to negotiate immunity. In the normal situation where A and B have interests which are at least somewhat in conflict,<sup>42</sup> it would be impossible for L to have served B's best interests while securing immunity for A.<sup>43</sup> Secondly, once immunity has been granted to A and the case goes to trial, L is limited in his ability to cross-examine A because of A's right to prohibit L's use of information obtained through the attorney-client relationship.<sup>44</sup> Consequently, there is a virtually automatic conflict of interest inherent in every multiple representation situation where an immunity statute is available.

23. In summarizing the general multiple representation problem the Watergate Special Prosecution Force said:

"In almost every investigation which centers on the criminal activity of one or more members of a hierarchical structure—whether a corporation, labor union, a Government agency, or a less formally organized group—the prosecutor is confronted with a witness who has been called to testify about his employers. Many times, the witness is represented by an attorney who also represents the employer and perhaps is compensated by him. Although the legal profession's Code of Professional Responsibility forbids a lawyer from representing conflicting or even potentially conflicting interests, lawyers and judges historically have been reluctant to enforce the Code's mandate strictly. They have taken the position that, so long as the witness understands that his attorney also represents the person or entity about which he will be asked to testify and that he has the right to a lawyer of his own choosing, he cannot be forced to retain new counsel.

"No lay witness, however, can realistically be expected to appropriate all the legal and practical ramifications of his attorney's dual loyalties, and in many cases he will be precluded from giving adequate consideration to the possibility of cooperating with the Government by the fear that the fact of his cooperation will be revealed to his employer. A mere inquiry by the judge in open court concerning the witness' preference is not likely to elicit a truthful response. It is necessary, therefore, for the court to intervene more directly by making a factual determination as to the existence of the conflict of interest and then requiring the witness to retain, or appointing for him, counsel who has no such conflict. Although there will obviously be great reluctance to interfere with the individual's freedom to select his own attorney, the suggested course is the only one that can preserve the equally valid right of the Government to his full and truthful testimony.

<sup>41</sup> The federal statute 18 U.S.C. sections 6002, 6003 provides the prosecutor with this option. Although immunity grants have been around for a long time, this general immunity statute was not enacted until 1970. The newness of the statute may explain the lack of clarity of its application in this context.

<sup>44</sup> This presumes what is probably the normal situation, that A has been granted immunity because he has damaging information to disclose, and that A is called in B's trial to reveal that information. See United States v. Arcedo-Sarmiento, 524 F.2d 591 (2d Cir., 1975) (disqualification reversed because defendant must be given the opportunity to waive the right to an attorney not limited in cross-examination by a prior attorney-client relationship) and the A.L.R. annotation "Propriety and Prejudicial Effect of Counsel's Representing Defendant in a Criminal Case Notwithstanding Counsel's Representation or Former Representation of Prosecution Witness," 27 A.L.R.3d 1431.

"Both the courts and the various bar groups should be alerted to the serious issues of professional responsibility arising out of the representation of multiple interests during grand jury investigations, and Government counsel should press on every justifiable occasion for a judicial ruling on the question of conflict of interest and, where a conflict is found, for the replacement of the attorney involved."<sup>45</sup>

INTEREST OF THE AMICUS

Americans for Effective Law Enforcement, Inc. (AELE), is a national, not-for-profit, non-partisan, non-political organization incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois. AELE has received a tax exempt ruling from the Internal Revenue Service as an educational corporation. As stated in its by-laws the purposes of AELE are: 1. To explore and consider the needs and requirements for the effective enforcement of the criminal law. 2. To inform the public of these needs and requirements, to the end that the courts will administer justice based upon a due concern for the general welfare and security of law-abiding citizens. 3. To assist the police, the prosecution, and the courts in promoting a more effective and fairer administration of the criminal law.

AELE has appeared as amicus curiae in support of the average citizen's concern for the effectiveness of proper law enforcement on at least fourteen occasions in the Supreme Court of the United States, twice in the Fourth, Seventh and Eighth Circuits and the Supreme Court of Illinois, and once each in the United States Courts of Appeals for the Ninth, Tenth, and District of Columbia Circuits, and once each in the United States District Courts for the Eastern District of Virginia and the District of Maryland, and once each in the Missouri Court of Appeals, the Kentucky Court of Appeals, the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, and the Supreme Court of California.

The interest of the amici in the instant appeal stems from the importance of the legal and constitutional issues here presented, the resolution of which will have a direct and immediate impact upon the ability of law enforcement to respond to the unique challenge of the dangerous special offender through a policy of incapacitation. The amici hope in this appeal to speak now for those who might otherwise be future victims of crime.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

The defendants were convicted under 18 U.S.C. § 371 of conspiring to violate 18 U.S.C. § 1952 by promoting and establishing an unlawful business enterprise involving gambling, prostitution and bribery in violation of the laws of the State of Oklahoma. The facts established by the United States in the defendants' jury trial are summarized in an opinion of another panel of this court affirming the conviction in United States v. Bishop, 492 F.2d 1361, 1362-64 (8th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 942 (1974). That panel termed the evidence of guilt "overwhelming." 492 F.2d at 1365.

Prior to the trial, the United States filed with the court<sup>1</sup> a pleading to notify the defendants and the court that the government would seek to have the court

A final reminder to prosecutors is worthy of mention because it is important to note that some of the same sorts of facts which argue for disqualification also apply to an individual's motion for a new trial. Thus, a prosecutor who chooses to ignore, or fails to notice, a defense attorney's multiple representation and succeeds in his prosecution may find that his efforts were largely wasted when the conviction is reversed because the defendant was denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. The standards for decision in this area are not very clear, varying from United States ex rel. Hart v. Davenport, 478 F.2d 263, 210 (3d Cir., 1973), where:

"Upon a showing of possible conflict of interest or prejudice, however remote, we will regard joint representation as Constitutionally defective."

To State v. Montgomery, 15 Mo. App. 7, 288 A.2d 628 (1972), where a determined judge managed to explain away obvious conflicts. See also, the A.L.R. annotation "Circumstances Giving Rise to Conflicts of Interest Between or Among Criminal Co-Defendants Precluding Representation by Same Counsel," 34 A.L.R.3d 470.

<sup>1</sup> The pleading was not filed with the presiding judge. Instead, it was served on the defendants and filed with another judge of the court, who sealed it until the return of the jury verdict, when it was then made available to the presiding judge for proper disposition. See, 18 U.S.C. § 3575(a).

sentence the defendants as "dangerous special offenders" under 18 U.S.C. §3575. Following the trial, the court entered a series of orders in connection with the original pleading and the United States' request for a dangerous special offender hearing. Initially the court ordered the government to file with the court the evidence it intended to rely upon. The court then found the original pleading inadequate and ordered the United States to amend its pleading. It then ordered the defendants examined under 18 U.S.C. §4208(b). The defendants appealed their conviction at this point, but it was affirmed. See, United States v. Bishop, supra. Following this affirmance, the court again found the United States' pleading inadequate, denied leave to amend, found that a dangerous special offender sentence could not constitutionally be imposed based on the type of information the prosecuting attorney proposed to rely upon, and held that 18 U.S.C. §3575(f) was unconstitutionally vague. The United States then sought to mandamus or appeal this decision. Another panel of this court held that mandamus would not lie and that the appeal had to await the imposition of sentence. The court then sentenced each of the defendants, following usual procedures, for a term of two years out of a possible five. See, 18 U.S.C. §1952. The United States now appeals the failure of the court to sentence the defendants as dangerous special offenders under 18 U.S.C. §3575.

ISSUES PRESENTED

(1) Did the United States' pleading of November 28, 1972, give the defendants and the court adequate notice that the United States would seek to have the court sentence the defendants as dangerous special offenders under 18 U.S.C. §3575?

(2) Consistent with due process, may a dangerous special offender sentence be predicated under 18 U.S.C. §3577 on (a) general information or (b) evidence of other criminal conduct not shown by a reasonable doubt to a jury?

(3) Consistent with due process, does the standard of "dangerous" under 18 U.S.C. §3575(f) give adequate guidance to a court to impose a special offender sentence?

(4) Consistent with due process and double jeopardy, may the United States appeal the failure of a court to impose a dangerous special sentence under 18 U.S.C. §3576?

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Point I

Congress intended that dangerous special offender sentencing hearings be initiated by notice, not fact, pleading. The United States' pleading of November 28, 1972, gave to the defendants and the court adequate notice that the United States would seek to have the court sentence the defendants as dangerous special offenders. Because the lower court misread the statute to require fact pleading, it struck the United States' notice as inadequate. This ruling was in error and must now be set aside.

Point II

Due process standards for sentencing hearings do not require trial-type rules and procedures. A dangerous special offender hearing is an inquiry into circumstances of aggravation in the commission of the felony itself, and not an independent proceeding, dealing with a separate charge. However categorized, the statutory standards for the hearing comply with due process. Such a hearing may proceed without special rules of evidence, issues may be determined by the court, and not a jury, and the United States need only meet a burden of preponderance, not beyond a reasonable doubt. The court below wrongfully excluded certain types of information and evidence per se, when it should have admitted and then appropriately evaluated them. This ruling was in error and must now be reversed.

Point III

A statute must be read as a whole in light of its language and legislative history and given, where possible, a constitutional construction. Congress found that special offenders merited, as a class, extended terms. It then provided a safety valve, and authorized courts not to impose such terms, where, on a case by case basis, it was evident that special offenders posed no danger of continued criminal conduct. The court below misread the statute and then held its misreading unconstitutionally vague. This ruling was in error and must now be reversed.

Point IV

Congress intended that this court have jurisdiction to review failures to impose dangerous special offender sentences at the instance of the United States. Such a review of sentence on the appeal of the United States does not violate the defendant's due process rights, since it cannot be exercised under the statutory scheme in such a fashion that it is vindictive. In addition, such a review does not violate the principle of double jeopardy, since it cannot result in the defendant being retried before the trier of fact on a question of guilt or innocence, rather than punishment. Consequently, this appeal is authorized, and it is constitutional.

The sentence imposed on the defendants below must now be reversed and the lower court given appropriate guidance in the holding of a dangerous special offender hearing.

THE STATUTORY SCHEME

The appeal is one of the first under the dangerous special offender sentencing provisions enacted by the Congress in 1970 as Title X of the Organized Crime Control Act, 84 Stat. 922 et seq. (hereinafter noted as Title X). Consequently, this appeal affords this court a unique opportunity to give an authoritative interpretation to Title X, to examine its constitutional ramifications, and to give helpful guidance to prosecutors and the lower courts. It is appropriate, therefore, to preface the argument in this amicus brief with a short background treatment of the statutory scheme itself.

Shortly after Senator John L. McClellan introduced S.30, which ultimately became the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, he discussed the problem of organized crime in the United States in an extended address on the Senate floor.<sup>2</sup> Part of the address discussed the general problem of sentencing. He observed: "There is no doubt that whatever view one holds about the criminal law, its importance in our society cannot be questioned. Here each places his ultimate reliance for security. Nevertheless, we must recognize, too, that the penal law contains the strongest force known to our society, a force which in the past has too often tended toward brutality. Exercised well, it accords to each security. Exercised ill, it accords to none security. How that power should be exercised is thus a question of capital importance.

"Traditionally, two tendencies have manifested themselves in the penal law in reaction to the brutality of another day, perhaps best illustrated by the philosophy of Draco, who, it should be recalled, once lamented that he knew of no penalty harsher than death, for he felt the smallest crime merited it.

"The first tendency, going back in modern times to Beccaria's historic 1764 essay, 'On Crime and Punishments,' seeks to fit the punishment to the crime. This tendency was, of course, rooted in a desire to limit the fearful application of the death penalty, at one time the punishment for numerous, some very petty, offenses. Its overall effect has been to narrow not only the application of the death penalty, but also to eliminate long prison terms.

"The second, stemming from contemporary theories of criminology, seeks to fit the punishment to the offender. This tendency, of course, is rooted in a desire to rehabilitate. Those who generally espouse this view, however, have tended to the conclusion that crime can best be dealt with only by broad changes in our society and through intensive work with juveniles. Unfortunately, this view has shown, as an American Bar Association study concluded, 'little realistic concern about the organized and well-habituated criminals who incessantly exploit the community.'

"The penal codes of most jurisdictions, however, reflect little of either approach. Indeed, save for attempts to abolish the death penalty, little attention at all has been given to the penalty structure of most penal codes since the turn of the century. Penalties vary from one offense to the next without seeming rhyme or reason. Inconsistencies abound throughout".<sup>3</sup>

There are, of course, certain exceptions to the Senator's broad generalizations. The Congress, for example, has moved to deal with the rehabilitation of youthful offenders. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§5005-26. It has also moved to make special provision for the rehabilitation of narcotics offenders.<sup>4</sup> Nevertheless, it remains largely true that the federal system of criminal justice lacks an overall rational sentencing scheme.

Testifying before the House Judiciary Subcommittee holding hearings on S.30, Senator McClellan described the present federal court system, particularly as it affects the racketeer, in these terms:

"The basic defect in our sentencing law has been that, for a given crime, every offender has been exposed to a single maximum authorized punishment set by the Congress, while a sentencing court's choice of a particular sentence at or under that maximum has not been reviewable by the appellate courts. This defect has led the Congress, in setting maximum sentences for various crimes, to establish those maximums at compromise levels which reduce the risk of abusively high sentences for ordinary criminals, but are too lenient to protect society by confining recidivists, professionals, and organized criminals.

"Federal and state racket prosecutors for years have been aware of the insufficiency of sentences imposed on organized crime leaders. Their experience was confirmed recently by the results of a staff study by the Senate Criminal Laws Subcommittee based upon sentencing data gathered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation . . . [L]et me simply mention now that we found that two thirds of La Cosa Nostra members included in the study and indicated by the Federal government since 1960 have faced maximum prison terms of only 5 years or less, and that nevertheless fewer than one-fourth have received the maximum sentences, 12 percent have received no jail terms, and the sentences of the remainder have averaged only 40 to 50 percent of the maximums."<sup>5</sup>

It was in this broad context of dissatisfaction with the present penalty structure of the federal penal code that Title X was proposed.

As finally enacted, Title X authorizes a federal prosecuting attorney to notify an adult felony defendant and the court before trial that the United States will seek to have the court impose sentence on the defendant as a dangerous special offender.<sup>6</sup> The types of special offender are defined: recidivist,<sup>7</sup> professional offender,<sup>8</sup> and organized crime offender.<sup>9</sup> The concept of "dangerous" is

It is reprinted in House Hearings at 111-15. Typical of the cases discussed in the article is the sentence of Louis Taglianetti, a "soldier" in Cosa Nostra boss Raymond Patriarca's New England crime family. Taglianetti received a seven month sentence for tax evasion. Ironically, for the ordinary citizens convicted that same year for tax evasion, the average sentence was ten months. Id. at 113.

<sup>9</sup> 18 U.S.C. §3575(e)(1). The concept of "organized crime" has been much like the elephant of fable to those who conducted their examination of the beast in a dark room. Some saw nothing, and decided nothing was there. See, e.g., G. Hawkins, "God and the Mafia," The Public Interest No. 14, Winter 1969, pp. 24-51; compare the summaries of wiretaps reprinted in H. Zeiger, The Jersey Mob (Signet ed. 1975). Others examined the phenomenon through the senses of an anthropologist, and saw not a conspiracy, but a social system. See, e.g., F. Ianni, A Family Business (Simon and Shuster 1972). Others looked only at press accounts, and saw it in public relations terms. D. Smith, The Mafia Mystique (Basic Books 1975). Others looked at it as an organizational theorist, and saw its special character in its functional division of labor. D. Cressey, Theft of a Nation (Harper and Row 1969). Some examined it as a lawyer, and saw it as "conspiracy." See, e.g., G. Blakey, "Aspects of the Evidence Gathering Process in Organized Crime Cases," in Task Force Report on Organized Crime, President's Commission on Crime and Administration of Justice (1967), pp. 80, 81-83 (hereinafter cited Task Force). This, too, was the view taken of it by the President's Crime Commission, and it is reflected in Title X. The Crime Commission identified "organized crime," not with the Mafia (La Cosa Nostra was termed only the "core" of organized crime, Task Force at 6; other groups were recognized to be involved), but with conspiratorial criminal behavior, when its sophistication had reached the level where its division of labor included positions for an "enforcer" of violence and a "corrupter" of the legitimate processes of our society. Ibid. at 8. Title X's definition of the "organized crime" offender in 18 U.S.C. §3575(e)(3) reflects the theoretical framework (e.g., "give or receive bribe," "use force"). See, S. Rep. No. 91-617, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969), p. 165 (hereinafter cited Senate Report):

also defined.<sup>10</sup> The court must hold a full hearing on the dangerous special offender notice with a substantial presentence report, disclosure, right to counsel, compulsory process, and cross examination.<sup>11</sup> After findings and a statement of reasons, the court may impose an extended term, not disproportionate to the underlying offense and not to exceed twenty-five years.<sup>12</sup> Title X also authorizes appellate review of the sentence at the instance of either the defendant or the United States,<sup>13</sup> and it codifies the right of a federal court to consider the fullest information possible in determining an appropriate sentence.<sup>14</sup>

As such, Title X implements in principle recommendations of the American Bar Association,<sup>15</sup> the National Council on Crime and Delinquency,<sup>16</sup> the American Law Institute,<sup>17</sup> the President's Commission on Crime and the Administration of Justice,<sup>18</sup> the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Law<sup>19</sup> and the United States Judicial Conference<sup>20</sup> that the Congress should authorize one maximum sentence for ordinary offenders and a greater maximum for the more dangerous type of offender. Furthermore, it continues in another area the work of such pioneer legislation as the youthful offender and narcotic addict provisions of present law.

ARGUMENT

I. The United States pleading of November 28, 1972, gave the defendants and the court adequate notice that the United States would seek to have the court sentence the defendants as dangerous special offenders under 18 U.S.C. §3575.

Title X authorizes the attorney for the United States to file with the court a "notice," when it seeks to have a dangerous special offender sentence imposed. The language of the statute must be sharply contrasted with Rule 7 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which requires indictments to be "a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged." (Emphasis added.) The contrast between the language of Title X and Rule 7 casts into sharp relief the intent of Congress to utilize a system of "notice" rather than "fact" pleadings to initiate dangerous special offender hearings.

The pleading filed by the United States on November 28, 1972, gave to the defendants and the court all of the "notice" required by Title X. The "notice," in relevant part, read as follows:

"Now comes the United States, by and through its attorneys, Bert C. Hurn, United States Attorney for the Western District of Missouri, and Gary Cornwell, Special Attorney, United States Department of Justice, who are charged

This provision is designed to deal primarily with the organized crime offender. Those who personally play or are to play leadership roles or are the enforcers or executors of violence are singled out for social sentencing treatment. Those who give and those who receive bribes are also covered. The word "bribe" is not used in a narrow or technical sense, and should be interpreted broadly. The degree of aggravation in the sentence in each case must be determined by the court from all the facts and circumstances in the context of these statutory standards and within the outside limits of the penalty range. The sophistication of the organization, its division of labor, the complexity of its goals, and its contemplated time span are all factors to consider.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid. The concept of proportionality here is "judicially determined." Final Report of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Law (1971), p. 443 (hereinafter cited Reform Commission). In the usual case, this would mean that the extended term could not be more than regular term, i.e., in this case where 18 U.S.C. §1952 authorizes 5 years, the extended term could not be more than 5 years, for a total of 10. For a general discussion of the concept of proportionality, see the remarks of Congressman Richard Poff in 116 Cong. Rec. 35290-98 (October 7, 1970). Congressman Poff, the second ranking member of the minority on the House Judiciary Committee in 1970, was a major force in the House hearings and his bill H.R. 19215, 91st Cong., 2nd Sess. (September 15, 1970), served as the model for the amendments made in the House Judiciary Committee to S. 30 as it passed the Senate. Consequently, his statements on the floor of the House take on special meaning in understanding legislative intent.

with the prosecution of the above named defendants before the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri for alleged violations of 18 U.S.C. §§371 and 1952, which are felonies committed when the defendants were each over the age of 21 years, and hereby files this notice with the Court, in compliance with the provisions of 18 U.S.C. §3575(a), stating that upon conviction for said felonies these defendants are each subject to the imposition of sentences under 18 U.S.C. §3575(b) as dangerous special offenders.

"We do believe that said defendants are dangerous special offenders for the reason that such felonies constituted, and were committed by defendants in furtherance of a conspiracy with three or more persons to engage in a pattern of conduct criminal under the laws of the United States, and the State of Oklahoma, and the defendants agreed to and did organize, plan, finance, direct, manage and supervise all or part of such illegal conduct and activities, and agreed to give and receive a bribe and to use force as part of such conduct, all within the meaning of §3575(e) (3) of Title 18, United States Code."

As Title X requires, the pleading gave to the defendants and the court "notice" of the United States' intention to seek the imposition of an extended term. The pleading "specified" that the defendants were dangerous special offenders. It then "particularized," into which of the three categories of dangerous special offenders the defendants fell and the reason why, absent mitigating factors, the United States believed the defendants were dangerous special offenders.

The court below—understandably—misread the intent of Title X.<sup>21</sup> The proceedings envisioned by Title X, of course, were new. Following past practices and modes of thought, the court read Title X as if it authorized the filing of a pleading "in the nature of an indictment." Consequently, the court failed to see the significance of the word "notice" and read the phrase "setting out with particularity the reasons" as if it referred to facts, rather than the categories of different dangerous special offenders under subsection (e). As noted above, of course, this was a misreading of the statute.

Having so constructed Title X to require "fact" pleading, the court then found the November 28 pleading defective, and it ordered the United States to file an "amendment." The statute, of course, permits amendments, i.e., the addition of new specific categories of special offenders,<sup>22</sup> to be filed, "a reasonable time before trial or acceptance by the court of a plea . . ." <sup>23</sup> Since that was no longer possible, this pleading had to be struck.

To say that the court erred in its reading of Title X is not to say that its instincts were unsound. Obviously, the defendants could not be expected to defend themselves in a dangerous special offender hearing based solely on the notice filed by the United States. What the defendants should have done, however, was to move for the filing of a "supplementary pleading in the nature of a bill of particulars." The court was authorized to order such a pleading<sup>24</sup> and the hearing should have then proceeded on that basis. Striking the pleading, on the other hand, was a reversible error which this court must now correct.

II. Consistent with due process, a dangerous special offender sentence may be predicated under 18 U.S.C. §3577 on (a) general information or (b) evidence of other criminal conduct not shown by a reasonable doubt to a jury.

18 U.S.C. §3577 provides that:

No limitation shall be placed on the information concerning the background character and conduct of a person convicted of an offense which a court of the

<sup>21</sup> The Court's misreading of the statute was occasioned in part by the similar misreading of Judge Hunter in United States v. Kelly, 16 Crim. Law Rep'r. 2190 (November 8, 1974), an appeal of which is now pending in this court.

<sup>22</sup> For example, suppose after having filed the pleading in this case, but prior to verdict or plea, the United States had learned that one of the defendants also qualified as dangerous special offender because he was a recidivist. It would then have been open to the United States to file an amendment adding paragraph (1) to the notice that then only included paragraph (3).

<sup>23</sup> The legislative history of Title X makes it clear that "the notice is freely amendable" but the right to amend must be made within the framework of the "reasonable time" limitation. Senate Report at 162.

<sup>24</sup> Rule 57(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides that if "no procedure is specifically prescribed . . . the court may proceed in any lawful manner not inconsistent with" the Rules themselves. The Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, although carefully drafted, did not specify all of the modes of procedure for its implementation in the courts. For example, the Supreme Court has only recently amended Rule 7(c)(2) (Indictment and Information) and Rule 32(b)(2) (Judgment) to accommodate the new concept of "criminal forfeiture" introduced in the federal system by Title IX of the Act. As the need arises, the Court can be expected to promulgate new rules in this area, too. Until that time, Rule 57(b) can accommodate the necessary procedural innovations required by Title X.

United States may receive and consider for the purpose of imposing an appropriate sentence.

This provision, enacted as part of Title X, is little more than a statutory codification<sup>25</sup> of the due process principles for sentencing enunciated by the Supreme Court's landmark decision of Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241 (1949).

In Williams, the Supreme Court literally faced a life or death issue. The defendant was convicted of first degree murder with a jury recommendation of life. The trial judge reviewed a wide spectrum of information were allegations, supported in part by evidence, but not proven in the context of a criminal trial, that the defendant had committed thirty other burglaries. In addition, the probation report termed the defendant a "menace to society." The judge did not follow the recommendation of the jury; he sentenced the defendant to death. The defendant appealed, challenging his sentence on due process grounds. In an opinion by Mr. Justice Black, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. Following are key quotes from the Court's opinion:

"Tribunals passing on the guilt of a defendant always have been hedged in by strict evidentiary procedural limitations. But both before and since the American colonies became a nation, courts in this country and in England practiced a policy under which a sentencing judge could exercise a wide discretion in the sources and types of evidence used to assist him in determining the kind and extent of punishment to be imposed within limits fixed by law. Out-of-court affidavits have been used frequently, and of course in the smaller communities sentencing judges naturally have in mind their knowledge of the personalities and backgrounds of convicted offenders. A recent manifestation of the historical latitude allowed sentencing judges appears in Rule 32 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. That rule provides for consideration by federal judges of reports made by probation officers containing information about a convicted defendant, including such information 'as may be helpful in imposing sentence or in granting probation or in the correctional treatment of the defendant * * *. 337 U.S. at 246.

"In a trial before verdict the issue is whether a defendant is guilty of having engaged in certain criminal conduct of which he has been specifically accused. Rules of evidence have been fashioned for criminal trials which narrowly confine the trial contest to evidence that is strictly relevant to the particular offense charged. These rules rest in part on a necessity to prevent a time-consuming and confusing trial of collateral issues. They were also designed to prevent tribunals concerned solely with the issue of guilt of a particular offense from being influenced to convict for that offense by evidence that the defendant had habitually engaged in other misconduct. A sentencing judge, however, is not confined to the narrow issue of guilt. His task within fixed statutory or constitutional limits is to determine the type and extent of punishment after the issue of guilt has been determined. Highly relevant—if not essential—to his selection of an appropriate sentence is the possession of the fullest information possible concerning the defendant's life and characteristics. And modern concepts individualizing punishment have made it all the more necessary that a sentencing judge not be denied an opportunity to obtain pertinent information by a requirement of rigid adherence to restrictive rules of evidence properly applicable to the trial. . . . The belief no longer prevails that every offense in a like legal category calls for an identical punishment without regard to the past life and habits of a particular offender. Id. at 247.

* * * * *

"Under the practice of individualizing punishments, investigational techniques have been an important role. Probation workers making reports of their investigations have not been trained to prosecute but to aid offenders. Their reports have been given a high value by conscientious judges who want to sentence persons on the best available information rather than on guesswork and inadequate information. To deprive sentencing judges of this kind of information would undermine modern penological procedural policies that have been cautiously adopted throughout the nation after careful consideration and experimentation. We must recognize that most of the information now relied upon by judges to guide them in the intelligent imposition of sentences would be unavailable if information were restricted to that given in open court by witnesses subject to cross-examination. Id. at 249-50.

"The due process clause should not be treated as a device for freezing the evidential procedure of sentencing in the mold of trial procedure." Id. at 251.

Williams v. New York was followed in the Supreme Court ten years later by Williams v. Oklahoma; the Supreme Court once again had a death case, Williams was convicted of murder, 358 U.S. 576 (1959), and sentenced to life. He then pled guilty to kidnapping growing out of the same transaction. At the time of sentencing, the State's Attorney outlined Williams' background in an unsworn statement. It included an extensive criminal record. The court sentenced Williams to death. He appealed, challenging his sentence on due process grounds. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. Included among the alternative grounds on which the Court relied was Williams v. New York, 358 U.S. at 584.

More recently, Williams v. New York, 358 U.S. at 584 in Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605, 608 (1967).

The principle of Williams—that a sentencing judge is not limited by trial-type due process standards—is, of course, not without limitations. Informal procedures may be consistent with due process, but they must not be infected with 'materially untrue assumptions,' Townsend v. Burke, 334 U.S. 736 (1948) (reliance on materially false prior record challenged by defendant); and no reliance may be placed on a fact established by informal procedures based on another proceeding that was fundamentally defective on constitutional grounds, United States v. Tucker, 404 U.S. 443 (1972) (reliance on previous convictions to establish prior robberies where defendant was uncounseled). The Williams principle, therefore, goes to the type of evidence on which a court may permissibly rely under the due process clause, where no challenge is made to the accuracy of the information. Significantly, such a challenge was not made in Williams v. New York, 358 U.S. at 244, or in Williams v. Oklahoma, 358 U.S. at 580. Where such a challenge is made, presumably the duty of the court is to hold a hearing to resolve it, but not to exclude the evidence altogether on the grounds that it might be "inaccurate."

While not challenging the continuing validity of Williams v. New York as indeed it could not—the court below sought to classify the dangerous special offender sentencing hearing with the sort of proceeding condemned by the Supreme Court in Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605 (1967). In Specht, the Court had before it the Colorado Sex Offenders Act, Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§39-19-1 to 10 (1963). It provided that where one was convicted of a sex offense, he could be held for an indeterminate term from one day to life "without notice and full hearing." 386 U.S. at 607. The post-conviction allegations in Specht were held to constitute a new criminal charge, separate and distinct from the criminal conviction, which only triggered the new sex offender proceedings. The Court observed: "The Sex Offenders Act does not make the commission of a specified crime the basis for sentencing." 386 U.S. at 608. In Title X, in contrast, the dangerous special offender criteria measure facts, which aggravate the penalty for the offense itself.<sup>20</sup> Under Title X, the conduct embraced within the criteria must be factually related to the felony for which sentence is imposed, and the Supreme Court has indicated in numerous cases that such facts do not relate to a separate criminal charge. Gryger v. Burke, 334 U.S. 728, 732 (1948); Graham v. West Virginia, 224 U.S. 620, 625 (1912); Moore v. Missouri, 159 U.S. 673, 677 (1895). Title X poses, in Specht's language, "a distinct issue," 386 U.S. at 610, quoting Graham, 224 U.S. at 625, but it does not constitute a separate charge. Consequently, Title X falls within the sentencing rationale of Williams and not the independent proceeding rationale of Specht.

Even assuming Specht applies to Title X, it does not follow that Title X would be much the worse for the encounter. Strictly speaking, all Specht held was that the absence of any provision for notice and hearing made the Colorado statute unconstitutional. Its dicta, moreover, are not as expansive as the lower court assumed. Specht says nothing about a jury trial or the reasonable doubt standard, and it is not clear that its reference to confrontation need be read to mean trial-type confrontation.<sup>27</sup> The crucial dicta of the Court were:

"Due process . . . requires that . . . [the defendant] be present with counsel, have an opportunity to be heard, be confronted with witnesses against him, have the right to cross examine and to offer evidence of his own. And there must be findings adequate to make meaningful any appeal that is allowed." 386 U.S. at 610.

Tested by this language, Title X passes constitutional muster. Even though Specht—type due process standards were not constitutionally compelled, they were statutorially adopted. Title X provides for notice, hearing, counsel, compulsory process, cross examination, findings of fact, statement of reasons and appeal.

The judgement reflected in Title X, that the Court and not the jury should sentence on the basis of all available information, evaluated against a preponderance of the information test, moreover, reflects the best judgment of those who have spent the better part of their professional lives studying how to make our nation's system of sentencing more rational.

In 1967, the President's Crime Commission called for 'extended prison terms' for convicted "supervisory or other management" personnel in an "illegal business" based on "the evidence, presentence report or sentence hearing."<sup>28</sup> Its Task Force on the Courts recognized the need for "fuller participation" by counsel on the "question of sentence," but explicitly rejected the notion of a "full trial" and sought to achieve the goal "without encumbering the sentencing proceedings with rigid evidentiary rules and formal procedures."<sup>29</sup>

The American Law Institute's Model Penal Code in Section 7.03 would authorize extended terms for certain types of offenders. The extended term issue would be tried to the court rather than a jury.<sup>30</sup> The standard for proof would be to the satisfaction of the court, and not beyond a reasonable doubt.<sup>31</sup>

The A.B.A. Standards on Sentencing follows a similar approach. When it adopted the informal sentencing model and rejected the trial-type analogy, it observed:

"[T]he Advisory Committee fails to see why the method of the criminal law as employed at trial must be carried over into the sentencing phase, or if it must, why the procedure for sentencing repeat or dangerous offenders is the only case where this must be so. No constitutional questions are raised in the normal sentencing case where the trial judge considers the contents of a presentence report without providing the defendant with direct confrontation of all who contributed background information. See Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241 (1949). And factual disputes which arise in the imposition of a normal term are resolved daily by the judge without the creation of any such difficulty.

<sup>27</sup> See the testimony of then Professor Henry Ruth of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, now Special Prosecutor, when he testified before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures: Justice Douglas' opinion for the Court in Specht used the word "confrontation" but it "did not equate 'confrontation' the same in the sentence hearing with confrontation at a trial." Organized Crime Control, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969) at 345 (hereinafter cited Senate Hearings).

In so far as [the Code] calls for a court determination rather than a jury verdict on the question of . . . [the grounds for the extended term], the draft departs from the most usual procedure under the present habitual offender laws. Some states now provide, however, for determination of the issue by the court. And since the issue bears entirely on the nature of the sentence, rather than on guilt or innocence, we see no reason why a jury trial should be accorded in a system where questions of sentence otherwise are for determination by the court.

At least eight states, moreover, now follow the practice of having the court rather than the jury determine the facts on which an extended term is predicated. See Yates v. State, 245 Ala. 560, 17 So.2d 777 (1944); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-4504 (1973); La. Rev. Stat. Ann. §15-529.1(1) (1956); Minn. Stat. Ann. §609.16 (1964); Mo. Rev. Stat. §556.280(2) (1959); Neb. Rev. Stat. §29-2221(2) (1972); Nev. Rev. Stat. §207.010(4) (1971); Ore. Rev. Stat. §§161.725, 161.735 (1973).

"If it can be assumed that there is no constitutional difficulty with the basic structure of a sentencing procedure which uses the presentence report and which proceeds less formally than does the hearing on the question of guilt, the issue can be considerably narrow. Presently the judge is left completely at large in making the sentencing decision, although he is expected to act in a manner that is responsive to a factual picture of the defendant which is conveyed to him by this less formal procedure. The issue thus comes down to whether providing standards by way of findings to precede the imposition of a particularly serious sentence necessarily invokes a change in the required procedure. The Advisory Committee would agree with the conclusion of the revisers of the Minnesota laws that the method of the criminal trial need not be invoked for that reason. See Minn. Stat. Ann. §609.155 (1964) (Comments, at 148-49). It would indeed be ironic if procedural due process required the absence of legislative guidance in order for the sentencing proceeding to be informal. The Advisory Committee is confident that such a result need not follow." (Emphasis in original).<sup>32</sup>

Presently, state courts set extended sentences without apparent difficulty under statutes similar to Title X. See, e.g., State v. Losicau, 184 Neb. 178, 166 N.W.2d 406 (1969); State v. Piri, 295 Minn. 247, 204 N.W.2d 120 (1973). There seems to be no apparent reason why the federal system could not profit by their example.

The United States below offered two types of information to justify its belief that the defendants were dangerous special offenders: (a) general information linking the defendants to organized crime,<sup>33</sup> and (b) evidence of other criminal conduct. The court below excluded both as a matter of law as impermissible types of evidence. This judgment was erroneous and ought now be reversed by this court. Questions of accuracy should, of course, be left for the resolution of the court. The information may be disbelieved by the court, but it is not per se inadmissible.

III. Consistent with due process, the standard of "dangerous" under 18 U.S.C. § 3575(f) gives adequate guidance to a court to impose a special offender sentence.

18 U.S.C. § 3575(f) provides: A defendant is dangerous for the purposes of this section if a period of confinement longer than that provided for such felony is required for the protection of the public from further criminal conduct.

The approach that must be taken in construing a statute charged with vagueness was set forth by Chief Justice Earl Warren for the Court in United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 618 (1954): "[I]f the general class . . . to which the statute is directed is plainly within its terms, the statute will not be struck down as vague, even though marginal cases could be put where doubts might arise . . . And if this general class . . . can be made constitutionally definite by a reasonable construction of the statute, this Court is under a duty to give the statute that construction."

Obviously, too, as Chief Justice John Marshall observed in United States v. Fisher, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 358, 386 (1804): "It is undoubtedly a well established principle in the exposition of statutes, that every part is to be considered and the intention of the legislature [is] to be extracted from the whole."

How Congress intended subsection (f) to be read becomes clear from an examination of the provision's legislative history in the context of the statute as a whole. Congress had before it the record of experience in the states with enhanced terms for habitual offenders. Two defects stood out in an analysis of <sup>33</sup> On this aspect of the issue, the court's decision squarely conflicts with the mature judgment of the 2nd Circuit. In United States v. Schipani, 435 F.2d 26, 27 (2nd Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 983 (1971), the Court of Appeals sustained a sentence "far longer than would be expected in a routine tax case" on the trial judge's conclusion that the defendant was "a professional criminal," a conclusion reached on hearsay information obtained in the course of illegal wiretaps. The defendant was a caporegime in the then Magliocco family of the La Cosa Nostra. Organized Crime and Illicit Traffic in Narcotics, Hearings before the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, Committee on Government Operations, United States Senate, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 308 (1963). Compare an earlier District Court opinion from the 2nd Circuit, United States v. Rao, 296 F. Supp. 1145 (S.D. N.Y. 1969).

Nothing in this analysis, moreover, is undermined by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Mullaney v. Wilbur, No. 74-13, decided June 9, 1975. There, the court found inconsistent with due process Maine's placing on a defendant the burden of persuasion to a preponderance of showing heat of passion to reduce the crime of murder to manslaughter. The Court observed: "There is no incompatibility between our decision today and the tradition discretion afforded sentencing bodies." Slip Opinion, p. 13, n. 23.

that experience: (1) the statutes carried mandatory sentences, and (2) no requirement of "dangerous" was set forth.<sup>34</sup> Congress, of course, made Title X discretionary,<sup>35</sup> and it provided that special offenders had to be "dangerous" before an extended term could be imposed.<sup>36</sup>

Ordinarily, however, Congress recognized that the same facts which established that a person was a "special offender" would also establish that he was "dangerous."<sup>37</sup> As Senator McClellan observed in his Notre Dame Lawyer article at 158, "[This] is simply a recognition of the possibility that the same facts the establishment of which shows the defendant to fall within one or more of the definitions of 'special offender' may in a given case, also demonstrate that the defendant is 'dangerous.'"

As it deals with each type of special offender, moreover, the legislative history repeatedly elicits this conclusion. Habitual offenders were thought to be future threats, absent extenuating circumstances, because they had committed multiple crimes in the past.<sup>38</sup> Professional offenders were thought to be future threats, absent extenuating circumstances, since skill once acquired makes the possibility of "subsequent us . . . likely."<sup>39</sup> Finally, the organized crime offender was identified to have a life criminal career roughly twice that of the ordinary offender.<sup>40</sup> Like the habitual offender, his past was read to judge his future.<sup>41</sup>

It seems evident then that the concept "dangerous" in Title X had primarily a negative meaning. Congress has determined that special offenders, as a class, merit extended terms, but it has allowed courts on a case by case basis not to impose them, where there is in the individual case of danger of future criminal conduct. In the ordinary situation, therefore, establishing that a defendant is a "special offender" will also establish that he is "dangerous." But this conclusion does not automatically follow and invoke a mandatory penalty, as under some state recidivist statutes. As Senator McClellan noted: "A defendant's most recent felony, for example, may not have been discovered or prosecuted until several years after its commission, and he may have completely reformed in the meantime, or there may be other extenuating circumstances."<sup>42</sup> "Dangerous," then, must be viewed as a safety valve, protecting certain defendants

<sup>42</sup> McClellan at 150. Other illustrations come easily to mind. Assume that a "torch," a professional arsonist, is used in a complicated, multi-party bankruptcy-insurance fraud scheme to incinerate a building. Assume further that the evidence shows that his criminal record qualifies him as a recidivist, that the fire gave evidence of his "special skill and expertise," and that the fire could be fairly described as the work of an "executor of violence." Each of the special offender categories of Title X would thus be satisfied. Under 18 U.S.C. §1952, the maximum penalty normally would be five years, but here surely an extended term up to ten years would be appropriate. Assume further, however, that the "torch" accidentally found himself the victim of his own handiwork, and he is now permanently confined to a wheelchair. He would be a special offender, but is now no longer capable of plying his trade, and thus would not be dangerous.

So viewed, the usual procedure in a Title X proceeding can be quickly sketched. Where the United States believes a defendant to be a dangerous special offender, an appropriate notice is filed. Supplementary pleadings nailing down the issues may be necessary; they are not required. The United States introduces information and evidence indicating the defendant is a special offender, from which it normally follows that he is dangerous. It must also make available under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) any favorable evidence it possesses bearing on the sentence. The defendant may then dispute the accuracy of the United States' position or introduce information or evidence of his own; he clearly has the burden of challenging the information or evidence and of coming forward with extenuating circumstances, when they exist. Cf. Model Penal Code §1.12 (4)(a) (Official Draft, 1962) (burden of proving fact on the party in whose interest it is to show it). The ultimate burden of persuasion, of course, rests on the United States, 18 U.S.C. §3575(b) to convince the court of the essential facts and the appropriateness of the imposition of the extended term. Appellate review would then follow at either the instance of the United States or of the defendant.

from unjust and unnecessary long-term imprisonment.<sup>43</sup> As such, it is definite enough to give guidance.<sup>44</sup>

The court below, however, misread Title X, and it then held §3575(f) unconstitutionally vague. The court seemed to feel that "dangerousness" had to be shown by some sort of statistical evidence independent from the showing of "special offender." As noted above, this is a serious misreading of the legislative history<sup>45</sup> and language of the statute. The court then found the concept, as so defined, vague, citing Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939).

It is not clear that Lanzetta sets the benchmark for the definitions here involved. Lanzetta dealt with a criminal statute addressed to the ordinary citizen. Here, however, we deal with a statute addressed to counsel and court, setting standards for sentencing. As Senator McClellan observed: "The definitions used in Title X as a group are unusually specific and clear for sentencing standards. It must be recalled that the definitions in Title X are not substantive criminal prohibitions, defining crimes, and do not establish the question of guilt or innocence. They are legislatively specified criteria for sentencing only. They are not only a great improvement over a situation where sentencing is, at the present, guided by no standards at all—they conform to similar standards developed by professional bodies which have studied the problem of special sentencing most thoroughly, and seem to provide excellent guidance and control over the discretion of a sentencing court."<sup>46</sup>

These criteria are governed instead by Minnesota v. Probate Court, 309 U.S. 270 (1940). There the Supreme Court faced not dissimilar definitions as part of a "psychopathic law." The statute focused on past conduct to judge future behavior. The Court observed: "These underlying conditions, calling for evidence of past conduct pointing to probable consequences, are as susceptible of proof as many of the criteria constantly applied in prosecutions for crime."<sup>47</sup>

Consequently, the Court sustained the statute against a vagueness objection.

Even if Lanzetta should be held to control, it is not clear that the statute would fall. Lanzetta dealt with the vagueness of the term "gang." The Court found the term vague because it "condemn[ed] no act or omission." 306 U.S. at 458. Here, in contrast, the whole statute is aimed at conduct, which constitutes circumstances of aggravation of felonious criminal behavior. As the Senate Report noted: "The conduct making the defendant a 'professional' or organized crime' offender under Title X is closely related to the felony for which he is to be sentenced. Title X thus treats such conduct not as separate offenses but as a circumstance of aggravation in the commission of the felony for which the defendant is to be sentenced. Because of this relationship, the 'special offender' conduct may be necessarily or incidentally proven in the course of the full and formal trial on the merits of the felony. Since rules of evidence permit or require the Government, for example, to prove the history and circumstances of a conspiracy with which a defendant is charged, or the existence of which is a predicate for admissibility of evidence, the trial of a conspirator whose conduct makes him a 'special offender' under Title X often will establish that

he is such a 'special offender.' In other cases, the formal trial on the merit may establish some but not all of the required elements, and the less formal sentencing proceeding will be necessary to embellish the circumstances of the crime already established, adding information about the defendant, his crime, and the context in which it was committed. Sentencing judges traditionally have relied both upon circumstances proven in the trial and upon information acquired during the sentencing process. . . . The starting point for measuring the appropriateness of a particular sentence and the sentencing procedure used for its imposition, therefore is not confined to the bare essential elements of the offense, but includes all facts established through the full procedure of the trial on the merits."<sup>48</sup>

Title X, therefore, meets even the higher standards of Lanzetta.<sup>49</sup>

IV. Consistent with due process and double jeopardy, the United States may appeal the failure of a court to impose a dangerous special offender sentence under 18 U.S.C. §3576.

a. 18 U.S.C. §3576 authorizes a government appeal of a failure to impose a dangerous special offender sentence.

18 U.S.C. §3576, in relevant part, reads: With respect to the imposition, correction or reduction of a sentence after proceedings under section 3575 of this chapter, review of the sentence on the record of the sentencing court may be taken by . . . the United States to a Court of Appeals.

The plain language of the statute authorized this appeal. It says "after" a proceeding under §3575. It does not say the sentence must have been "imposed" pursuant to §3575. If there were any doubt of the proper construction of the statute, the legislative history surely dispels it.<sup>50</sup> The defendants have, of course, conceded as much. See United States v. Duardi, No. 74-1904 (8th Cir., April 1, 1975).

b. Such an appeal is consistent with due process.

A due process objection to the right of the United States to appeal a sentence might be colorably grounded in North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969). There, the Supreme Court set down careful standards for the imposition of higher sentences following reconviction after appellate reversal. The standards were designed to protect a defendant's right to appeal his won case from "vindictiveness" by the trial judge. 395 U.S. at 725-26.

Here, however, we do not deal with retrial, but appeal, where there is no danger of such vindictiveness. In addition, §3575 has been carefully drafted to insure that the United States must exercise its election to appeal prior to defendant's election, and the appellate court is given express power to dismiss an appeal on a showing of abuse of the right to appeal, a routine policy of appeals in all cases. If the United States does not first appeal, and the defendant subsequently appeals, the sentence cannot be made "more severe." Congressman Poff explained the operation of Title X in these terms:

"The review provisions have been carefully framed to meet constitutional requirements. Since it seems clear from the Supreme Court's decision in North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969), that due process of law requires that a defendant must be protected from the possibility that an increased sentence will be imposed upon him by a vindictive court as punishment for his having exercised a right of appeal, Title X has been drafted so as to assure that any change in a sentence to the detriment of the defendant will result solely from the Government's action and not from his own. To this end, the Senate version of S.30 provided that a sentence may be increased only upon review taken by the Government; that the Government's right to take a sentence review must be exercised at least 5 days before the expiration of the defendant's right to seek sentence review or appeal of his conviction; that an increased sentence will be foreclosed if the Government withdraws its review; and that any review taken by the Government will be dismissed upon a showing of abuse of the right to take such a review.

<sup>49</sup> The Supreme Court, of course, has not yet passed on the validity of Title X. In Iannelli v. United States, 43 Law Week 4423 (March 25, 1975), however, the court did have the Organized Crime Control Act before it. Specifically, it considered the proper construction of 18 U.S.C. §1955 (Title VIII of the Act) in relation to the so-called Wharton rule, and it discussed the relationship between 18 U.S.C. §1955, the general law of conspiracy, and Title X. The Court termed the Act "a carefully crafted piece of legislation." 43 Law Week at 4429. The lower court's treatment of the law is hardly consistent with the observation about the Act as a whole.

<sup>50</sup> Senate Report at 166 explicitly states: "The Government may obtain review of the failure to impose any special sentence or the sentence imposed." Title X was also so read in the House by witnesses who testified and by the Committee counsel. House Hearings at 340 (witness), 579 (counsel). Indeed, the amendments made to Title X on this point by the House were designed to insure that review would be comprehensive and could not be circumvented. See Remarks of Congressman Poff, 116 Cong. Rec. 35290-98 (October 7, 1970).

"The Judiciary Committee added clarifying language to assure that the taking of a review of the sentence by the Government will be deemed the taking of a review of the sentence and an appeal of the conviction by the defendant. The Senate version was less than clear on this point. Thus, the taking of a sentence review by the United States brings about the same result that would follow if the defendant had exercised his right to take both a review of the sentence and an appeal of the conviction. The danger of retaliation which led the Court to the result obtained in North Carolina against Pearce, supra, is entirely absent even from the question in the Judiciary Committee version of Title X.

"Subject only to the foregoing limitations upon increased sentences, the appellate review provisions permit the court of appeals after considering the record in the court below, including the entire presentence report on the defendant, information submitted during the trial and at the sentencing hearing, and the court's findings and reasons for the sentence imposed—to affirm the sentence, impose or direct the imposition of any sentence which the sentencing court could originally have imposed, or remand for further sentencing." (Emphasis added.)<sup>51</sup>

Nothing in the Supreme Court's subsequent teaching on due process and sentencing indicates that this analysis is faulty. Cf. Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104 (1972) (higher sentence after "appeal" from lower trial court to higher court for de novo trial upheld); Chaffin v. Stynchcombe, 412 U.S. 17 (1973) (higher sentence after retrial imposed by jury not shown to be vindictive). In short, the ". . . lesson that emerges from Pearce, Colten and Chaffin is that the Due Process clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment upon retrial after appeal, but only those that pose a realistic likelihood of 'vindictiveness.'" Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 27 (1974). For a due process claim here to take hold, it would have to be established that appellate courts would be vindictive after the prosecutor, not the defendant, appealed. There is certainly no reasonable claim to be made that appellate courts have shown themselves to be vindictive. Moreover, the appeal is by the prosecutor, not the defendant, and when the case is reversed and possibly remanded for resentencing, it will be to a court that has made an error in favor of the defendant, reversed at the behest of the government. The Pearce rationale of vindictiveness could properly apply only when a judge who resents, was reversed for making an error against the defendant after an appeal brought by the defendant.

c. Such an appeal is consistent with double jeopardy.

During the processing of Title X, much consideration was given to the double jeopardy implications of the recommendation of the President's Crime Commission that: "There must be some kind of supervision over those trial judges who, because of corruption, political considerations, or lack of knowledge, tend to mete out light sentences in cases involving organized crime management personnel. Consideration should therefore be given to allowing the prosecution the right of appeal regarding sentences of persons in management positions in organized crime activity or groups. Constitutional requirements for such an appellate procedure must first be carefully explored."<sup>52</sup>

Ultimately, the contours of the existing precedents were seen not to constitute a constitutional roadblock to government review.<sup>53</sup>

Whatever concern might have legitimately existed in 1969 and 1970, however, has now been dispelled by recent developments in February and March of this year in the Supreme Court's teaching in the double jeopardy field. In United States v. Wilson, 43 Law Week 4301 (1975), the Court undertook a major effort at analyzing the right of the government to appeal in criminal cases. It began with this observation: "The statutory restrictions on Government appeals long made it unnecessary for this Court to consider the constitutional limitations on the appeal rights of the prosecution except in unusual circumstances." 43 Law Week at 4303.

The Court then considered the history and development of the constitutional principle against double jeopardy. It concluded: ". . . Although review of any ruling of law discharging a defendant obviously enhances the likelihood of conviction and subjects him to continuing expense and anxiety, a defendant has no legitimate claim to benefit from an error of law when that error could be corrected without subjecting him to a second trial before a second trier of fact." Id. at 4305.

It held: "* * * We therefore conclude that when a judge rules in favor of the defendant after a verdict of guilty has been entered by the trier of fact, the Government may appeal from that ruling without running afoul of the Double Jeopardy Clause." Id. at 4307.

Wilson was quickly followed by United States v. Jenkins, 43 Law Week 4309 (1975), which held that when the judge was the "trier of fact" in a bench trial, double jeopardy also attached to his not guilty verdict. Finally, the Court in March decided Serfass v. United States, 43 Law Week 4315 (1975), where it held that a pre-trial ruling by a court before the defendant had been put to trial before the trier of fact did not involve jeopardy and could be appealed.

The implications of these cases for this appeal seem beyond question. The defendants here have been put on trial before the trier of fact and have been found guilty. No judgment of this Court will cause them to be tried again. What is at issue here is not a question of guilt or innocence, but of sentencing. A judgment favorable to the United States here will require that the defendants be resentenced, not retried. No question of double jeopardy, therefore, is at issue. "* * * The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment is written in terms of potential or risk of trial and conviction, not punishment." Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323 329 (1970). Consequently, there is no statutory or constitutional bar to this appeal.<sup>54</sup>

CONCLUSION

Traditionally, four purposes have been assigned to the criminal justice system: retribution, deterrence, incapacitation and rehabilitation.<sup>55</sup> Many today no longer see retribution as the objective of the law. See, e.g., Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 248 (1949). Some kinds of offenders, moreover, seem to be beyond deterrence.<sup>56</sup> Recent studies offer little hope that we have learned how to rehabilitate; rehabilitation remains, in short, an unrealized hope.<sup>57</sup> For these offenders, incapacitation seems the only meaningful alternative goal.

<sup>54</sup> One other item should be raised in this brief in order that it may be disposed of here with guidance given to prosecutors, defense counsel and trial courts in future dangerous special offender hearings. The legislative history of Title X suggests that a trial court should "ordinarily" obtain a study of a defendant in these types of hearings under 18 U.S.C. §4208(b). The trial court in this appeal followed that suggestion. Erroneously, however, an appeal was taken on the question of guilt or innocence at that point. See United States v. Bishop, 492 F.2d 1361 (8th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 942 (1975). The general legitimacy of an appeal at this point after an examination under 18 U.S.C. §4208(b) was established in Corey v. United States, 375 U.S. 169 (1963). It apparently went unnoticed by counsel and the court that such an appeal may not be taken under 18 U.S.C. §3575(g), when a §4208(b) order is made in connection with a dangerous special offender hearing. The legislative history is quite explicit on this point. Senate Report at 166, "The result reached under Corey v. United States . . . under 18 U.S.C. §4208(b) would not obtain here. The provision envisions that review of both sentence and conviction will be heard together." (Emphasis added). It may well be appropriate to draw to the attention of the bar and bench this mistake, so that in the future multiple appeals are not taken at all conceivable points in these kinds of proceedings. Since, strictly speaking, the opinion of the prior panel upholding the conviction was made without jurisdiction, it may also be well if this panel explicitly reaffirms it.

. . . the most striking fact about offenders who have been convicted of the common serious crimes of violence and theft is how often how many of them continue committing crimes. Arrest, court, and prison records furnish insistent testimony to the fact that these repeated offenders constitute the hard core of the crime problem. Id. at 45.

This appeal is all about the viability and constitutionality of the most comprehensive attempt yet made to move in that direction. This attempt, moreover, has important implications for general penal policy. Most observers agree that American sentences are too long in too many cases.<sup>58</sup> We need to have a general rethinking of our penal structure. Indeed, there are many who couple their policy support of Title X-type proceedings only if it can be accompanied by a general reduction of sentences for the ordinary offender.<sup>59</sup> Nevertheless, that general reduction will not come about until the viability and constitutionality of the extended term concept is assured.<sup>60</sup> There is a certain irony, too, in the blunt fact that there is a constitutional alternative to Title X: high minimum mandatory sentences.<sup>61</sup> Even though they might be unjust in individual cases, they are generally thought to be beyond serious question constitutionally.<sup>62</sup> This appeal, therefore, is no ordinary review of the erroneous sentences imposed on a few bad men by a trial judge who merely misread a statute. In a sense, it represents the last, best hope in our nation's struggle to establish a rational penal structure for our system of criminal justice.

It is, therefore, respectfully urged that the sentence of the defendants be set aside and that the record in this appeal be remanded to the trial court with directions to reinstate the United States' pleading of November 28, 1972, to hold a dangerous special offender hearing, admitting the information and evidence excluded and following this brief's construction of the concept of dangerousness.

Respectfully submitted,

AMERICANS FOR EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT,
G. Robert Blakey, Esq.,

Summary

¶1 The primary goals of a sentence in an organized crime prosecution should be deterrence and incapacitation, not rehabilitation. Traditionally, the prosecutor's task was thought to stop at the conviction. This view is misguided; the prosecutor should seek, through all lawful means, to secure an appropriate sentence in all criminal prosecutions, but particularly in organized crime cases. The presentence report usually provides the sentencing judge with the information essential to his decision in imposing sentence within the statutory range. Few statutory or constitutional requirements limit its scope. Individualized sentencing requires that the judge's scope of inquiry not be limited. The prosecutor, therefore, ought to provide the probation department with all relevant information in organized crime cases. Further, he should actively draw the court's attention to the report's significance, recommending, in the public interest, appropriate sentences in all organized crime prosecutions. His goal should be to obtain, in appropriate cases, the maximum authorized jail time and fine. Statutory and constitutional limits remain on the prosecutor's right to appeal a sentence, but recent decisions have begun to broaden this right; it should be vigorously pursued. When possible, the prosecutor should use recidivist and special dangerous offender provisions to secure extended terms.

I. Introduction

A. The Special Problem

¶2 The sentencing process can be a crucial phase in the prosecution of organized crime. It is here that the risks of involvement in organized crime can be made clear to present and prospective members and associates. Similarly, sentencing can be a key tool for imposing economic burdens on those involved in organized crime.

¶3 Organized crime functions, on the conscious level, as a business. The motives of those engaged in its activities are "rational." Thus, organized crime participants should be influenced by altering the risks of punishment and the rewards of criminal endeavor. At the same time, a sentencing policy designed to render a criminal useless, and possibly burdensome to his associates for substantial periods of time, will strike at the special strength of organized crime. It can force a new cost-benefit analysis; profits will be realized only at a higher price. Membership in an organization may appear less attractive, and the rewards for joining may have to be commensurately greater. The long-term loss of a convicted member's services may not wholly cripple the activities of the organization, but it should render it somewhat less profitable.<sup>1</sup>

¶4 The special character of organized crime, in short, demands a sentencing policy designed to render its activities more difficult to conduct,<sup>2</sup> and if no other goal is served, the commission of additional crime may be made more difficult through long-term imprisonment.

B. The Traditional Sentencing Pattern: Leniency

¶5 Ironically, studies have shown that stern sentences for racketeers are the exception, not the rule. A Department of

1 (continued)

A presentence investigation of an "unimportant" numbers runner, bookie or gambling operator may reveal him as a stable individual; if it also reveals him as a salaried employee of a criminal organization, he should be incarcerated for as long a time as possible under the law. Maximum imprisonment inflicts heavy costs on the syndicate for his family's support and other "fringe benefits," in addition to legal fees and bail which the organization must provide to maintain its operations. His ties to the organization and his financial needs make it improbable that he will want or be allowed to seek other employment until he himself is too expensive a risk. Despite his otherwise apparent eligibility for a fine, suspended sentence, or probation, he must be regarded as a capillary feeding the heart of organized crime and be committed for the purpose of increasing the operation costs of the business of crime and racketeering. Rector, "Sentencing the Racketeer," 8 Crime and Delinquency 386, ~389 (1962).

<sup>2</sup>There is legal support for this policy. In State v. Ivan, 33 N.J. 197, 202-03, 162 A.2d 851, 853-54 (1960), the New Jersey Supreme Court observed:

. . . [I]f the crime is a calculated one and part of a widespread criminal skein, the needs of society may dictate that the punishment more nearly fit the offense than the offender. There the sentencing judge may conclude he should give priority to punishment as a deterrence to others and as an aid to law enforcement. . . [W]hen the offense serves the interests of a widespread conspiracy, it would be a mistake to think of the defendant as an isolated figure. He is part and parcel of an enterprise. . . . [I]f the crime is part of a larger operation, it merits stern treatment.

Justice study of the years 1960-1969 revealed, for example, that two-thirds of the Cosa Nostra members indicted by the Department faced maximum jail terms of only five years or less. Only 23% of the convicted members subject to indeterminate sentences received the maximum; most of the sentences ranged from 40% to 50% of the maximum.<sup>3</sup>

¶6 Such a pattern of leniency neither deters nor incapacitates. The conclusion seems inescapable: prosecutors should direct their efforts not only to securing evidence and conviction, but also to securing higher sentences.

C. The Prosecutor's Power: Beyond the Recidivist Statutes

¶7 Organized crime offenders may be vulnerable to an increased sentence under an "habitual criminal" or "persistent felony offender" statute. Such a statute will usually require that the maximum penalty be imposed on such an offender.<sup>4</sup> These special procedures, where appropriate, should be vigorously pursued. There is more, however, that the prosecutor can do in the typical situation where the task is to secure higher maximums within normal ranges.<sup>5</sup> Here, too, there is a need for vigorous action.

<sup>3</sup>See S. Rep. No. 91-617, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. 85 (1969). For a similar pattern, see Report for 1971 by New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Crime, its Causes, Control and Effect on Society, reprinted in Hearing before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, 92d Cong., 2d Sess. 4188-90 (1972). A study of 1,762 cases involving organized crime members in New York State courts showed that 44.7 per cent of all indictments against racketeers ended in dismissal; while only 11.5 per cent of indictments against all defendants resulted in dismissal. Organized crime figures were convicted in 193 cases; 46 per cent of those cases ended in suspended sentences or fines. The Committee computed the probabilities for an organized crime figure going to jail; the figures are sobering.

II. Function of the Presentence Report

A. Individualized Sentencing and the Presentence Report

¶8 The American judicial system has long recognized the importance of individualizing criminal sentences.<sup>6</sup> The task of matching the sentence to the individual requires the judge to balance a series of factors in the context of the facts of a

Whoever has been twice convicted of crime and sentenced and committed to prison in this or another state, or once in this and once or more in another state, for terms of not less than three years each, and does not show that he has been pardoned for either crime on the ground that he was innocent, shall, upon conviction of a felony, be considered an habitual criminal and be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for the maximum term provided by law as a penalty for the felony for which he is then to be sentenced.

The constitutionality of this statute was upheld in McDonald v. Massachusetts, 180 U.S. 311 (1901).

The belief no longer prevails that every offense in a like legal category calls for an identical punishment without regard to the past life and habits of a particular offender.

particular case. The judge must rely heavily on the presentence report in making his decision. Influencing the contents of that report is the first step towards influencing the judge's decision.

B. Functions of the Prosecutor and the Probation Office

¶9 The prosecutor must make available to the court any information he has that is material to the determination of the punishment. Information both favorable and unfavorable to the defendant should go to the court.<sup>7</sup> He must, of course, make sure that the sentence is not based on a mistake of fact or faulty information.<sup>8</sup> As a rule, the prosecutor conveys this information to the court through the probation office. It may, in fact, be a violation of due process for the prosecutor to convey information directly to the sentencing judge in absence of the defendant's counsel.<sup>9</sup> The probation department is, therefore, a necessary intermediary. The probation department should seek to obtain all the relevant information the prosecutor possesses; the prosecutor has a duty to respond.<sup>10</sup>

¶10 The probation department summarizes the information it has collected in a presentence report. This report is the sentencing

In fact, a failure to so inquire or refusal to respond accurately would be a breach of duty (emphasis added).

judge's primary guide.

C. The Right of Allocution

¶11 The presentence report, of course, is not the judge's only source of information. All jurisdictions recognize the defendant's right to make a statement before sentencing--the right of allocution. New Jersey Court Rule 3.21-4(b), for example, provides:

Before imposing sentence the court shall address the defendant personally and ask him if he wishes to make a statement in his own behalf and to present any information in mitigation of punishment. . . .

N.Y. Crim. Pro. Law §380.50 (1971) also permits both the defendant and his counsel an opportunity to speak before sentence is set. The judge must ask the defendant whether he wishes to make a statement.

¶12 The general acceptance of the right of allocution, however, does not qualify the central importance of the presentence report. It remains the sentencing judge's primary guide, and its scope should then be a matter of great concern to the prosecutor.

¶13 Section 380.50 also provides the prosecutor with a right to speak before sentencing.

The statute reads: "At the time of pronouncing sentence, the court must accord the prosecutor an opportunity to make a statement with respect to any matter relevant to the question of sentence." New Jersey Court Rule 3.21-4(b), however, contains no such provision. In all cases the prosecutor ought to seek to be heard in the public interest.

III. Scope of the Presentence Report

A. General Admissibility of Information

¶14 The pertinent statutes offer only general guidance, but they do indicate the wide range of information which may be included in a presentence report. Rule 32(c)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, for example, states:

The report of the presentence investigation shall contain any prior criminal record of the defendant and such information about his characteristics, his financial condition and the circumstances effecting his behavior as may be helpful in imposing sentence or in granting probation or in the correctional treatment of the defendant, and such other information as may be required by the court.

The analogous New York statute, N.Y. Crim. Pro. Law §390.30(1) (1971), provides that the presentence investigation should consist of:

the gathering of information with respect to the circumstances attending the commission of the offense, the defendant's history of delinquency or criminality, and the defendant's social history, employment history, family situation, economic stature, education and personal habits.

This section of the statute also allows the agency conducting the investigation to include any other information it considers relevant to the question of the sentence. Other statutes in New Jersey and Massachusetts are less explicit on what information, beyond the criminal record of the defendant, may be included in the presentence report.<sup>11</sup> The general rule underlying these

<sup>11</sup>See N.J. Court Rule 3:21-2 and Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 279 §4A, ch. 276 §85, ch. 276 §100. The vagueness of the New Jersey requirements, however, should not lead the prosecutor in that state to underestimate the importance of the presentence report. In New Jersey, the sentencing judge is strictly confined to reliance on material contained in that report. Rule statutes is that there should be no formal limitations on the contents of presentence reports. This rule reflects the philosophy of the individualized sentence; a judge must have a wide scope of inquiry in determining the proper sentence.<sup>12</sup> The rules of evidence and the due process guarantees of the trial therefore, play no role here.

¶15 Accordingly, the sentencing judge may usually consider information not ordinarily admissible at trial, including hearsay evidence or evidence not related to the crime for which the

3:21-2 requires that, "The report shall be first examined by the sentencing judge so that matters not to be considered by him in sentencing may be excluded. The report, thus edited, shall contain all presentence material having any bearing on the sentence. . . ."

This principle was followed in State v. Leckis, 79 N.J. 479, 487, 192 A.2d 161, 165 (1963), which held that a judge should limit himself in passing sentence to what he learned in the course of the trial or from the presentence report. A New Jersey court has even held that a judge's personal knowledge of the defendant's history must be officially recorded in the presentence report in order for the judge to use it in sentencing. State v. Gattling, 95 N.J. Super. 103, 230 A.2d 157 (1967).

. . . modern concepts individualizing punishment have made it all the more necessary that a sentencing judge not be denied an opportunity to obtain pertinent information by a requirement of rigid adherence to restrictive rules of evidence properly applicable to the trial.

See also United States v. Baratta, 360 F. Supp. 512, 514-15 (S.D.N.Y. 1973):

No clamp should be placed upon the sentencing judge or barrier created to prevent him from pursuing. . . a reasonable inquiry into a defendant's behavioral pattern over a substantial period of time antedating the criminal act which brought him before the court--for whatever good or bad may come from it.

defendant was convicted.<sup>13</sup> 18 U.S.C. §3577, for example, reflects this principle in federal law:

No limitation shall be placed on the information concerning the background, character and conduct of a person convicted of an offense which a court of the United States may receive and consider for the purpose of imposing an appropriate sentence.

New York has a similar statute applicable to persistent felony offenders.<sup>14</sup>

¶16 The prosecutor should use this liberal policy when he seeks a long-term sentence for the convicted racketeer. Upper echelon organized crime figures often face prosecution for nonviolent crimes, such as tax evasion. The prosecutor may, however, use a history of violence associated with the offender to shape the presentence report to obtain a longer sentence. The general character of the sentencing process, therefore, seems well suited to the control of organized crime.

B. General Limits

¶17 There are, of course, certain general due process limits

<sup>13</sup> See Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 246 (1949); Williams v. Oklahoma, 358 U.S. 576, 586 (1959). There is generally no special burden of proof applicable in sentencing. Nevertheless, where the sentencing judge wishes to rely on trial perjury to enhance the sentence, the trend is to require that the fact of perjury be found beyond a reasonable doubt. See United States v. Hendrix, 505 F.2d 1233, 1236-37 (2d Cir. 1974) and authorities cited therein.

on what information can be used to determine a sentence.<sup>15</sup>

The Supreme Court wrote broad tests for reviewing the sentencing process in Hill v. United States:<sup>15a</sup> Is sentencing infected with fundamental defects resulting in a miscarriage of justice?

--Is it consistent with the rudimentary demands of fair procedure?

The application of this language usually turns on a determination of whether the report's factual assertions have an appropriate degree of reliability. Sentences founded upon "misinformation of a constitutional magnitude" or

"extensively and materially false" information cannot stand.<sup>16</sup>

This qualification tempers the general rule that presentence reports need not conform to the rules of evidence or limit themselves to established facts.<sup>17</sup>

¶18 The sentencing judge is free to decide the degree of required factual support on a case-by-case basis. The enormous

<sup>15</sup>Note first a special limitation defined in New Jersey. If the defendant may have the presentence report disclosed to him certain irrelevancies, confidential statements, and medical/diagnostic opinions should be excluded if they would harm the defendant's rehabilitation. Such matters may certainly be investigated, but may not be included in the report. See State v. Green, 62 N.J. 547, 303 A.2d 312 (1973).

variety of information available requires such an ad hoc method.<sup>18</sup> The Ninth Circuit has tried, however, to set certain minimum standards. In United States v. Weston,<sup>19</sup> the defendant received an additional fifteen year sentence on the basis of an unsworn statement of unverified reports, by an anonymous informer, alleging that the defendant engaged in additional and far more serious crimes; the court stated:

. . . In Townsend v. Burke, the Supreme Court made it clear that a sentence cannot be predicated on false information. We extend it but little in holding that a sentence cannot be predicated on information of so little value as that here involved. A rational penal system must have some concern for the probable accuracy of the informational inputs in the sentencing process.

The Ninth Circuit, however, recently limited Weston in Santorio v. United States,<sup>20</sup> holding that the defendant must make an affirmative showing of direct prejudice (i.e., led to higher sentence) for the court to disregard the hearsay portion of <sup>18</sup>A court may rely on "responsible unsworn or 'out of court' information relative to the circumstances of the crime and to the convicted person's life and characteristics." Williams v. Oklahoma, 358 U.S. 576, 584 (1959).

<sup>19</sup>448 F.2d 626, 634 (9th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 1061 (1972). The court stated:

Here the other criminal conduct charged was very serious, and the factual basis for believing the charge was almost nil. It rested upon only two things: the opinion of unidentified personnel in the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, and the unsworn statement of one agent that an informer had given him some information lending partial support to the charge. Id. at 633.

<sup>20</sup>462 F.2d 612 (9th Cir. 1973). The District Court of the Southern District of California, part of the Ninth Circuit, applied this qualification in Farrow v. United States, 373 F. Supp. 113, 119 (1974) (absent an affirmative showing of direct prejudice, there is no compulsion to disregard the hearsay portion of the presentence report).

the presentence report. The defendant, therefore, bears the double burden of showing both the falsity of the information and its prejudicial effect. An attempt to use the Weston holding in the First Circuit failed in United States v. Williams.<sup>21</sup> There, the court found that sworn testimony from three individuals concerning the defendant's role in a heroin distribution racket was adequate to justify a sentence in the upper range of the authorized maximum.

¶19 What happens when the defendant challenges the factual basis of a presentence report? The Supreme Court in Specht v. Patterson held:

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment . . . [does] not require a judge to have hearings and to give a convicted person an opportunity to participate in those hearings when he comes to determine the sentence to be imposed.<sup>22</sup>

Thus, as a general rule, the manner of rebutting hearsay assertions in a presentence report is determined by the informed discretion of the sentencing judge.<sup>23</sup> This policy of reliance upon the judge's discretion keeps the defendant from initiating an endless series of collateral disputes.<sup>24</sup>

C. The Admissibility of Information: Specific Issues

1. Hearsay

¶20 Judges often view hearsay evidence, inadmissible at trial, as sufficiently reliable for sentencing.<sup>25</sup> A court may rely, for example, on pertinent evidence from another case

The real question is whether the judge was entitled to credit the statements of unidentified undercover agents over defendant's denials and explanations. It is conceded that "material false assumptions as to any facts relevant to sentencing render the entire sentencing procedure invalid as a violation of due process (citations omitted). It does not follow, however, that an evidentiary hearing must be held whenever a defendant asserts the falsity of some statement in his presentence report. . . . Since sentences should not be based upon misinformation, a defendant should not be denied an opportunity to state his version of the relevant facts (citations omitted) and in some circumstances the probation office or prosecution should be requested to provide substantiation of challenged information submitted to the judge. . . . In appropriate instances the defendant ought to be allowed to present evidence in the form of affidavits, documents, or even oral statements by knowledgeable persons on matters the court deems material to its decision on the severity of sentence. But this court has generally left the decision as to the appropriateness in any particular case of these procedures largely to the discretion of the sentencing judge. . . .

Perhaps in a case where the defendant denied everything and there was a chance that an entire incident had been manufactured or that serious charges in the presentence report on which the judge sought to rely were completely false, we would require further corroboration of the report even though the sentencing judge thought it unnecessary. But this is not such a case. . . .

2. Polygraph Tests

¶21 A New Jersey court has held that expert testimony interpreting a polygraph test may be used in sentencing.<sup>27</sup> Note that the taking of the test was voluntary, and that the expert testimony could only be used to show facts not decided by the trial jury or material to its deliberations. Even this circumscribed use of the polygraph, however, reflects the liberal standards for the use of evidence in sentencing.

3. Prior Conviction Record

¶22 The prosecutor may also use a prior conviction record to argue for a long sentence for the racketeer. This practice does not create double jeopardy for the defendant since he is not being tried or punished again for the earlier offense.<sup>28</sup> Instead, the judge tries to determine if the record indicates a pattern of criminal behavior aggravating the latest offense.

4. Invalid Prior Convictions

which are constitutionally invalid.<sup>29</sup> This rule of Tucker may, however, be narrower than it appears. In Lipscomb v. Clark, the Fifth Circuit defined a test for the use of invalid prior convictions.<sup>30</sup> If on review, without consideration of the invalid conviction, the maximum sentence seems appropriate then it may be affirmed. If it does not, then a special evidentiary hearing must be held.<sup>31</sup> Tucker, in short, does not require automatic resentencing. The Eighth and Fourth Circuits have taken an alternate route. They require the defendant to invalidate the disputed prior conviction in the court from which it was originally obtained before using it to seek relief under Tucker.<sup>32</sup> Taking still another approach, the

<sup>29</sup>United States v. Tucker, 404 U.S. 443, 444 (1972). Note also that a conviction void under statutory or decisional law, or because of constitutional infirmity, cannot form the basis for the application of a recidivist statute. Burgett v. Texas, 389 U.S. 109, 114 (1967) ("... to permit a conviction obtained in violation of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), to be used against a person either to support guilt or enhance punishment for another offense. . . is to erode the principle of that case.")

<sup>32</sup>Brown v. United States, 483 F.2d 116, 118 (4th Cir. 1973) (if prior state convictions have been invalidated for want of counsel in habeas corpus proceedings begun initially in the convicting state court, then Tucker demands resentencing. If there is no such invalidation in that court the Tucker rule may not be invoked); Young v. United States, 485 F.2d 292, 294 (8th Cir. 1973) (Lipscomb rejected; petitioner invoking the Tucker rule must first invalidate the prior convictions in the jurisdictions where they were obtained).

Ninth Circuit has held that "the mere fact that an invalid conviction has been obtained does not immunize the facts underlying the conviction from consideration by the sentencing judge."<sup>33</sup>

5. Evidence Derived from Arrests not Leading to Convictions

¶24 The law is unclear as to the use of evidence obtained from prior arrests not leading to conviction. The dispute turns on whether the facts underlying the arrest may be considered by the sentencing judge. The Second Circuit, in United States v. Malcolm, stated the general rule:

A sentencing judge is not so narrowly restricted in imposing sentence that he cannot predicate sentence on habitual misconduct, whether or not it resulted in conviction.<sup>34</sup>

Certain jurisdictions have statutes, however, which limit the judge's power to consider evidence derived from prior acquittals. Examples of such statutes are Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 276 §85 and Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 279 §4A, which require that the presentence report "shall not contain as part thereof any information of prior criminal prosecutions, if any, of the defendant wherein the defendant was found not guilty by the court or jury in said prior criminal prosecution."

¶25 The Supreme Court of New Jersey noted that a prior arrest could be relevant in certain circumstances.<sup>35</sup> The sentencing judge may not infer guilt from the mere fact of arrest, but the fact of arrest may lead the court to other admissible facts. The court may, for example, consider factual material which the defendant did not contest and which bears on the question of sentence.<sup>36</sup> The judge may also consider that the earlier arrest failed to deter the defendant from committing the current offense.

¶26 The courts have also held that evidence from pending indictments and from charges dismissed without adjudication may be considered by the sentencing judge.<sup>37</sup> A court may even admit, for sentencing purposes, evidence of crimes for which the defendant has neither been charged nor indicted,<sup>38</sup> and, at least in the Second Circuit, evidence of crimes of which the defendant has been acquitted.<sup>39</sup>

Green, 62 N.J. 547, 571, 303 A.2d 312, 325 (1973) (i.e., the sentencing judge may find it significant that a defendant who experienced an unwarranted arrest was not deterred by that fact from committing a crime thereafter). Here the Supreme Court of New Jersey found that the challenged items in the arrest report did not influence the sentencing court to enlarge the penalties.

6. Evidence Excluded from Trial because of Fourth Amendment Violations

¶26A In United States v. Verdugo,<sup>40</sup> the Ninth Circuit held that it is not proper to use evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment to determine the sentence. The court rested its holding on the rationale that the "use of illegally seized evidence at sentencing would provide a substantial incentive for unconstitutional searches and seizures."<sup>41</sup> Verdugo,

We do not desire to transform the sentencing process into a second trial, and we believe that other criminal conduct may properly be considered, even though the defendant was never charged with it or convicted of it.

Acquittal does not have the effect of conclusively establishing the untruth of all evidence introduced against the defendant. For all that appears in the record of the present case, the jury may have believed all such evidence to be true, but have found that some essential element of the charge was not proved. In fact the kind of evidence here objected to may often be more reliable than the hearsay evidence to which the sentencing judge is clearly permitted to turn, since unlike hearsay, the evidence involved here was given under oath and was subject to cross-examination and the judge had the opportunity for personal observation of the witnesses.

however, has not resulted in the blanket exclusion of such evidence. In United States v. Schipani,<sup>42</sup> the Second Circuit allowed the use in sentencing of evidence derived from illegal wiretaps. The court observed:

The information obtained by the wiretaps was highly relevant to the character of the sentence to be imposed. . . .

We believe that applying the exclusionary rule for a second time at sentencing after having applied it once at the trial itself would not add in any significant way to the deterrent effect of the rule. It is quite unlikely that law enforcement officials conduct illegal electronic auditing to build up an inventory for sentencing purposes, although the evidence would be inadmissible on the issue of guilt. . . .

Where illegally seized evidence is reliable and it is clear, as here, that it was not gathered for the express purpose of improperly influencing the sentencing judge, there is no error in using it in connection with fixing sentence.<sup>43</sup>

7. Reputation

¶27 A New York District Court, in United States v. Rao,<sup>44</sup> ruled that "the defendant's alleged underworld associates and his alleged status in the Mafia or Cosa Nostra cannot and do not constitute a predicate or criterion for punishment."<sup>45</sup> This is no longer good law. The Second Circuit decision in Schipani undermined this ruling. There, the court affirmed

a District Court judge's decision to consider in sentencing the defendant's reputation as a racketeer. The First Circuit followed a similar course of action in United States v. Strauss.<sup>46</sup>

In Strauss, the sentencing judge had before him sworn Senate testimony alleging that the defendants were members of a criminal syndicate. Accordingly, he gave them seven years instead of five, out of a possible ten.

¶28 In addition, the New Jersey Supreme Court, in State v. Leverette,<sup>47</sup> affirmed a long-term sentence for a defendant whose presentence report showed no prior criminal record and that he was a responsible husband and father. In so doing, the court upheld the sentencing judge's reliance in making his decision on the defendant's identity as a racketeer.<sup>48</sup>

Although the judge failed to articulate why he thought this evidence warranted an additional two years, we note that membership in a criminal syndicate is clearly relevant to questions of corrigibility and likelihood of reformation in a short period of time. Id. at 990.

The Seventh Circuit recently refused to follow Rao and approved the use of "organized crime connections in imposing a sentence." United States v. Cordi, 17 Crim. L. Rptr. 2363 (7th Cir. July 10, 1975).

The sentencing judge, based on the trial record, characterized the defendant as the key figure in a substantial gambling operation. The sentence was bottomed on the foregoing evaluation of the defendant's involvement and warrants the sentence imposed.

that:

[A] defendant's connection with organized crime is a most important factor to consider, along with all the other circumstances, in determining the severity of punishment to be meted out.<sup>50</sup>

The prosecutor's ability to use what he knows about the racketeer, therefore, appears to be growing.<sup>51</sup>

8. Defendant's Right to View and Challenge the Presentence Report

§28A New Jersey, Massachusetts, and the federal system have statutes

By and large the defendants who are caught are not vicious and do not menace society in other respects, but they are the hired help of the syndicate without which it could not operate. The difficulty has been that some judges cannot see beyond the individual they are sentencing. If such a judge imposes nothing more painful than a fine, his view is almost certain to become the rule of the county in which he sits. This is so because defendants will wait for that judge, if they can, and plead guilty before him. Moreover, a soft judge can make a sensible one seem harsh and severe, and hence, unhappily, judges tend to abide by the performance of the most unrealistic among them. 49 N.J. at 254-55, 229 A.2d at 640.

The court then concluded:

Nor is there substance to the claim that the individual is denied equality when the court deals specially with the special evils of syndicated crime. . . . Id. at 260, 229 A.2d at 643.

requiring disclosure of the presentence report.<sup>52</sup> The New York statute leaves disclosure to the judge's discretion.<sup>53</sup> The New York courts have tended, however, to encourage disclosure as the rule of practice.<sup>54</sup> The defendant also has different kinds of statutory protection in New York. He may file a presentence memorandum covering his entire life history.<sup>55</sup> The court, in its discretion, may hold a presentence conference to resolve any discrepancies between the information submitted by the defendant and that received from other sources.<sup>56</sup> The prosecutor must have reasonable notice of that conference, and an opportunity to participate.<sup>57</sup> The court may compel the prosecutor to reveal questioned evidence to the defendant at that conference for the purpose of rebuttal.

For the federal courts, as of Dec. 1, 1975, see Fed. R. Crim. P. 32 (c)(3). Note that the Federal Rule has changed from leaving disclosure to the judge's discretion to mandating it. A total refusal to disclose remains a permissible option in certain extraordinary situations. The court in United States v. Long, 19 Crim.L. Rptr. 2201-02 (E.D. Mich., April 29, 1976) found that such an extraordinary situation did not exist in that case and that the sentencing magistrate erred in following such a course. The magistrate should have disclosed the contents of the report to the counsel and instructed him not to pass the information along to his client. The court remarked that this alternative would be helpful in cases involving potential harm to third persons if the defendant learned the contents of the report. This procedure may be of limited use in the organized crime context, in situations where the defense attorney may ignore the judge's instructions.

¶29 A policy of disclosing presentence reports to defendants can help the prosecutor. If the defendant has an opportunity to view and challenge the report, the prosecutor's responsibility to verify the report's allegations may lessen. Those allegations may have to meet a lower measure of reliability.

¶30 In sum, these flexible safeguards provide the prosecutor with clear opportunities to introduce the defendant's connection with organized crime.

IV. Appellate Review of Sentence

A. In General

¶31 The hornbook rule is that an appellate court will not disturb a criminal sentence unless it either exceeds statutory limits or represents a clear abuse of discretion.<sup>58</sup>

Most jurisdictions, however, have statutes authorizing the appeal of illegal sentences. Traditionally, these statutes have been construed as not sanctioning the increase of a sentence on review.<sup>59</sup> In New York, for example, the prosecutor may appeal only those sentences which are invalid as a matter of law.<sup>60</sup> Nevertheless, it might legitimately be argued that a judge, as a matter of law, abuses his discretion when he sets too lenient a sentence.<sup>61</sup> If so, then a sentence substantially too lenient could be characterized as illegal, and it could be reviewed on appeal by the prosecutor. The New York prosecutor may, however, under the usual interpretation, challenge only those sentences which fail to meet the minimum legal terms.

B. Defendant's Right to Appeal and the Danger of an Increased Sentence

¶32 Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Maryland allow the appellate court to increase the sentence when certain defendants appeal.<sup>62</sup>

<sup>59</sup> See, e.g., Fed. R. Crim. P. 35; N.J. Court Rule 3:21-10. For a brief description of other such state statutes see McClellan, "The Organized Crime Act (S.30) or its Critics: Which Threatens Civil Liberties?" 46 Notre Dame Lawyer 55, 178-79, note 567 (1970). The leading case propounding this interpretation is Ex Parte Lange, 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 163 (1874). See also United States v. Benz, 282 U.S. 304, 307 (1931) (to increase the sentence already in service is to subject the defendant to double punishment in violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment). In United States v. Sacco, 367 F.2d 368 (2d Cir. 1966), the court considered, but finally rejected, the defendant's proposed exception to the rule of Lange, supra.

There shall be an appellate division of the superior

The constitutional objection usually raised against such proceedings is that the possibility of an increase in sentence violates the defendant's due process rights. The Supreme Court's decision in North Carolina v. Pearce is the usual base upon which this objection rests.<sup>63</sup> There, the Court held that a defendant who has obtained a retrial after making an appeal should be protected from the imposition of an increased sentence by a vindictive judge. The crux of the Pearce decision court for the review of sentences to the state prison imposed by final judgments in criminal cases, except in any case in which a different sentence could not have been imposed, and for the review of sentences to the reformatory for women for terms of more than five years imposed by final judgments in such criminal cases. . . . No justice shall sit or act on an appeal from a sentence imposed by him.

The relevant portions of Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 278 §28B stipulate:

A person aggrieved by a sentence which may be reviewed may appeal to the appellate division for a review of such sentence. . . . The justice who imposed the sentence appealed from may transmit to the appellate division a statement of his reasons for imposing the sentence and shall make such a statement within seven days if requested to do so by the appellate division.

The appellate division shall have jurisdiction to consider an appeal with or without a hearing, review the judgment so far as it relates to the sentence imposed and also any other sentence imposed with the sentence appealed from was imposed, notwithstanding the partial execution of any such sentence, and shall have jurisdiction to amend the judgment by ordering substituted therefore a different appropriate sentence or sentences or any other disposition of the case which could have been made at the time of the imposition of the sentence or sentences under review, but no sentence shall be increased without giving the defendant an opportunity to be heard. If the appellate division decides that the original sentence or sentences should stand, it shall dismiss the appeal. Its decision shall be final. . . . The appellate division may require the production of any records, documents, exhibits or other things connected with the proceedings. . . .

was the fear of vindictiveness because of a defendant's appeal. Later cases, however, have read Pearce narrowly.<sup>64</sup> In short, the ". . . lesson that emerges from Pearce, Colten, and Chaffin is that the Due Process Clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment upon retrial after appeal, but only those that pose a likely threat of vindictiveness."<sup>65</sup>

¶33 The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has held since Pearce that its statutory procedure precludes the possibility of vindictiveness.<sup>66</sup> Under Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 278 §278A, the sentencing judge cannot sit as a member of the appellate division, the court that sets the final sentence. The court also supported its decision by pointing to the record of the appellate division proceedings from July 1, 1955 to June 30, 1969; the record showed a greater than four-to-one ratio of sentence reduction to sentence increase.<sup>67</sup> Finally, the same court suggested that the Pearce holding was actually inapplicable to the Massachusetts statute:

We note finally that the Pearce rule does not seem suited to Appellate Division proceedings. It does not permit consideration of any factors but the defendant's conduct subsequent to the first trial. Such a rule would seriously hamper the work of the Appellate Division because it would limit it to the brief period that the defendant has been serving the sentence in the State prison or a reformatory awaiting hearing on the appeal. Moreover, the rule would preclude consideration of the very factor which the Appellate Division was established to consider: whether a particular defendant's sentence is excessively short or long compared to other defendants' sentences for the same or similar offenses. Since the Supreme Court was not considering this procedure, we do not believe that it meant the Pearce rule to apply to it. . . .<sup>68</sup>

C. Prosecutor's Appeal for Increased Sentence

¶34 The Massachusetts statute allows an increase in sentence only upon a defendant's appeal. The need remains, however, for a way in which prosecutors can call for an increase in sentence. There should be some means of supervising those trial judges who, because of corruption, political considerations, or lack of knowledge, give light sentences to racketeers.<sup>69</sup>

¶35 The constitutional barriers to such a power do not appear insurmountable. Due process objections present the least difficulty. Pearce, it should be emphasized, turns on the issue of vindictiveness caused by a defendant's appeal. Absent this factor, the due process rationale for denying an increased sentence seems thin, particularly when the prosecutor, not the defendant, appeals a sentencing decision made in favor of the defendant. The Pearce rationale of vindictiveness should, therefore, be limited to a situation in which a resentencing judge is reversed for making an error against the defendant after an appeal brought by the defendant.

We therefore conclude that when a judge rules in favor of the defendant [on a legal question] after a verdict of guilty has been entered by the trier of fact, the government may appeal from that ruling without running afoul of the Double Jeopardy Clause.<sup>72</sup>

Under Wilson, only facts going to guilt or innocence resolved by the trier of fact are protected from appellate review.

¶37 The prosecutor should, therefore, be aware of these new possibilities for appealing a sentence thought to be too lenient. Prosecutors in states with statutes like New York's should also take them into account when seeking to define the scope of their states' relatively liberal statutes. These recent decisions suggest that there is no constitutional barrier to seeking review of a judge's abuse of discretion in sentencing. A new interpretation of the present appeal statute might also be secured in the right case.

II. Dangerous Special Offender Sentencing

¶39 The Sixth Circuit has recently affirmed the constitutionality of the federal dangerous special offender statute, 18 U.S.C. §3575, a part of Title X of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1973, in United States v. Stewart, 531 F.2d 326 (1976). Section 3575 provides an increased sentence for dangerous special offenders once certain age, frequency of conviction, and time standards are met. Section 3575(b) reads:

. . . the court shall sentence the defendant to imprisonment for an appropriate term not to exceed twenty-five years and not disproportionate in severity to the maximum term otherwise authorized by law for such felony.

The court below had ruled that section 3575(b) was unconstitutionally vague and that a sentence given under its terms would be a denial of due process in violation of the Fifth Amendment. The court similarly held that section 3575(f) was unconstitutionally vague. Section 3575(f) reads:

. . . a defendant is dangerous for purposes of this section if a period of confinement longer than that required for such felony is required for the protection of the public from further criminal conduct by the defendant.

¶40 The Sixth Circuit reversed both holdings. First, the court listed several procedural safeguards regulating use of the increased sentence, and found that those procedures were far less arbitrary than those employed in ordinary sentencing practices. For example, section 3575(b) requires a presentence hearing, detailed notice to the defendant, and reasonable time for verification of allegations. The statute expressly guarantees the defendant the right to counsel, compulsory process, and cross examination. The court found these procedural safeguards, extraordinary for a presentence hearing, to reflect Congress's intent to control carefully the use of the statute. The court also pointed to the specific language of the statute ". . . and not disproportionate in severity to the maximum term otherwise authorized. . ." as further manifesting that intent. Finally, the court emphasized that the very broad scope for review of such sentences, allowed under section 3576, would check any abuse of judicial discretion.

<sup>73</sup>384 F. Supp. 874 (W.D.Mo. 1974). The statute was held unconstitutional for vagueness by the district court. The Eighth Circuit did not reach the issue of vagueness, however, when it affirmed the district court's decision. United States v. Duardi, 529 F.2d 123 (8th Cir. 1975).

an interpretation which supports the constitutionality of the legislation. Accordingly, the district court's finding of vagueness was reversed, and the constitutionality of section 3575(f) affirmed.

HEARINGS ON REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8, 1977

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:30 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Orrin G. Hatch [acting chairman] presiding.

Present: Senator Hatch.

Staff present: Paul C. Summitt, chief counsel; D. Eric Hultman, minority counsel, Paul H. Robinson, counsel; Michael M. Hunter, legislative counsel to Senator Hatch; and Mabel A. Downey, chief clerk.

Senator HATCH [acting chairman]. The meeting will come to order.

Yesterday we were privileged to have a number of distinguished witnesses testify before the Committee on the Judiciary with respect to reform of the Federal criminal laws, particularly S. 1437. The witnesses included the Attorney General of the United States, Griffin Bell, and Edmund G. "Pat" Brown, former Governor of the State of California, who served as the Chairman of the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws.

We appreciated the insight which yesterday's witnesses provided in relating the great concern and necessity for revision of the present Federal criminal laws.

This morning we are again privileged to have several equally distinguished authorities who have been most agreeable in arranging their busy schedules to testify before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures.

The testimony today and tomorrow is intended to go particularly to the sentencing provisions of the legislation pending before the Judiciary Committee. We trust that the testimony will provide special insight into the problems which are now present in the Federal judicial system and assist us in providing proper measures to resolve these problems.

Our first witness this morning will be Hon. Marvin E. Frankel, U.S. District Court, New York, N.Y.

Judge, we are very pleased to welcome you before this committee, and we will be most interested in your testimony today.

STATEMENT OF HON. MARVIN E. FRANKEL, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE,
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Judge FRANKEL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I suppose it is not original to say that I am honored to be here, but I am. I am pleased and honored to be here.

As you indicated, Senator, I am here to speak about the sentencing provisions of S. 1437 and some similar bills and particularly to express the view that these provisions mark a very long and single step toward a rational and more civilized system of sentencing criminal defendants.

Knowing that you have a considerable roster of people today, I want to confine my remarks. I want to speak particularly and most favorably about two aspects of these sentencing provisions.

First is the proposed provision that would create a Sentencing Commission to study sentencing, to prepare guidelines, to formulate policies, to collect data. Second is the provision for appellate review of sentences.

The things I have to say about these two basic aspects of the bill are mostly favorable. I have some criticisms and some suggestions. I will take the liberty of expressing those.

My credentials—if I should state them—are, first, I am a trial judge and have been for nearly 12 years in the business of sentencing people. In the course of that, I have become increasingly unhappy with the awareness that I and people like me have too much power, too little knowledge, and no guidance from any of the organs of the law that normally give guidance to trial judges. We have had essentially none from the Congress and none from the higher courts and none, to speak of, from any of the standard sources of knowledge and principle to which judges look.

I am sure I have sentenced too many people too harshly; I am not happy with that. I have sentenced some, I am sure, too leniently; and I am not happy with that. But I must confess I worry less about that than about the excessive sentences.

Disturbed by this area and its uncertainties and vagueness, I wrote a book about it a few years ago called "Criminal Sentences." I think it may be permissible to say that some of the ideas in this proposed legislation have some resemblance to some of the things I wrote about.

First off, as I said, I want to speak very strongly in favor of the idea of a sentencing commission. I think it is a reflection of an awareness that we are not going to cure all the difficulties with sentencing all at once.

The Commission, as I understand it, is an agency that will have an ongoing responsibility for studying and formulating new ideas about, and improving the process of, sentencing. In addition, the Commission's task of creating guidelines and policies will be an important step in the direction of narrowing and guiding the discretion of trial judges without attempting the impossible task—impossible in my judgement—of eliminating that discretion.

I think, as many people do, that to have a trial judge or a miscellaneous several hundred trial judges free to decide in any given case whether a defendant should get no prison or 25 years in prison or something in between, without any controls or criteria or standards, I think that kind of setup—which is what we live with now—is intolerable.

I think, on the other hand, that the effort to have the legislature fix in advance the tariffs for each sentence for each crime without regard to the circumstances of the particular offense or the characteristics or circumstances of the particular defendant—I think that opposite extreme is equally unacceptable.

I think that no civilized system of sentencing could have that kind of mechanical, decreed-in-advance, automatic sentencing arrangement by category of crime.

I think the Commission is a salutary and sensible middle position which will leave, or could leave, a necessary measure of discretion to discriminate among the several defendants and at the same time proceed to guide and regulate the exercise of discretion.

I think the provision for the Sentencing Commission's creation of guidelines for the parole commission is also a good idea. I am aware from reading the newspapers that there was testimony before this committee yesterday suggesting the desirability of abolishing the parole commission or at least abolishing the release function now exercised by the parole agency.

I have felt, from thinking about it and from studying it, that there is a lot to be said for that position. I have, on occasion, spoken for that abolitionist view.

On looking at this bill, I think it is a preferable alternative. I think the effort to have scrutiny of the parole commission and on an overall view of the sentencing process by an agency that will make guidelines for both the parole commission and the courts is a suitable compromise. I think that it might be desirable to let the Sentencing Commission function in this fashion for a period of years and then, on the basis of that effort to have an integrated system of sentencing functions, consider whether abolition of the parole commission is still a desirable course.

I said I had some criticisms. I have two with respect to the proposals concerning the Sentencing Commission.

They relate to the matter of selection of the members of the Commission and—perhaps less importantly, but symbolically significant—to the matter of the pay of the Commissioners.

This bill, like some other bills that have been proposed, places the sentencing commission in the judicial branch—which is perfectly agreeable—and provides that the members of the commission are to be selected by the Judicial Conference of the United States. It is that aspect of the selection that I disagree with, for two reasons.

The commission will have functions, obviously, that cut across the three branches. Its guidelines and its policies will affect and, to some degree, even regulate and control the work not only of judicial people but of executive and legislative people as well.

I should not say “control” with respect to the legislature, but certainly an important legislative function is the role of the commission in formulating ideas for new legislation for improvements in the sentencing area.

I think the breadth of the commission's functions, if nothing else, would argue for a selection arrangement not limited to the Judicial Conference. The fact that all three branches are affected might suggest selection by the three branches, as some agencies are now selected.

But my own vote, which I respectfully submit to the committee, would be for Presidential appointment of the commissioners.

I have that in view because I think that the hope ought to be that this would be an august and significant commission. I think its success, like the success of so many agencies, will depend on the caliber of people it can attract—their own professional and moral attainments—and, not much less importantly, their status and the regard in which they are held in the legal and more general community.

I think Presidential appointment signifies this idea of consequence and of prestige. It would be a mode of attracting the kind of people you would want to attract. I would urge the committee to consider a revision of the appointment process to provide for a Presidential appointment.

Obviously, it is not unprecedented to have the President appoint people whose functions are outside the executive branch. I do not need to burden this committee with the justification for that arrangement.

Similarly, and on a somewhat more crass level, I would urge consideration of some change in the provisions for pay of the commission members.

There is no problem about paying people who are already in Government at the rate of their already-specified pay; that is, giving them no additional pay for serving on the commission.

But then there is a provision in the bill that people who come into the commission from outside the Government—as one certainly hopes at least some commissioners would—are to be paid at the rate of grade 18. I think that is not completely satisfactory.

I mention in my statement and I will repeat that I spent some of the best years of my younger life as a civil servant and never made it up to grade 18. I have only the highest respect for the people who hold and stay in those super grades.

Nevertheless, I am back on the point of prestige, symbolism: I think the provision for pay at a grade 18—a kind of civil service grade—may have a downgrading quality in this setting that we should avoid.

My suggestion, very simply, is that the commissioners who come from outside the Government should be paid at the rate of pay which is now enjoyed by Members of Congress and by judges of the U.S. Courts of Appeals.

It seems to me that gives some reflection of a quality of eminence that ought to be imported into this arrangement.

The second thing I said I would speak about is the provision for appellate review of sentences.

The first proposition I would make about that is that I am very much for such review. It is very grossly overdue. In this country we have lagged way behind every civilized country in the world. All the other countries, as far as I know, that call themselves civilized provide for some kind of review of a sentencing officer's determination of the punishment.

I think it is high time that we did the same. In that, I take no very revolutionary position. I join with the ABA's minimum standards project, which back in 1968, in its Minimum Standards for Appellate Review of Sentences, came out for such review.

While I am in favor of the idea of review, I am not completely in accord, by any means, with the specific provisions for review in S. 1437. I think they are too narrow, too confined, and that there is no real justification for the very severe limitations on review embodied in this bill.

I have no objection to precluding review—as the bill, very generally described, does—where a sentence is the result of a plea bargain or a sentence bargain—which is probably the correct word for it. But I have serious question about making unreviewable a sentence that is within the guidelines formulated by the sentencing commission and is consistent with policy statements of that commission.

I think—though I am a very staunch supporter of the existence and functioning of that commission—this gives far too much power to the commission and far too little power to the judges, especially the judges of the appellate courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States.

I do not think that a fair approach to the necessarily experimental and tentative character of these guidelines and policy statements would include embedding them in concrete, as it were, to this extent. I think, to put it more simply, that, while the commission's guidelines—one would hope—will be important and will have great weight and will presumptively bind all the judges, I think they should be subject to reconsideration and, on occasion, to revision or even invalidation by the appellate courts, including the Supreme Court, as well as the Congress.

In writing about this and urging the existence of a commission myself, I have envisioned it as a very important agency which would be part of an ongoing dialog about these questions of guidelines and policies, and not a kind of final and unquestioned authority, which is nearly the effect this bill would have by making sentences within the commission's pronouncements unreviewable.

I would refer in this connection to a book that I am told is published today whose authors are here and who I know can speak for themselves. It is a volume called "Toward A Just and Effective Sentencing System." It is by Pierce O'Donnell, Michael Churgin, and Dennis Curtis. It has a foreword by Senator Kennedy and some involvement of my own.

Since you are looking for serious suggestions, without being modest on their behalf or anybody else's, I would suggest that this book has a preferable alternative on that subject, in addition to being an excellent discussion of many other aspects of sentencing.

The book provides, in effect, that sentences of the sentencing commission will be reviewable, but that the question whether they are within or outside the guidelines will affect the scope of review, not reviewability as such.

Very briefly, the Messrs. O'Donnell, Churgin, and Curtis would provide that, if a sentence is within the guidelines, it is reversible only if it is clearly unreasonable. If it is outside the guidelines, it would be reversible merely on the ground of being unreasonable.

That difference is important.

In both instances—and this is the critical point I make to this committee—the sentence is reviewable. You can get to the appellate court. The question is, what standards will the appellate court follow in deciding whether to affirm or reverse.

My broad position on this—and I will conclude with it—is that I do not think that we should be looking hard for ways to limit access to the court of appeals to get review of sentences.

As I said before, it is high time that this grave and critical aspect of the judicial process in criminal cases was subjected to appellate scrutiny. I do not think that we should be looking for ways to provide for unreviewability any more than we look for ways to do that in the case of a post office truck collision with your automobile or an infringement of a trademark or a breach of contract or anything else.

I think the presumption ought to be in favor of review and not in favor of limited and niggardly and reluctant kinds of review. I have suggested that the tendency of this bill in this respect is toward that latter, less desirable kind of setup.

These are the things I have to say to this committee. I will be happy, to the extent of my ability, to answer questions.

Senator HATCH. Judge, we appreciate your statement here today and have deep respect for you as a judge and as a person.

Do you think that appellate review of a trial judge's sentences will open the door for appellate consideration of matters that have previously been considered wholly evidentiary and best determined by the trial judge who is right there on the scene?

Judge FRANKEL. Well, I think the whole subject will be opened up if we allow review; but that is true. Senator, of all manner of other things that trial judges have primary responsibility for, including evidentiary matters.

The appellate court looks at the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction. It looks at rulings on evidence. It looks at the sufficiency of evidence to justify all manner of things that the trial judge may have done. The appellate court looks at a lot of things that are peculiarly the business of trial judges. Appellate courts do not empanel juries. They do not keep order in the courtroom. They do not select juries generally. They do not appoint counsel. But they do, in every one of those kinds of situations, have authority to review, revise, reverse what we trial judges have done.

I would say that, insofar as the things that the trial judge does are peculiarly within his competence, insofar as he has seen the witnesses, seen the defendant, and has, supposedly, some special advantage for judgement, that is handled by the appellate court by giving a certain degree of deference to what the trial judge has done.

But it is not handled by closing the door on review altogether.

Senator HATCH. Judge, the bill refers to "rehabilitation" as a possible goal of imprisonment.

What are your views on that particular point?

Judge FRANKEL. Well, my view have been better stated by Norval Morris; but I will repeat them because I agree with them.

I think that the bill makes an error—and it may be an error of some consequence—when it makes rehabilitation one of the purposes of a sentence. I do not think anybody ought to be sentenced for rehabilitation.

I think we kid ourselves, and I think we lead ourselves into needless cruelties when we say we are locking somebody up for rehabilitation.

There is a widespread recognition of this now. I think Mr. Carlson, who sits back here, and who minds the people that we lock up is among the many people who have come to recognize that.

I think once we sentence somebody, which should be for purposes other than rehabilitation, we should, of course, do everything we can to help the person, if we can. Just as we do with people outside the prison. We should extend to them any kind of service—education, medical, therapeutic—that we can make available.

But the important point—and it is a critical point—is that we ought not to put anybody in prison for so much as one day with the notion that that is good for him and that we are confining him for rehabilitation.

I would prefer to see that portion of the purposes of sentencing in this bill as it is now written deleted.

Senator HATCH. Judge, you have already commented on some aspect of this, but what makeup would you prefer to see in the membership of the sentencing commission? Should it be made up wholly of judges?

Judge FRANKEL. No. I think it very clearly should not be made up wholly of judges.

While I did not state that as one of my reasons for opposing appointment by the Judicial Conference, it is something that I would adopt as an additional reason.

I think the people who have knowledge and potential input with respect to the questions of sentencing come from many disciplines and occupations other than judging. I think you are going to want to see on this commission—I would want to see on it—lawyers, people with experience in parole, people with experience in the various helping-human professions, whether it is psychology, psychiatry, sociology, or others. There are people who have experience with the prisons, and others who have relevant kinds of knowledge and information.

It should not be exclusively judges by any means.

Senator HATCH. Judge, you suggest the members of the sentencing commission would best be appointed by the President.

Judge FRANKEL. Yes.

Senator HATCH. Do you feel that would be a better approach than the selection method presently contained in the bill?

In your prepared statement, you note some disappointment with the caliber of the persons which in the past have been appointed to the parole commission.

Does not that same danger exist if the members of the sentencing commission are Presidential appointments?

Judge FRANKEL. I would certainly hope not.

I might say, quite apart from the fact that a couple of my friends from the parole commission are here, that I think the unhappy condition of personnel in parole agencies has, in recent years, been improving. I have already expressed this publicly.

But let me get to your question.

I think what has happened in the field of corrections and sentencing is a basis for hope that you would get better people. This has become a matter of the most intense public concern. People are writing books about it at a great rate. You are getting statements by the Attorney General of great earnestness and deep concern.

To put it in one word, there is a very bright light of public attention on this subject. My sense of it, from reading books and observing what goes on in the world over the years, has been that, when you have the spotlight on an agency or a subject and a system of Presidential appointments, you have a good promise—no guarantee—that you are going to get good people.

The appointing process itself goes on with intense public scrutiny. In addition, you have the basis for attracting people who are interested in rising to a challenge and taking on an important public responsibility.

I do not think there is any guarantee in this life of getting supremely gifted people in any job through any appointing process. But I do think, for this commission in our time, Presidential appointment holds higher promise than any other kind of selection.

Senator HATCH. Judge, do you think it might be better to have a combination—some appointed by the Judicial Conference and some appointed by the President? Would that be satisfactory?

Judge FRANKEL. I would find that an acceptable close second, Senator.

Senator HATCH. I worry about the Commission being politicized. I do not think that it would be politicized if it were in the hands of the Judicial Conference, as presently provided in the bill.

I worry about it being politicized if it is in the hands of the Executive, regardless of who the Executive is.

Judge FRANKEL. It is a problem.

I also mention in my statement—and I think I mentioned in the oral version of it—that one possibility would be tripartite appointment. Again, that would raise your problem of politics in two of the branches at least. But, at the same time, it would give a certain credit and representativeness to this commission, which, after all, relates to and has impact on each of the three branches.

I do not feel passionately about the choices between that and Presidential appointment; whereas, I would somewhat more strongly oppose appointment exclusively by the Judicial Conference.

Senator HATCH. Some of the questions I have been asking have been requested by Senator Kennedy. Here is another one that he wants asked.

Will not the unlimited right of appeal flood the courts of appeals and raise a serious problem of court congestion?

Judge FRANKEL. Well, I cannot give a flat "no" answer, Senator; but I can say "probably not."

The answers to that fear, which, frankly, I think is a hobgoblin, are outlined, again, in this book I mention.

First, that argument has been raised over and over again in the States, which, over recent years, have been adopting appellate review of sentences. I note that in actual experience the argument has proved to be unfounded. The State appellate courts have not been flooded. They have not been overwhelmed.

I think that appellate review is important. But, at the same time, realistically, I do not think the problem of reviewing sentences is an onerous one. I do not think, very candidly, that most sentences will be modified or reversed. That is not the important reason for having appellate review. The important reason, if you put it in two words, is, one, so that we who sentence people have a sense that we are subject to scrutiny; and, two, so that you get some rationality and consistency finally into this process.

I do not think you are going to have a lot of them reversed.

I have one other point. That is that the sentence a person gets for a crime, a period of time locked up by his society, is a terribly important problem. With all deference to them, I would say that there is a good deal of business that the courts of appeals now do that is much less important. I do not think that we ought to say that we cannot add sentencing to your responsibilities because that will flood the appellate courts, leaving them flooded, as they now are, with review of auto accident cases, copyright infringement, breach of contract, and other things that, very frankly, are not earth shattering in their significance.

Senator HATCH. Judge, there may be other members of this subcommittee or of the full committee who would want to submit written questions to you; so we will leave the record open. Hopefully, you will answer such questions.

Judge FRANKEL. I am at your service, sir.

Senator HATCH. Your statement will be placed in the record.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MARVIN E. FRANKEL, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE,
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The sentencing provisions of S. 1437 mark long strides in the right direction. I take the privilege of this appearance mainly to support two key improvements offered by this measure: (1) the creation of a Sentencing Commission to pursue the tasks of study, policy formulation, and ongoing revision that are necessary in this troubled and complex sector of the criminal justice system, and (2) the provision for appellate review of sentences. At the same time, I have some criticisms of these aspects of the bill; I plan to state these and suggest a few changes.

I

My credentials for offering opinions about sentencing legislation can be stated fairly briefly. Now in my twelfth year as a district judge, I have sentenced more people than I find it comfortable to count. I am certain, but certainly not happy, that some of the sentences were too harsh. Some, no doubt, were excessively lenient, and I regret those too, but frankly not as much. Always there has been a disquieting awareness of having too much power, too little knowledge, and next to nothing in the way of guidance from the Congress, from higher courts, or from any other quarter. I have known vividly that I am responsible, with all of my colleagues, for creating the crazy-quilt of sentencing disparities that is probably the most awful aspect of this subject.

Brooding on these problems, I wrote a small book in 1972 called Criminal Sentences. I joined there with the American Bar Association and many others in urging appellate review of sentences. I "tendered as the most important single suggestion in this book" (p. 119) the idea of a Commission on Sentencing to study the problems, make rules to guide the discretion of sentencers, and assist Congress with further legislation. The proposal was meant then, as in my testimony today, to suggest the best means I could think of to begin improving the lawlessness of our sentencing practices.

II

Adhering to my earlier sense of the priorities, let me speak first, and very favorably, about the provisions in S. 1437 that would add a new Chapter 58 to Title 28, creating a United States Sentencing Commission. The fundamental virtues of this idea, as I see it, lie in (a) the recognition that we are not equipped now to solve the problems of sentencing once and for all, and (b) the creation of a mechanism with which to begin and continue working steadily at the job. What we have realized in the last decade or so is that the field of sentencing is a vast wasteland of ignorance, curbstone hunches, mythology, and general guesswork. We need information, guidelines to confine and assist the exercise of sentencing discretion, research and study to improve our understanding, and the steady development of better, more civilized policies. All these things the Commission could supply.

The idea of guidelines for categories of offenses and offenders offers a good compromise between the unacceptable regime of unfettered judicial discretion, which we have now, and the opposite extreme of rigid, mandatory sentences, which many have been driven to propose. The bill, in what would become 28 U.S.C. §994(a)-(d), is a splendid groundwork in this respect. It directs the Commission to create guideline ranges, weighing an array of factors about the crime and the criminal, and thus to supply rational and consistent boundaries for the fixing of individual sentences. The prospect is presented of substituting some decent measure of restriction on the power of the individual judge—who today, for example, is authorized to give a bank robber a sentence from probation to 25 years, or anything in between, with no stated criteria or controls to govern the particular decision. Under the guidelines the judge will still have, as he or she should, leeway to distinguish among the varieties of separate human beings who rob banks, but a leeway that is sensibly narrowed and canalized by standards of general application.

It is intolerable to permit judges, however good they are, to choose within a range from zero to 25 years, so that the actual sentences of similar defendants will vary wildly depending, not upon the offense or the defendant, but upon the varying beliefs and idiosyncracies of the sentencers. It is not more tolerable to legislate that every bank robber should be sentenced to X years regardless of age, prior record, the seriousness of the particular robbery, the defendant's potential for lawful functioning, etc. A middle course of ordered discretion, under general and steadily improved guidelines, is the clearly preferable scheme of S. 1437.

Another significant benefit in the Commission proposal is the mandate for research and development in §995. We are, as I have said, enormously ignorant on all the questions of human behavior, ethical choice, and policy that are implicated in the business of sentencing. Neither Congress nor the courts nor any executive agency has thus far found it feasible to give these problems the full time thought, on a substantial scale, that they so clearly require. The Commission would be expected to do that—both through its own staff and in its role “as a clearinghouse and information center * * *.” §995(a)(10)(A). That function, along with the allied task of collecting and systematically organizing the sentencing data, id., subsecs. (11)-(14)—now largely unknown and unknowable to those who make the laws and to those who sentence people—would help us to begin to act upon knowledge rather than speculation and surmise. The bill expressly contemplates, id., subsec. (17), that the Commission would act upon its learning and organized data in recommending legislative improvements to the Congress. The courts as well would unquestionably be guided toward sounder decision-making by this growing storehouse of intelligence. The prospect is one of light, at long last, in a sea of darkness.

Also salutary are the provisions—in §§3831, 3834, 3835, and 3836—that would require the Parole Commission to function under “guidelines and * * * policy statements * * * issued by the Sentencing Commission * * *.” The fragmentation of responsibility for the actual length of sentences between the judges and the parole authorities has been a major flaw in a thoroughly flawed system. Many observers, including me, have thought the parole release function (as distinguished from parole supervision) works abominably: the theory that the parole board would watch the prisoner's progress and release him when he was “ready” has never worked acceptably in practice. Parole board (or commission) members, at least until lately, have been perceived as unqualified and arbitrary. There has been growing sentiment for the abolition of parole as it has functioned until now.

While I have tended to share that abolitionist view, I think the proposals in S. 1437 are better. The Sentencing Commission, committed to the acquisition of facts and wisdom, can develop an overview not heretofore possessed by any agency. If parole finds a new life and new purpose under the Commission's guidelines and policies, this may be preferable to simple repeal of the function. If abolition is finally seen to be best, the position will rest upon a footing of knowledge more solid than what we have now.

Passing other details, I submit respectfully that the provision for a Sentencing Commission is a solid item of creative legislation. I would suggest, however, that it is less perfect than it might be in the provisions for selection and status of Commission members. The Commission is to be located "in the judicial branch," and its nine members are to be "designated by the Judicial Conference of the United States." § 991(a). But the Commission's work is meant to guide and support functions of all three branches—the sentencing work of judges, parole and other executive responsibilities and, surely not least of all, further legislation as needs and ideas for improvement come to be discerned. It would be desirable to have the selection process reflect these assignments. Not, one would hope, in the interest of narrow parochialisms. Rather, the process of choosing Commission members should exemplify that its mandates are broader and more ambitious than the concerns of judges alone. One way to accomplish this would be by tripartite appointments. Another way—preferable, I think, for a combination of reasons—would be to have the President appoint the members and designate the Chairman.

It is familiar, of course, to have the President name officials whose positions are judicial, or even legislative in character, as well as those strictly "executive." Presidential appointment implies qualities of prestige and consequence not achieved by the provision for Judicial Conference appointments. This Commission ought to be, or we should make vivid the hope that it will become, an illustrious agency, charged with large responsibilities for improvement and innovation. The prospects for success will hinge upon the possibility of attracting as Commissioners people of rich qualifications and high repute. Presidential selection will enhance that possibility.

In the same vein, I question the provision for paying members not otherwise in Federal employment at the rate of a grade 18 civil servant. § 992(c). This is a crass subject, to be sure. And having been for long and rewarding years a civil servant in substantially lower grades, I have only respect for the many distinguished public people who hold super grades at or below 18. Nevertheless, to repeat the point applicable again, the problem is one of symbolism as much as anything else. The pay, I suggest, should be stated at the rate for judges on the Courts of Appeals and members of Congress. The amount at stake is trivial. The symbolic value, whether or not it is quite momentous, surely warrants the added costs.

III

The provision for appellate review of sentences is long overdue. The Federal Government has in this respect lagged behind just about every civilized country in the world. The history and the anomaly are amply portrayed by the American Bar Association's Project on Minimum Standards in its Standards Relating to Appellate Review of Sentences (Approved Draft, 1968).

I strongly favor the basic idea of §3725 insofar as it at least provides some review of sentences. I would submit, however, that the narrow limits the bill places upon reviewability are for the most part undesirable. It seems acceptable to say, as the bill does in effect, that sentences resulting from plea bargains—or, more accurately, from sentence bargains—should be unappealable. But I question seriously the allowance of appeals only for sentences outside the Sentencing Commission's guidelines and the denial of any appeal when "the sentence is consistent with policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission * * *." §3725 (a) (1) and (b) (1). It should be clear from what I have said that I support heartily the planned work of the Sentencing Commission, including its promulgation of policy statements. Nevertheless, it seems excessive to confer this much final authority and to exclude in so extreme a measure the authority and potential contributions of the appellate courts. The actual task of sentencing will remain, after all, for the judges. The policies of the Commission will affect that task, will merit substantial deference, and will, it is hoped, supply substantial assistance. But they should not be immunized against reconsideration and possible modification by our higher courts, including, of course, the Supreme Court of the United States.

On a relatively low, technical level, the questioned subsections in their present form would invite a large, and largely trivial, jurisprudence as to when sentences were or were not "consistent with policy statements" of the Commission. That is, however, a lesser complaint. The strong objection is the fundamental matter of principle already stated.

More broadly, let me urge that we not be astute to find ways of excluding sentences from appellate review. As things stand today, a litigant can go to the Court of Appeals, unfettered by rules of limitation, in a case involving a fender bent by a Post Office truck, a breach of a contract to paint a pleasure boat, or an alleged infringement on a design for chewing gum wrappers. The amount of time someone will stay locked up is not a lesser concern than those. Our approach should be to offer at least an equally unfettered scrutiny by the appellate tribunal.

There is, as you know, much more to the sentencing aspects of S. 1437 than I have covered in these observations. Knowing that you will hear from others views I might have offered, I spare you any repetition. On the whole, I think sentencing provisions are good. I might have hoped to see a general lowering of the penalty ranges. Some other matters of relative detail have given me brief pause. I am prepared to mention some of these things and to answer the Committee's questions to the extent that I can. On the whole, ending this statement as it began, I think the bill would effect valuable improvements. I would hope that, perhaps with some perfecting amendments, the sentencing changes will be enacted.

Judge FRANKEL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your coming today and we appreciate your astute testimony.

At this time we are going to recess for about 10 minutes.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH. The meeting will be in order.

Our next witness is Mr. Norman A. Carlson, Director of the Bureau of Prisons.

STATEMENT OF NORMAN A. CARLSON, DIRECTOR, BUREAU OF PRISONS

Mr. CARLSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It is a privilege to be here again today.

I had an opportunity yesterday to attend most of the session. Therefore, to avoid misunderstanding, I would like to summarize my statement.

Senator HATCH [acting chairman]. We would appreciate that.

Mr. CARLSON. First, let me state that I strongly support the proposal to revise the Federal criminal code. Without question, the present code creates many disparities and inequities in the criminal justice system. It is confusing and frustrating, to both criminal offenders in custody and the public.

Also, it causes unrest and uneasiness on the part of the offenders who have been convicted of violating the Federal law.

I want to compliment the committee and your staff in coming up with what I consider to be an innovative proposal and one that I believe in the long run will make a significant and positive contribution to the Federal criminal justice system.

I have been involved in the field of corrections for 22 years. During that period, I have become increasingly aware of the tremendous importance that sentencing has on the entire process. There have been two recent books that have had a great impact on me. Judge Frankel mentioned these worked in his testimony earlier today.

I think the book which Prof. Norval Morris, now Dean of the University of Chicago Law School, has written entitled "The Future of Imprisonment" as well as the book which is just being published, "Toward a Just and Effective Sentencing System," both outline clearly some of the needed changes that should take place to make our criminal justice system more effective and responsible.

To me, the most significant innovation that has been suggested in the proposed bill is the establishment of a Sentencing Commission. The Commission will establish sentencing guidelines for Federal district courts. Federal judges will be required to spell out the reasons and rationale for all sentences. The bill also provides for appellate review of sentences imposed which are outside of the guidelines.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the Sentencing Commission should significantly reduce two basic problems that we have in the system today. One concerns disparity of sentences. The second is uncertainty on the part of the offenders as to what the sentence actually means in terms of years of confinement.

The proposal establishes a system which I believe is based on the principles of fairness and equity. I think it will replace the present concept which, frankly, frustrates the system.

I am pleased to note that the sentencing guidelines approach considers two factors: The offense and the offender. I think this will create a system which provides both individualized judgments and a degree of uniform determinacy in the overall system of sentencing.

I am also pleased to note, Mr. Chairman, that the proposed legislation eliminates the Youth Corrections Act as well as title II of the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act. Both of these acts were appropriate when passed by Congress. However, I think experience over the years and research findings raise questions as to whether or not the acts should be continued.

Nearly everyone who is involved in the administration of criminal justice today is willing to abandon the "medical model" or the use of rehabilitation as a reason for imprisonment.

This does not mean that I suggest pulling back in terms of the programs we provide for offenders.

We recognize today that change cannot be coerced. When offenders change, they change because they want to. All those of us who work in the field of corrections can do is facilitate change. We cannot legislate or require change by the sentencing process.

I would like also to comment briefly on the parole component of the proposed legislation.

My statement was based on the draft legislation, which I have reviewed with my staff. The discussion yesterday brought in a new element; the suggestion that parole be eliminated.

As you know, the U.S. Parole Commission has developed a set of sentencing guidelines. It has been done carefully, after a great deal of research and evaluative effort. This, I believe, was the first sentencing body in the entire country—or world—that began to systematically develop a framework for sentencing guidelines.

I think what the Parole Commission has done is being transposed by the draft bill into an earlier stage in the criminal justice process. In other words, the Sentencing Commission is using the guideline approach to establish a range of sentences for specific criminal violations.

I note that the draft bill also eliminates the concept of good time. I support the elimination of good-time credits if parole is retained. However, should the committee consider in its wisdom, the abolition of parole, there certainly should be some provision provided—a light at the end of the tunnel—for offenders in the system. I think there must be some inducement for inmates serving long sentences to conform to institutional regulations.

Again, I would favor the elimination of good-time credits if parole is retained. However, should parole be abolished by the Congress, I think the legislation should include at least a limited good-time provision.

If that is the case, I would suggest that a proposal in the book by Pierce O'Donnell which I cited earlier be considered. This proposal provides for a one-tenth reduction of all sentences imposed as a modified good-time provision. There would be the clear presumption that inmates will receive the good time automatically unless they are involved in a serious infraction of institutional regulations.

Mr. Chairman, should parole be eliminated, I believe there should be a careful review of the possible length of sentences imposed. Today nearly 50 percent of all inmates in Federal custody are released under parole supervision. In other words, they are released earlier than the maximum sentence imposed by the court.

At the present time, we are facing a serious problem of prison overcrowding in the Federal system as well as in virtually every State in the country. The Federal population is at an alltime high of over 29,000 offenders. There are limited resources available. The committee should carefully consider the question of good time and parole as they relate to the issue of prison capacity.

If I may, I would like to comment on several other aspects of the bill. We plan to submit a memorandum to the committee staff which comments on some technical points. These are minor and by no means detract from our overall endorsement and support of the bill.

I would like, however, Mr. Chairman, to comment on minimum mandatory sentences. As you recall, the bill contains minimum mandatory sentences for two offenses: trafficking in an opiate and using a weapon in the commission of a crime. These are certainly serious crimes which I think should generally result in lengthy periods of incarceration.

I do, however, have a basic objection to the concept of minimum mandatory sentences. The concern I have is that they eliminate all flexibility on the part of both the Sentencing Commission and the sentencing court. Even though the bill attempts to spell out some mitigating circumstances, I think it is impossible to fully anticipate all the possible considerations that influence the imposition of a sentence.

As you may recall, in 1970 the Congress had to address a similar problem when it eliminated the minimum mandatory sentences that were contained in the Harrison Narcotics Act. Congress had to repeal that act because there were many inequities which came to light as a result of inmates who were sentenced to long terms where compelling extenuating circumstances were present.

I would also like to comment on an area Judge Frankel alluded to concerning the four criteria which the draft bill proposes should be considered before the imposition of a sentence.

The first three criteria I fully support. The concepts of deterrence, protection of the public, and just punishment are totally understandable.

The fourth concept, however, does present some problems so far as I am concerned.

Basically, the fourth criterion says that the sentencing judge should consider providing the defendant with needed educational and vocational training, medical care, and other correctional treatment.

I personally do not think—as Judge Frankel has already alluded to—that people should be sent to a prison with the thought that they are being sent for treatment. Perhaps if that criterion were limited to probation, I could agree. But I believe it should be eliminated as a consideration on the part of a sentencing court with respect to incarceration.

Senator HATCH. Well, that is if it is the only criterion applied. But what if it is one of four that are applied?

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to see anyone committed to an institution with the idea that one of the considerations on the part of the sentencing court was to provide rehabilitation. I think those programs must be provided.

By no means am I suggesting that we should not provide opportunities for inmates to change. But I do not think that people should be committed to an institution with rehabilitation as one of the criteria that was used by the sentencing judge.

Senator HATCH. Still, my point is, what if it is just one, and maybe a minor one? But nevertheless in every case there is a hope that there will be some rehabilitation of the person committed.

Mr. CARLSON. I think, as Norval Morris has clearly articulated, rehabilitation should be a hoped-for consequence of incarceration.

I certainly support that notion.

But I do question using rehabilitation as a reason for imposition of a prison sentence.

Senator HATCH. Is it your opinion that it is very unlikely for anybody to be rehabilitated in the prison system?

Mr. CARLSON. Not at all, Mr. Chairman. I think that many inmates do change. I think they change because they want to change; not because the court intended that as a reason for their incarceration.

My concern, Mr. Chairman, is that it might be used by some courts as a reason to impose a prison sentence. I have reservations about that as being a realistic consideration.

Senator HATCH. I think a lot of people would agree with you if that is the sole reason. But if it is just one of four and combines with the other three, I would hope that every prison would have some aspect of rehabilitation for inmates.

Mr. CARLSON. With that I certainly agree. Perhaps the legislative history could reflect that it is only a minor consideration and certainly should not replace the other three which I think are the most basic and important.

Senator HATCH. I think that is probably why it is there. Nobody wants to fail to consider the fact that there may be rehabilitative aspects of incarceration in Federal prison.

Many people would feel this bill remiss if it did not make rehabilitation one of the aspects and emphasize this. But, you know, a lot of people feel that if that is the only reason then we ought to have better ways in our society to solve these problems.

Mr. CARLSON. That is the basic point, and I agree with your observations, Mr. Chairman.

I have several other minor points.

Section 2302, paragraph C, provides that the Director of the Bureau of Prisons can move a court to reduce a sentence in extraordinary circumstances.

My point is that the legislative history should clarify the fact that this would be done in most cases only for circumstances that were unforeseen at the time of imposition of sentence. I do not think that procedure should be used to usurp the appellate process, which is also contained in the bill.

I think there is a need, however, to provide relief for cases when consideration such as medical problems come to light after a sentence has been imposed and the person is in confinement.

I have two other points. The section on juvenile offender is something that I understand. I support the intent of what the bill is attempting to accomplish.

I want to point out a problem, however. That concerns the older juvenile offender who is convicted prior to the age of 18 but still remains in custody when he is 18, 19, and up to 21 years of age. We have problems trying to place those offenders in a situation where they are in no way commingled with adult offenders.

I have no solution to suggest for the problem, Mr. Chairman. I merely want to point out that by tightening up on the commingling aspects, the bill creates a significant operational problem for us. We find that most State institutions, and even including private facilities and programs—simply are unwilling to accept these offenders because they have no facilities and programs to meet the needs of the aggressive, assaultive 18, 19, or 20 year old who has been committed under the juvenile act.

In conclusion, I would like to comment on what I consider to be another important aspect of the bill. This concerns the provisions for offenders who have a significant mental disorder or disease.

The bill makes some much-needed improvements, particularly relating to persons who have been acquitted by reason of insanity. As you recall, section 3613 corrects a serious gap which now exists. At present, many individuals who are acquitted by reason of insanity remain a serious threat to society.

There is at present no provision to retain such individuals in any type of mental health facility or under custodial supervision.

I would, however, like to point out a possible major problem with the draft bill. If the bill presumes that all mentally ill defendants are to be placed in a State or private hospital, we would have problems in trying to arrange such placements.

We find from experience that most State and private hospitals are reluctant—frequently unwilling—to accept anyone who has a criminal charge pending or presents a serious threat to society.

Also, many of the State mental hospitals today, for good reason, provide no security. They are open-type hospital settings. For the serious, aggressive, assaultive person who has been found incompetent to stand trial or has been acquitted by reason of insanity, there are great problems in terms of trying to place those people in a secure facility.

This is a difficult area. I have no solution, but want to alert the committee to a possible problem in terms of implementation of the proposed legislation.

Mr. Chairman, that concludes my summary. Again, I want to point out that I fully support the bill. The minor modifications and changes in no way should detract from what I consider to be a carefully drafted piece of legislation.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your consideration and the testimony you have given.

Without objection, your prepared statement will be inserted in the record.

[Material follows:]

STATEMENT OF NORMAN A. CARLSON, DIRECTOR, FEDERAL BUREAU OF PRISONS

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I welcome the opportunity to appear before you today to present the views of the Federal Bureau of Prisons on S. 1437, the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977. Let me state at the outset that I fully support these efforts at major revision of the Federal Criminal Code. The patchwork approach of the present Criminal Code has created sentencing disparities which confuse and frustrate Federal offenders, making the task of correctional administration much more difficult. I am aware of the fact that the Committee has worked long and diligently in their efforts to improve the Federal Criminal Code and I want to offer my congratulations for the excellent Bill you have drafted. Most of the provisions of this legislation, particularly in the area of sentencing, will have a significant and positive impact on the Federal correctional system.

During my career in the field of correctional administration, I have become increasingly aware of the tremendous impact of sentencing procedures on the correctional process. During the past several years, I have closely followed the debate in legal and academic circles regarding sentencing and the purposes of imprisonment. Two studies which have had great impact, at least on my personal thinking, are The Future of Imprisonment, by Dean Norval Morris, and Toward a Just and Effective Sentencing System, by O'Donnell, Churgin and Curtis.

I share the collective opinion of these and others that there is an urgent need to reform the present Federal sentencing structure. In my opinion, S. 1437 embodies the needed reform: its passage will significantly reduce the irrationality of the present system, and will enable the Federal sentencing system to function swiftly, and with more certainty.

In my opinion, the most significant innovation contained in this legislation is the establishment of a Sentencing Commission which will promulgate sentencing guidelines for Federal district court judges. Under this guideline system, judges must give written reasons for the sentence imposed, and provision is made for appellate review of sentencing. Since the sentencing guidelines will, in large measure, determine the size and nature of our future institutional population, it is crucial that there be a close working relationship between the Sentencing Commission and the Federal Bureau of Prisons. By working together, we can ensure that sufficient and appropriate correctional resources are available to achieve and carry out the purposes of sentencing.

The legislation also eliminates the Federal Youth Corrections Act (18 U.S.C. 5005 et. seq.) and Title II of the Narcotics Addict Rehabilitation Act (18

U.S.C. 4251 et. seq.). While both of the Acts were needed and appropriate at the time of their passage, subsequent experience operating under their provisions has raised significant questions as to whether they should be continued. Specifically, most individuals involved in the administration of Criminal Justice, including judges, prosecutors, attorneys and correctional administrators, have abandoned the so-called "medical model," based upon research and experience which clearly indicate that change in a criminal offender cannot be coerced. This does not mean, however, that offenders should not be provided the maximum opportunity to change their pattern of behavior through the provision of educational, vocational and other kinds of correctional programs. I will address this issue later in my testimony in connection with a comment I have on one of the sentencing criteria provided in the bill.

Another significant change in this legislation is the elimination of good time credits which operate under present law to reduce the time an offender must serve if he is not previously released on parole. Provision is made for parole release, but the elimination of good time will mean that if an offender fails to gain parole release, he will serve the entire sentence imposed, not just two-thirds of it as is often the case today. We support the elimination of good time but we also recognize the importance of giving offenders serving long terms some "light" at the end of the tunnel. In S. 1437 that "light" will be provided by the parole provisions of Subchapter D of Chapter 38. If the possibility of parole were to be eliminated, however, we suggest that the Committee consider a scaling down of the maximum penalties and the retention of some form of good time, at least for long term offenders. In particular, I suggest that the Committee consider the "early release" proposal discussed in Toward a Just and Effective Sentencing System which would enable an offender to reduce by one-tenth his term of imprisonment. Among the many good time and early release proposals which I have reviewed, I believe this proposal is the most logical, administratively practical, and best thought out.

Finally, since under present law good time operates in a significant percentage of cases to reduce the actual time served by offenders, it is critical that the new Sentencing Commission takes its elimination into account in promulgating sentencing guidelines. Like all resources, the amount of space available in prisons and jails is finite. We are presently experiencing severe overcrowding which is expected to continue for the foreseeable future. The population of the Bureau of Prisons now stands at an all time record high of 29,606, an increase of 6,203 over the last 2 years.

The combination of the greatly needed innovations and changes in S. 1437 will in my opinion, provide a significant and critically needed infusion of rationality into the present sentencing structure. For both offenders and the public alike, it will make the appearance and reality of sentencing fairer and more straight forward. More importantly, it will provide a greater degree of certainty of punishment for criminal behavior. In my opinion, offenders all too frequently view the criminal justice system in terms of "gambling odds." with a conviction being perceived as simply a turn of "bad luck." By increasing the certainty of punishment rather than its length or severity, I believe we can be more effective in deterring crime.

In view of my background and present position, I will confine my specific comments to the provisions of the legislation which deal directly with, or significantly impact on, the Federal Prison System. I again want to point out, however, that these minor suggestions in no way detract from my strong overall endorsement of this much needed legislation.

Mandatory minimum sentences

Section 1811, Trafficking in an Opiate, and Section 1823, Using a Weapon in the Course of a Crime, both provide for mandatory minimum imprisonment penalties (accompanied by a similar term of parole ineligibility) which the court will impose upon conviction. We are generally opposed to the use of mandatory minimum sentences for any specific criminal offense. Although the statutes exempt application of the mandatory penalty for certain specific mitigating circumstances such as youth (under 18) or mental impairment, mandatory minimums unnecessarily restrict the flexibility, in terms of sentencing options, which a judge needs. This flexibility, in our opinion, is inherent in the sentencing guidelines process which applies to sentences imposed under every other criminal offense in the Code. The need for deterrence and incapacitation can clearly be met by stiff sentencing guidelines which provide high maximum terms and impose similarly severe terms of parole ineligibility, as I am sure will be the case for such crimes as murder, kidnapping and arson, for which no mandatory minimum penalties have been provided. Finally, the Committee may recall that Congressional action was recently required to relieve inequities caused by minimum mandatory penalty provisions in the Harrison Narcotics Act.

Penalties for rioting

Unlike present law, S. 1437 includes a uniform set of offenses for rioting, with increased penalties for riots in the prison setting. With the pension inherent in the prison environment, rioting is extremely serious behavior. The allocation of an entire subchapter of the Code to this type of criminal behavior, and the special penalty provisions for prison rioting, are clearly appropriate. We believe there is a problem, however, with the disparity in penalties provided for an offense under Section 1831, Leading a Riot, and Section 1833, Engaging in a Riot. The former provides for a class D felony penalty for a person who during a riot in a facility used for official detention "urges participation in, leads, or gives commands, instructions, or directions in furtherance of, the riot." The other section provides for only a class A misdemeanor for persons convicted of engaging in a riot in a facility used for official detention. The disparity in penalties (6 years in terms of the maximum term authorized) seems unwarranted, and we would suggest the Committee consider raising the penalty in Section 1833 for engaging in a prison riot to a Class E felony.

Sentencing criteria

Among the criteria which the proposed Code requires the sentencing judge to consider in imposing a sentence is "the need for the sentence imposed to provide the defendant with needed educational or vocational training, medical care, or other correctional treatment in the most effective manner." Section 2003(a)(2)(D). In view of the state of the art of corrections and recent research concerning rehabilitation, we frankly question using this criterion as a basis for imposing a sentence of imprisonment. We can see, however, that it would be an appropriate criterion for the judge to consider in imposing a sentence of probation. It is difficult to imagine a situation where a defendant's educational, vocational or medical needs could be better provided in a prison setting than in the community. And even if, for example, the medical services in the prison were superior to those available to an indigent defendant in the community, the other negative aspects and ramifications of incarceration far outweigh any such advantage.

As I mentioned in the beginning of my testimony, another problem we have with this kind of sentencing criteria is that, at least with respect to vocational, educational and other correctional programming, it is premised on the old "rehabilitative" model. Clearly, the Bureau of Prisons should be statutorily required to provide offenders with medical care, and to make educational, vocational and other correctional programs and services. However, unless the offender's participation is voluntary, the impact of these programs and services, in terms of changing offender behavior patterns for the better, will be minimal. I suggest that the Bill be clarified to indicate that this criterion would be primarily used in connection with imposing a sentence of probation, and that it should not be used as a basis for imposing a term of incarceration. In addition, the Conforming Amendments should include a section indicating that one of the Bureau of Prisons' responsibilities and duties is the provision of educational, vocational, medical and other correctional programs and services to offenders.

Modification of the term of imprisonment or parole ineligibility

Under Section 2302(c), upon motion of the Director of the Bureau of Prisons "for extraordinary and compelling reasons," the court "may reduce an imposed term of imprisonment or term of parole ineligibility to the time that the defendant has served in imprisonment." This provision expands present law, 18 U.S.C. 4205(g), which permits the court, upon motion of the Bureau of Prisons, to make an offender immediately eligible for parole by reducing any minimum term to the time the defendant has served. Based on our experience with requests for motions under 18 U.S.C. 4205(g), we urge the Committee to make it clear in the legislative history that "extraordinary and compelling" criteria refer, in virtually all cases, to circumstances or events which could not have been reasonably foreseen by the court at the time of sentencing. Without such a limitation, these criteria could be construed to include consideration of the appropriateness of the sentence imposed, which would unnecessarily and inappropriately overlap with the appellate review provisions of Chapter 37.

Multiple sentences of imprisonment

Section 2304, Multiple Sentences of Imprisonment, provides that multiple terms of imprisonment run concurrently unless the court orders that the terms are to run consecutively. This codifies the presumption of current sentencing law where a subsequent federal sentence is imposed on an offender presently serving a prior federal sentence. However, the presumption is presently just the reverse when a federal sentence is imposed upon an offender presently serving a state sentence. In this case, if the federal judge remains silent, case law and the application of 18 U.S.C. 3568 dictate that the federal sentence will be computed to run consecutively. We assume that Section 2305(a) continues present law, providing for commencement of a federal sentence in this instance when the defendant is released from state custody and comes into federal custody to serve.

Section 2304(c) provides that the aggregate of consecutive terms of imprisonment to which a defendant may be sentenced may not exceed such term as is authorized by Section 2301 for an offense one grade higher than the most serious offense for which he was found guilty. It is not clear, however, whether this limitation applies only to sentences imposed at the same time, or for any subsequent sentencing situation. Clearly, only the more narrow construction is appropriate. If the limitation is applied to any subsequent sentencing situation offenders who commit a series of crimes for which the maximum penalty is no greater than that for which they are presently incarcerated would achieve a certain degree of unwarranted immunization from possible criminal sanctions. The most they could get in terms of a new prison term is the difference between their present sentence and the maximum penalty for the next grade higher. If the limitation is only intended to apply to sentences imposed at the same time, we are not opposed to this provision, but suggest, for purposes of clarity, that the phrase "at the same time" used on lines 25 and 26 on page 178 in Section 2304(a) be inserted between the words "sentenced" and "may" on line 11 of page 179.

Finally, since the Bureau of Prisons is responsible for the computation of prison terms for federal offenders, we suggest that some minor revision may be needed to clarify the relationship between Section 2304 and the parole eligibility provisions in Section 3831. Our concerns in this area, due to the nature and complexity of sentence computation, could best be resolved through discussions between Bureau of Prisons legal and records management personnel and the Committee staff.

Juveniles

Under S. 1437, the provisions for placing committed juveniles are much more restrictive than present law. Under 18 U.S.C. 5039, "(n)o juvenile committed to the custody of the Attorney General may be placed or retained in an adult jail or correctional institution in which he has regular contact with adults incarcerated because they have been convicted of a crime or are awaiting trial on criminal charges." Under Section 3603(h), however, a juvenile cannot be held "in an official detention facility in which an adult convicted of an offense or awaiting trial on a charge of an offense is held in official detention." At present, we are encountering many difficulties in trying to make state placements for some of the more criminally sophisticated juveniles, particularly those in the 18-21 year old range. Many states simply do not have, or refuse to make available, juvenile facilities for these individuals. If these juveniles cannot be placed in a state facility, and Section 3603(h) will significantly reduce the number of state facilities available, we may be forced to establish one or two Federal juvenile facilities, which means that most of the offenders placed there will be thousands of miles away from their families.

While we offer no specific solutions, we want to take this opportunity to call the Committee's attention to the difficulties we are presently encountering trying to carry out the juvenile commitment provisions of present law which are less restrictive than the provisions in this Bill.

Offenders with mental disease or defect

Chapter 36, Subchapter B replaces current Chapter 313 of Title 18. The new provisions are well drafted, and make several long-needed changes to the present federal competency laws. Most notable is Section 3613, which corrects a serious gap in federal law, providing commitment procedures for those who are acquitted by reason of insanity.

Commitments of the mentally ill under the sections of the Subchapter are to the custody of the Attorney General. The Attorney General is authorized to place the person in a suitable mental hospital for treatment. There is, however, no definition of "a suitable mental hospital."

We would point out that, if there is a presumption that all of these individuals are to be placed in state or private hospitals, this in fact may be extremely difficult. Experience indicates that most state and private hospitals will not accept persons who have criminal charges outstanding. It is true that, on the other hand, placement of these mentally ill persons in Bureau of Prisons facilities raises the constitutional issue of commingling the unconvicted with the convicted.

We believe that those who are convicted, under Sections 3614 and 3615, should be confined in appropriate Bureau of Prisons facilities. Those who are unconvicted, however, should be placed in non-prison hospitals or other suitable facilities, if at all possible.

Included in Section 3611 of the draft legislation is the provision for competency determinations and commitments. Here, the presumption should be that the initial competency determination, for those awaiting trial, should be done using local hospitals and mental health resources if at all possible. We assume that the dropping of the separate commitment provisions, currently in 18 U.S.C. 4244, dictates a local psychiatric examination, which we believe is highly desirable. The psychiatric examination may be conducted by clinical psychologists, as well as certified psychiatrists. We favor this addition of psychologists, with the expertise which has developed in the field of forensic psychology, and with the availability of psychologists in some situations where psychiatrists are hard to find. We do note, however, that Rule 12.2 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, upon which Section 3612 is based, will have to be amended to allow psychological as well as psychiatric testimony.

Section 3611(d) codifies time limitations for incompetency-to-stand-trial commitments. In practice, a 6-month limit has been placed on competency commitments at our Medical Center, before the defendant must be referred back to the committing court to ascertain the possibility of proceeding to trial, or dropping charges and obtaining a civil commitment. We find the 12-month ceiling—no more than 6 months to determine whether the defendant is likely to be restored to competency so that he can be tried, plus 6 months to achieve the restoration to competency or a dismissal of charges—is a reasonable and workable statutory direction. Section 3616 is available for the continued commitment of those few who cannot be restored to competency or civilly committed in their home states, and who pose a continuing and substantial danger to others.

Sections 3614 and 3615 provide hospitalization commitments for offenders, in lieu of any other sentence if raised immediately after conviction (Section 3614), or as a substitute commitment for those already serving a term of imprisonment (Section 3615). The rationale for the alternative commitment of Section 3614 is appealing. Psychiatric difficulties are of course present in the history of many offenders, so some grounds for raising the motion may be present in a majority of cases. This may result in a high volume of defense motions under the section. If this in fact happens, psychiatric examinations, hearings, and commitments will place a new burden on court and mental commitment facilities.

Section 3615 also imposes a new hearing and commitment procedure on the courts and on the Department of Justice. While the rationale is again understandable, the burden it will place on the courts and other systems must be considered. Since we now administratively transfer all sentenced persons who are in need of specialized psychiatric care to appropriate facilities, I question the need for the separate judicial commitment procedures of Section 3615.

Section 3616 sets up a necessary procedure for the continued commitment of those who are due to be released by operation of other statutory provisions, but who should be hospitalized for the protection of the public. As with persons who are acquitted because of insanity, the preferred course is clearly commitment to a mental hospital in the state of residence. If that cannot be arranged, a federal commitment of those who are truly dangerous is established.

I would note that the provisions for periodic reporting to the committing court, in Section 3617(e), are highly desirable, to avoid the prolonged commitment of a forgotten person, which has happened in some systems of mental health commitments. This periodic reporting should ensure ongoing judicial review of the basis for the commitment, and prevent the "forgotten" person.

This concludes my formal statement, Mr. Chairman. I want to emphasize again, however, that I fully endorse this much needed legislative reform. In addition to these comments, we have several other minor suggestions of a technical nature which we will submit to the Committee in the form of a memorandum. I would be pleased to answer any questions you or your colleagues may have.

JUNE 14, 1977.

Memorandum to: Patricia M. Wald, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legislative Affairs.

From: Norman A. Carlson, Director, Bureau of Prisons.

Subject: Suggested technical amendments to S. 1437, the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977.

This memorandum identifies several minor problems in S. 1437 from the standpoint of correctional administration. During my June 8, 1977 testimony on S. 1437, I told the Committee that I would forward my comments on specific provisions in a separate memorandum. If your staff or the Committee have any questions on these comments, or any other correctionally related provisions in the legislation, please feel free to contact us.

The need to define "employee of the Bureau of Prisons"

We would suggest the Committee include in the Code a definition of the phrase "employee of the Bureau of Prisons," which would specify that employees of Federal Prison Industries and the National Institute of Corrections, as well as U.S. Public Health Service personnel detailed to the Bureau of Prisons, are covered by this term. This definition would be helpful in defining the scope of Section 3017, which authorizes Bureau of Prisons employees to carry firearms and make arrests. We believe this definition should be used in lieu of, or in addition to, the phrase "an employee of an official detention facility" which is used as a jurisdictional base in several of the offense provisions in the Code, e.g. §§ 1601(e)(2)(B) and 1611(c)(2)(B). By substituting or including this definition in these jurisdictional provisions, jurisdictional coverage will be extended to our Central and regional offices, similar to the coverage provided for law enforcement officers.

Contraband

The bill should include specific authority for prison officials to seize and forfeit contraband described in section 1314. Recently, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals in Sell v. Parratt (No. 76-1307) invalidated a Nebraska Department of Corrections regulation which provided for the forfeiture of money found in the possession of an inmate. The court held "that an administrative agency has no right without underlying statutory authority to prescribe and enforce forfeitures of property as punitive measures for violations of administrative rules and regulations, and that when an agency does so, it violates the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment."

To prevent, or at least reduce, the flow of contraband in institutions, the Bureau of Prisons needs to be able to seize and forfeit contraband found in Federal prisons. Without statutory forfeiture authority, for example, the Bureau of Prisons may be forced to return confiscated weapons to offenders at the time of their release.

There are civil forfeiture provisions in Subchapter A of Chapter 40 which permit the Attorney General to bring in rem civil proceedings in district courts for the seizure and forfeiture of property used in certain offenses, such as Bribery and Smuggling. Contraband in prison, however, is a pervasive problem, not only the obviously dangerous article such as weapons and drugs, but also contraband which has to be removed, almost daily, from inmate living areas for health and safety reasons. To require civil judicial proceedings such as those set out in Chapter 40 for the forfeiture of prison contraband would be impractical, and would, in effect, prevent enforcement of the contraband statute. We urge the Committee to place the forfeiture authority provision in Subchapter C of Chapter 38, and, if possible, to eliminate, or at least reduce to the bare minimum, any procedural requirements for forfeiture.

Interception of oral or written communications

Section 1521, Eavesdropping, and Section 1524, Intercepting Correspondence, make it a crime to intercept private oral or written communications, without the consent of at least one party to the communication. Consent as defined on page 16 includes "willing assent" but specifically excludes both the consent of individuals unable, by age, mental disease or defect, etc., to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct assented to, or consent given under certain circumstances, such as force or threat. Under present law, the consent of at least one party is needed to intercept external phone conversations without a court order. At many correctional facilities, we have the capacity to monitor internal and external inmate telephone calls. Inmates receive notice of the monitoring practices through published regulations which are placed in law libraries and through institutional regulations which are given to them. Since they are on notice and continue to use the phones, the authority to monitor is based on the inmates' implied consent.

With respect to inmate correspondence, the Supreme Court has recognized the right of correctional officials to read certain kinds of incoming and outgoing inmate mail. Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396 (1974). Under our inmate correspondence regulations, inmates sign a statement indicating that they understand that staff may open and read general correspondence, and that special correspondence (attorney mail, etc.) may be opened only in their presence in order to check for contraband.

While the phone and mail monitoring capabilities are not regularly used, I believe we need to retain the ability to do both, in order to maintain security. If either Section 1521 or Section 1524, on its own, or in conjunction with the definition of "consent," eliminates the authority to monitor, we urge the Committee to consider amending the legislation to preserve present authority.

Under present correspondence regulations, all incoming mail is checked for contraband, a procedure which on occasion has detected weapons and drugs. If we were required to seek a court order each time we needed to inspect mail and packages, our ability to prevent the introduction of contraband would be severely restricted. The knowledge that incoming material may be inspected deters individuals from mailing contraband articles. Elimination of the search mechanism would undoubtedly lead to the introduction of additional dangerous items into the institutions.

Probation

Section 2103(11) continues the split-sentencing authority of present law (18 U.S.C. 3651), but Section 2101(a)(3) cuts back on present judicial sentencing options because it prohibits a court from imposing a sentence of probation for conviction of one count of a multi-count conviction, if imprisonment is imposed on another count. It should be noted that the present split-sentencing statute was passed to give courts the same sentencing flexibility for a single count conviction which they enjoyed for multi-count convictions.

Section 2103(b)(12) which provides that the defendant may be required to "reside at, or participate in the program of, a community treatment facility for all or part of the term of probation" also continues present law but omits the present requirement that the Attorney General first certify that such facilities are available. This certification authority, although probably more appropriately placed with the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, should be continued to insure that adequate and appropriate facilities are available to carry out the sentencing intent provided in this section.

Interstate agreement on detainers

Section 3201(a) is new and provides that when the Federal Government is the requesting party, the production of an offender can only be by writ, and not pursuant to the Agreement. This is no change in practice, as the U.S. Attorneys Office almost invariably uses the writ and not the Agreement to produce a state offender. The purpose of the change in the law is to avoid certain restrictions in the Agreement which some court decisions have grafted on productions by writ: e.g., under the Agreement the state can say "no" to the production, if the offender objects; the offender can't be returned to the original place of confinement until the prosecution is fully completed, under all stages.

While we have some hesitation about adopting only part of a uniform agreement, we think it is probably appropriate, for two reasons: first, the Federal Government is not just another party to the agreement. Under the Supremacy clause, the Federal Government can compel production pursuant to the writ. Second, it was not the intent of Congress in originally adopting the Agreement to limit the Government's right to compel production. The Agreement was adopted not because the Federal Government needed it, but to assist states in facilitating production of offenders for prosecution purposes.

Transportation of certain unsentenced prisoners or witnesses

Section 3512, Discharge of an Arrested but Unconvicted Person, provides that the Director of the Bureau of Prisons will promulgate regulations concerning the transportation by the U.S. Marshals of certain unsentenced prisoners or witnesses who have been released from official detention. Since this function can be performed by several different divisions of the Department, the responsibility for promulgating these regulations should be vested in the Attorney General.

Gratuities for released prisoners

S. 1437 deletes the Attorney General's authority under present law (18 U.S.C. 4284) to provide loans of up to $150 to offenders at the time of their release. On the other hand, Section 3824(d) (2) increases the amount which an offender can be given as a gratuity at the time of his release from $100 (18 U.S.C. 4281) to $500. We support these changes. Experience has shown that lending offenders money at the time of their release often has negative side effects for both the offender and the U.S. Probation Officer who is responsible for monitoring the offender's repayment of the loan. Offenders are already facing many uncertainties and difficulties in trying to cope with the problem of community reintegration, and they do not need the added burden of a monetary debt to the Federal government. Probation Officers, on the other hand, are forced to play the role of debt collector, and understandably feel that it interferes with their efforts to aid the offender in his community reintegration. Our experience with collection of loan payments was very unfavorable.

The statute also imposes a $200 floor on offender gratuities, "unless the Director determines that the financial position of the offender is such that no sum should be furnished." Requiring a $200 minimum gratuity may unnecessarily restrict our flexibility in providing funds to offenders in need of financial assistance at the time of their release. For example, it would prevent us from providing financial assistance in certain borderline cases where an offender needs some money but not $200. This minimum requirement could also create problems when we encounter year-end financial shortages and we want to give every needy offender some financial aid at the time of his release, but we don't have sufficient funds to give each $200. I would recommend elimination of the $200 floor.

Application of the Administrative Procedure Act

Section 3825, Inapplicability of the Administrative Procedure Act, exempts "any determination, decision, or order" made under Subchapter C (Imprisonment) of Chapter 38 from the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act. This exemption is both appropriate and essential to the operations of the Bureau of Prisons, and reflects the present caselaw, Clardy v. Levi, 545 F. 2d 1241 (1976). We are concerned, however, that by limiting the exemption to determinations, decisions, or orders made under Subchapter C of Chapter 38, inmate disciplinary proceedings, as well as certain other correctional procedures and proceedings which are currently exempt, are not covered. Clearly inmate disciplinary proceedings, which were the subject of the Ninth Circuit's opinion in Clardy, should not be covered by the Administrative Procedure Act. If an express exemption were not provided for inmate disciplinary proceedings, the Code could be construed as overruling Clardy, thereby imposing legislatively what the Supreme Court recently recognized as hazardous in the prison disciplinary setting, attorney representation and cross-examination and confrontation of adverse witnesses. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974) and Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976).

We assume that the authority of the Bureau of Prisons relating to inmate discipline will be covered in Title 28 in the Conforming Amendments, and we urge the Committee to include similar exemptions to at least continue the holding in Clardy.

Study reports prepared by the Bureau of Prisons for the courts and the Parole Commission

Section 2002(b) and Section 3832, respectively, require the Bureau of Prisons to prepare studies on offenders for the sentencing court and the Parole Commission. The information to be covered by the reports is identical in both statutes, and, we believe, unnecessarily specific. For example, at least one of the criteria listed in Section 3832(a), the availability of rehabilitative resources or programs, is not a significant factor under the present guidelines of the U.S. Parole Commission. A more flexible, and certainly more responsive, approach would be to delete any reference to specific kinds of information and require instead that the Director of the Bureau of Prisons issue guidelines, after consulting with the U.S. Sentencing Commission, for preparation of such studies. This consultation requirement will ensure that the Bureau of Prisons will always be providing the information needed by the Parole Commission and the Sentencing Commission which issues the controlling guidelines for both sentencing and parole.

JUNE 24, 1977.

HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,

DEAR SENATOR McCLELLAN: After testifying on June 8, 1977 in support of S. 1437, the Criminal Code Revision bill, I have carefully followed the subsequent testimony on this legislation, particularly as it relates to correctional issues. One concern of several witnesses has been the application of the Administrative Procedure Act, the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act to the Bureau of Prisons. Witnesses representing the National Prison Project and the National Moratorium on Prison Construction, for example, expressed concern that S. 1437 exempts the Bureau of Prisons from all three of these Acts. Section 3825 provides that "the provisions of 5 U.S.C. 551 through 559, and 701 through 706, do not apply to the making of any determination, decision, or order under" subchapter C of Chapter 38. The provisions of Chapter 38 Subchapter C, however, have nothing to do with the Bureau of Prisons rulemaking and record keeping authority and responsibility. The provisions relating to those areas would appear in Title 28 of the United States Code, as part of the Conforming Amendments to S. 1437 which have not yet been published. It is our understanding that the Conforming Amendments will continue present law: the Bureau of Prisons will not only promulgate its rules in accordance with section 553 of the Administrative Procedure Act, but also will comply with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act. We fully support that approach and expect to continue to carry out our responsibilities under these Acts.

I am concerned, however, about the allegations of several witnesses that present law requires the Bureau of Prisons to comply with all the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act. As mentioned above, the rulemaking requirements of section 553 of Title 5 do apply, but current caselaw clearly exempts the Bureau of Prisons from the adjudicatory provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act. Clardy v. Levi, 545 F. 2d 1241 (1976). As the Ninth Circuit observed in Clardy, "(t)he plain and simple fact is that the APA was not written with the problems of prison discipline in mind. The safeguards erected therein when applied comprehensively will unduly inhibit prison management." As noted in the memorandum which I submitted to the Subcommittee to supplement my testimony, if an express exemption from the APA were not provided for inmate disciplinary proceedings, the Code could be construed as overruling Clardy, thereby imposing legislatively what the Supreme Court recently recognized as hazardous in the prison disciplinary setting, attorney representation and cross-examination and confrontation of adverse witnesses. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974) and Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976).

Sincerely,

NORMAN A. CARLSON,
Director.

Senator HATCH. I do have a couple of questions.

You touched on this subject, but I would like to ask you this directly.

If sentencing using the judicial guidelines approach as provided in S. 1437 is adopted, do you think it is necessary or desirable to continue the availability of early release on parole?

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a need for a guideline system somewhere in the process, be it at the parole stage or, as the bill proposes, at the sentencing stage.

I do not, however, think there is need for guidelines to be used twice in the system. In other words, I think if you shift the guideline approach from the parole stage to the sentencing stage you probably could eliminate the concept of parole as we know it.

Senator HATCH. If the early release function of the Parole Commission were abolished, do you feel, as the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, that the provision now in the bill for a possible release during at least the last one-tenth of a prisoner's sentence is sufficient motivation for institutional discipline?

Mr. CARLSON. Yes, I do, Mr. Chairman.

There are a number of other inducements that we have available as a result of the statutory provisions of this bill. I think the one-tenth provision is adequate to provide the flexibility needed to maintain control and supervision in prison institutions.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your testimony. Thank you for coming.

Mr. CARLSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Mr. Pierce O'Donnell, attorney at law, Washington, D.C.

Mr. O'Donnell, we are happy to welcome you here today.

STATEMENT OF PIERCE O'DONNELL, ATTORNEY AT LAW, WASHINGTON, D.C., ACCOMPANIED BY MICHAEL J. CHURGIN AND DENNIS E. CURTIS

Mr. O'DONNELL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am an attorney here in Washington, D.C. My immediate background is service as a law clerk for Supreme Court Justice Byron White and a teaching fellow at the Yale Law School, where I met the two gentlemen on either side of me.

On my right is Mr. Michael Churgin, who is a professor of law at the University of Texas at Austin. On my left is Mr. Dennis Curtis, who serves as the director of clinical studies on the faculty of the Yale Law School. We met in New Haven in 1974 and embarked on this joint venture we will talk about today.

Senator HATCH [acting chairman]. As I understand it, you gentlemen are the authors of this book "Toward A Just and Effective Sentencing System." I understand the book is being released today.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Yes, sir.

Senator HATCH. I want to congratulate you for the efforts that you have put forth in trying to assist in this very serious and very important area of criminal justice.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I will summarize our prepared statement this morning.

You are indeed involved in a historic undertaking. This subcommittee has before it the rich fruits of more than a decade's effort to revamp the Federal criminal code.

The Federal criminal laws today are, regretfully, a hodgepodge of statutes and procedures. They are a chaotic patchwork of penalties authorized by individual congressional enactments passed at different times with no apparent relationship to one another and establishing a bizarre range of penalties for an enormous variety of criminal offenses.

The subcommittee has the benefit of the combined product of the recommendations of the Brown Commission and the draft of S. 1 introduced by Chairman McClellan, Senator Hruska, and others in the 94th Congress.

Professors Churgin, Curtis, and I are pleased to place before the subcommittee today the results of a 3-year study of the entire Federal criminal sentencing, probation, parole, and correctional systems.

As you indicated, Mr. Chairman, this book is entitled "Toward A Just and Effective Sentencing System: Agenda for Legislative Reform," and is being released today by Praeger Publishers.

In 1974, the Yale Law School sponsored this undertaking, and the Daniel and Florence Guggenheim Foundation graciously funded it. It was a clinical workshop to investigate comprehensive reform of the Federal sentencing and parole processes. We had representatives from a broad spectrum of disciplines, including two Federal judges, probation officers, the Chairman of the United States Parole Commission, correctional officials, a representative from the United States Department of Justice, Federal inmates, the Bureau of Prisons, and Yale faculty and students.

Out of these deliberations came the recommendations set forth in our book and the proposed Federal sentencing statute.

I would like to summarize our recommendations. First of all, we recommend the outright abolition of parole.

Second, we recommend a determinate or flat sentencing system.

We recommend the establishment of a Federal sentencing commission to prescribe sentencing guidelines to insure that like offenders are treated similarly.

We recommend a requirement that Federal judges give reasons for sentences.

We recommend appellate scrutiny of sentences.

We recommend a 50-percent reduction in maximum prison sentences for all but the most serious offenses.

We recommend the elimination of mandatory minimum sentences.

We recommend a statutory presumption against imprisonment and the greater use of probation and fines.

We urge a severe limitation on the use of rehabilitation as a basis for punishment.

The earlier working draft of our study in 1975 had an influence on Senator Kennedy and others in the drafting of the sentencing guidelines bill introduced as S. 2699. We are also gratified to see that a number of our recommendations for substantial modifications of S. 1 have already been incorporated in S. 1437.

In the time allotted, we will highlight for the subcommittee the major findings of our study and our conclusions about the indispensable features for any rational, just, and effective sentencing system and the extent to which your proposed legislation, S. 1437, in our view, measures up to these standards.

Mr. Chairman, for too long now, legislators, judges, and practitioners have ignored the postconviction justice process. The convicted defendant is too often warehoused with little ceremony and usually even less thought in jails and prisons in the farflung corners of this country.

Our prisons and jails are overcrowded.

The long-neglected Federal and State sentencing systems are a national disgrace.

Discretion—unexposed, unbridled, and unreviewable discretion—has long been the hallmark of sentencing and parole decisionmaking. With very few exceptions, judges and parole authorities can be confident that no other body will review their decisions, much less know how their determinations were made. This has truly been a “lawless” system. As Judge Frankel lamented in his pioneering book:

All of the valuable research in the sentencing field, as well as our study group’s own independent investigation, leads inexorably to two major conclusions about our correctional and sentencing process: The system does not work, and it is grossly unfair.

It does not work in the sense that it does not succeed in either reducing crime or in changing the proclivities of those who engage in criminal activity.

It is unfair because it lacks standards to prevent, or at least to minimize, arbitrary treatment at the hands of judges, corrections officials, and parole and probation authorities.

In the Federal system, and in virtually every State and the District of Columbia, judges who sentence criminal offenders do so virtually without any legal guidance or control. One judge can determine conclusively, decisively, and finally the period of time a citizen can be imprisoned without being subject to any review. This exercise of power goes unchecked despite the fact that a citizen may be sentenced to imprisonment for 10, 20, or 30 years.

Mr. Chairman, the fault lies not wholly with the judiciary. Some of the responsibility rests with Congress. The national legislature has abdicated its responsibility to delineate the goals of our sentencing system. Likewise, no meaningful standards have been prescribed.

With no congressional direction, judges have been left to themselves to develop sentencing philosophies. Sadly enough, too many of our judges have no sentencing goals in mind when they pass judgment on the convicted. Still others, Mr. Chairman, sentence on the basis of fears and prejudice, which we trust everyone here today would consider wrong and impermissible.

There are still other critical shortcomings.

Unless the judge advertises his errors, biases, and prejudices, no one will ever know. Not even the most fundamental requirements of due process of law apply at sentencing. A defendant who otherwise would be entitled to a statement of reasons from a government agency terminating welfare benefits, or evicting him from a public housing project, or suspending his driver’s license is not entitled to know why he received a particular sentence—even when that sentence may restrict one-half or more of his remaining life.

Nor is there any appeal from this exercise of raw discretion. A convicted defendant cannot appeal his sentence on the very straightforward ground that it is too severe, so long as the sentence lies within the usually wide range of penalties authorized by the criminal code. Nor can the U.S. attorney appeal what he believes to be an imprudently lenient sentence.

In the parole system, we have the same replication of no legislative guidance. Indeed, this situation may be even more intolerable. The U.S. Parole Commission annually engages in more sentencing than all Federal judges combined. Last year alone, the Federal parole system made approximately 25,000 parole decisions.

Under existing Federal law, the true sentencer is the Parole Commission. It is the commission that invariably sets the amount of time a person will serve behind bars.

Mr. Chariman, decades upon decades of legislative indifference, judicial neglect, and administrative uncertainty have taken their toll. We must report to you that our study at the Yale Law School has concluded that the present state of affairs in sentencing is a national scandal.

No aspect of criminal law reform is more deserving of this subcommittee's attention. Nor does any other area hold out the promise of as rich a return on the investment of time and energy. We have reached a point where more of the resources of the criminal justice system must be devoted to the process by which we punish those who violate our laws. Indeed, in the entire United States today, there are well over a quarter of a million men, women, and youth in prisons and jails. In the Federal system alone, I believe we are approaching 29,000.

The long-festering problems of our sentencing system, we believe, are best dramatized by the shocking statistics concerning sentencing disparity, which are set forth in our book.

A natural—indeed, an inevitable—byproduct of this “nonsystem” of sentencing is that similar offenders in the United States guilty of similar crimes commonly receive grossly disparate sentence. To a large extent, sentencing in the Federal system is a judicial lottery, a game of Russian roulette. In perhaps no other corner of the criminal justice map is it truer that the quality of justice is a function of the luck of the draw.

The most conspicuous and disconcerting disparity, Mr. Chairman, occurs when one person receives a prison sentence and another person committing the same crime and similar in virtually all respects is placed on probation.

Substantial disparities in sentencing are the inevitable result of judicial discretion exercised by almost 400 Federal district judges, district judges who are unfettered by legislatively established criteria and not subject to the uniform requirements of procedural regularity and prescribed criteria which appellate review lends to almost every other area of our Federal law.

Nor must we overlook the perception of prison inmates, whom we can consider the “consumers” of our system. Prisoners believe—and our research substantiates—that their sentences are often imposed in a random and unjust way under a tyrannical system sanctioned by law.

As Norman Carlson's prepared statement indicates, this well-founded attitude undermines effective corrections administration.

As we point out in our statement, Mr. Chairman, there are many other harmful, and at times corrupting, consequences from our present sentencing system.

We can witness "judge-shopping," lawyers scrambling from one courtroom to the next to get the most lenient judge.

There can also be a lack of candor on the part of sentencing judges for fear that they might be reversed.

We have Federal judges and then the Parole Commission which acts upon those sentences, neither having any guidance, neither often knowing what the other did, working at cross purposes in a vast sea of ignorance.

This has caused mounting public dissatisfaction with the American sentencing system despite the fact that sentences imposed in this country, as well as the actual terms served, are far longer than those in other Western countries.

Our study concludes that, in devising a rational sentencing reform strategy, the subcommittee should be guided by the tandem objectives of fairness and effectiveness. Sentencing legislation should provide a procedural framework that will encourage a just and effective sentencing system. In a broad sense, this can be done by requiring judges to explain and justify the sentence, by supplanting the parole system with a determinant sentencing system, by establishing a Federal sentencing commission which promulgates guidelines, and by providing for appellate review of sentences.

We urge you to scrap the present sentencing system and to begin anew.

You are to be congratulated on the bill before you. S. 1437 shows that you have made an impressive start in the right direction.

We would make these recommendations briefly.

Congress must clearly delineate the goals and purposes of the sentencing system.

You asked earlier, Mr. Chairman, about rehabilitation. I think we should make known our views on that.

We have strong reservations about the medical model, about coercive behavioral change and incarceration for rehabilitative purposes. The Yale study concludes, however, that we should not abandon all inprison rehabilitation programs.

Some programs of limited scope and with adequate funding might have some measurable effect upon recidivism. We recommend, however, that no one should be sentenced to prison for the purpose of rehabilitation unless there have been several findings made, including one that there can be no hope of achieving the same rehabilitative results through a sentence not involving imprisonment.

If the court concludes that imprisonment must be imposed, no one should be sentenced to a prison for any period of time longer than 24 months for the purpose of rehabilitation.

Congress must also allocate responsibilities for the various sentencing goals and functions. The present statute continues much of the overlapping jurisdiction. This, however, would be solved in a major way if parole were abolished—a matter which I will address in a moment.

S. 1437 is landmark legislation because it insists on many procedural guarantees of fairness, access to sentencing information, a statement of reasons for sentence, and appellate review—not to mention guidelines.

We urge passage of these provisions.

In our prepared statement, we have noted for the subcommittee a number of changes that we would like to see in S. 1437. In private discussions with the staff we have also suggested changes of a technical nature.

I would, however, like to urge one thing in the public testimony.

For too many judges today, imprisonment of an offender has become a habit. We suggest that a sentence of imprisonment should be a sentence of last resort. We suggest that you incorporate an explicit presumption against incarceration or, at the very least, a presumption in favor of the least drastic sanctions.

Your probation provisions are excellent. However, we oppose the exclusion of class A felons and certain drug and weapons offenders because our study concluded that mandatory minimum sentence offend basic principles of a just and effective sentencing system.

Parole should be abolished. This is our most urgent and important recommendation.

The best research indicates that parole has failed. The best empirical studies show that there is a greater deterrent effect from certainty and not the severity of punishment. Inmates in prison today enter in an agonizing holding pattern, waiting for faraway parole commissioners or hearing examiners that visit them in prison to determine that magic moment when, for whatever reason, they are to be released from prison.

Parole should be replaced by a determinate sentencing system. The sentencing court, at the time of sentencing, should set the amount of time to be served. At that point, the defendant would know how much time he would be in prison. Maine, Illinois, and California have adopted this type of legislation.

Finally, we urge substantial reduction of prison terms because, with the abolition of parole, there would not be that one-half leveling effect in the amount of time served now afforded by parole.

Mr. Chairman, the sentencing provisions of S. 1437 represent a dramatic improvement over existing law. S. 1437 reflects your faith that a just sentencing system can be effective in prompting respect for law, deterring crime, rehabilitating some types of offenders, and incapacitating serious offenders.

The prospect of this far-reaching legislation being enacted in this Congress is, to those of us who have pressed such reforms, a very heartening prospect.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate the testimony that you have given here today. Your statement will be placed in the record, without objection.

STATEMENT OF PIERCE O'DONNELL, MICHAEL J. CHURGIN, DENNIS E. CURTIS

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I am Pierce O'Donnell, an attorney practicing law here in the District of Columbia. With me today are Michael Churgin, who is assistant professor of law at the University of Texas at Austin, and Dennis Curtis, who serves as Director of Clinical Studies on the faculty of the Yale Law School. We are delighted to appear before this distinguished Subcommittee to testify about the sentencing provisions of S. 1437—the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977.

You are engaged in a great—indeed, an historic—undertaking. This Subcommittee has before it the rich fruits of more than a decade's effort to revamp the federal criminal code. The federal criminal laws are a hodgepodge of statutes and procedures. They are a chaotic patchwork of penalties authorized by individual congressional enactments, passed at different times with no apparent relationship to one another and establishing a bizarre range of penalties for an enormous variety of criminal offenses.

The subcommittee has the benefit of the combined product of the recommendations of the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws—the Brown Commission—and the draft of S. 1 introduced by the Chairman, Senator Hruska, and others in the 94th Congress. The bill now under consideration, S. 1437, also reflects what Senator Kennedy has called "a quiet but constructive debate . . . over the issue of comprehensive criminal sentencing reform [among] judges, lawyers, corrections officials, law enforcement officers, members of the academic community and others."

THE YALE LAW SCHOOL SENTENCING AND PAROLE STUDY

Professors Churgin and Curtis and I are pleased to place before the Subcommittee the results of a three-year study of the entire federal criminal sentencing, probation, parole and correctional systems. This book, entitled "Toward A Just and Effective Sentencing System: Agenda for Legislative Reform," is being released today by Praeger Publishers in New York and London.

In 1974 the Yale Law School sponsored, and the Daniel and Florence Guggenheim Foundation financed, a clinical workshop to investigate comprehensive reform of the federal sentencing and parole processes. The study group was designed to enable scholars and students to meet with experienced professionals in the field of sentencing, probation, parole and corrections. Together we explored the long-neglected problems in these areas.

Participants in the monthly meetings of the workshop included two federal judges, probation officers, the Chairman of the United States Parole Commission, correctional officials, a representative from the United States Department of Justice, federal inmates, prison legal services attorneys and Yale Law School faculty and students.

The roster of panel members reads like a "Who's Who in American Corrections." It includes Judge Marvin E. Frankel of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, who is one of our most distinguished federal jurists and a pioneer in sentencing reform; Judge Jon O. Newman of the United States District Court for Connecticut, who has written numerous groundbreaking opinions on sentencing and parole; Maurice H. Sigler, who is the recently retired Chairman of the U.S. Parole Commission; and Ron Gainor, who is the former Chief of the Legislative Section and now serves as Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Office for Improvements in the Administration of Justice in the Department of Justice.

Out of these deliberations of the Workshop on Parole and Sentencing came the findings and recommendations set forth in our book. The most significant result of the study group's intensive efforts is the proposed federal sentencing statute contained in Appendix A of "Toward A Just and Effective Sentencing System." This legislation, which was originally drafted in the form of amendments to the sentencing provisions of S. 1, lays down a detailed blueprint for the wholesale reform of the present antiquated system by which we punish criminal offenders.

On the basis of an early working draft of our study, Senators Kennedy and McClellan introduced in November 1975, S. 2699, entitled "The Sentencing Guidelines Bill". Similar legislation (S. 181) has been reintroduced in this Congress.

We are gratified to see that a number of our recommendations for substantial modifications of S. 1 have already been incorporated in S. 1437. These include a statement of reasons for the sentence imposed, sentencing guidelines, a federal sentencing commission, and appellate review of sentences. We know that the Subcommittee has toiled long and hard in the sentencing vineyard. We particularly acknowledge the outstanding leadership efforts of the Chairman and Senator Kennedy to devise a rational sentencing system.

In the time allotted, we will highlight for the Subcommittee the major findings in our study. We will also outline our conclusions about the indispensable features for any rational, just and effective sentencing system and the extent to which S. 1437 measures up to these standards. In discussions with the Subcommittee staff, we have recommended additional changes in S. 1437 that are of a more technical nature.

A SYSTEM IN DISGRACE

For too long now legislators, judges, and practitioners have ignored the postconviction justice process. The convicted defendant is too often warehoused with little ceremony and usually even less thought in jails and prisons in the far-flung corners of this country.

To the legislator, sentencing has historically been viewed as a judicial responsibility.

To the judge, sentencing is reputed to be the most difficult and agonizing part of his job. It is too often a chore to be passed along to the parole board and correctional administrators, since they purportedly possess the experience and expertise to determine that "magic moment" when an offender has been rehabilitated and is ready for release into the community.

And to the lawyer, too often the overloaded or indifferent court-appointed advocate, sentencing is a part of the process to be tolerated—a perfunctory proceeding alien to the customary practice of the courtroom lawyer's craft.

The long-neglected federal and state sentencing systems are a disgrace.

A LAWLESS SYSTEM

Discretion—unexposed, unbridled and unreviewable discretion—has long been the hallmark of sentencing and parole decisionmaking. With very few exceptions, judges and paroling authorities can be confident that no other body will review their decisions, much less know how their determinations were made. This truly has been a "lawless" system. As Judge Frankel has lamented: "[t]he almost wholly unchecked and sweeping powers we give to judges in the fashioning of sentences are terrifying and intolerable for a society that professes devotion to the rule of law."

All of the valuable research in the field, as well as our study group's independent investigation, leads inexorably to two major conclusions about our postconviction "correctional" process: the system does not work and it is grossly unfair.

It does not work in the sense that it does not succeed in either reducing crime or in changing the proclivities of those who engage in criminal activity.

It is unfair because it lacks standards to prevent, or at least to minimize, arbitrary treatment at the hands of judges, corrections officials and parole and probation authorities.

In the federal system and in virtually every state and the District of Columbia, judges who sentence criminal offenders do so virtually without legal guidance or control. One judge can determine conclusively, decisively and finally the period of time a citizen could be imprisoned without being subject to any review. This exercise of power goes unchecked despite the fact that a citizen may be sentenced to imprisonment for 10, 20, or 30 years.

The fault lies not with the judiciary but with Congress. The national legislature has abdicated its responsibility to delineate the goals of our sentencing system. Likewise, meaningful legislative standards for trial judges exercising initial sentencing discretion are non-existent. The only legislative guidance as to whether an offender receives probation or is imprisoned is whether "the ends of justice and the best interests of the public as well as the defendant will be served thereby." (18 U.S.C. § 3651).

With no congressional direction, judges have been left to themselves to develop sentencing philosophies. Sadly enough, too many of our judges have no sentencing goals in mind when they pass judgment on the convicted. Still others sentence on the basis of fears and prejudices which we trust everyone here today would agree are wrong and impermissible.

NO REASONS, REVIEW OR RATIONALITY

This brings us to another critical shortcoming in our sentencing system. Unless the judge advertises his errors, biases, and prejudices, no one will ever know. Under current practices, the public, the defendant, and the government have no way of discovering the basis for a sentence.

Not even the most fundamental requirements of due process of law apply at sentencing. A defendant who would be entitled to a statement of reasons from a government agency terminating his welfare benefits, or evicting him from public housing, or suspending his driver's license is not entitled to know why he received a particular sentence—even when that sentence may restrict one-half or more of his remaining life.

Nor is there any appeal from the discretion of the sentencing judge or any procedure to correct sentencing abuses. In its affirmance of the death penalty in the Rosenberg espionage case over a quarter century ago, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit summed up the state of the law:

"If there is one rule in the federal criminal practice which is firmly established, it is that the appellate court has no control over a sentence which is within the limits allowed by a statute." Only a few years ago, the Supreme Court echoed this maxim.

Consequently, a convicted defendant cannot appeal his sentence on the straightforward ground that it is too severe, so long as the sentence is within the usually wide range of penalties authorized by the federal criminal code. Nor can the government appeal what it believes to be an imprudently lenient sentence.

THE FAILURE OF THE PAROLE SYSTEM

The lack of legislative guidance for sentencing judges is replicated in the parole system. Indeed, this situation may be even more intolerable: the U.S. Parole Commission annually engages in more sentencing than all federal judges combined. Last year alone, the federal parole system made over 25,000 parole release decisions. Under existing federal law, it invariably becomes the Parole Commission's responsibility to determine how much of an inmate's sentence will be served behind bars.

Unfortunately, the Parole Commission performs its sentencing task with as meager direction from Congress as judges. Under 18 U.S.C. § 4206(a), an inmate may be paroled if his "release would not depreciate the seriousness of his offense or promote disrespect for law" and his "release would not jeopardize the public welfare." Without any meaningful standards to guide its exercise of broad discretion and without a statement of reasons from the sentencing judge to shed light on what the court expected to accomplish, the Parole Commission is given an impossible task to decide in a vacuum: how much of the sentence imposed (often zero to 5 or 10 years) should actually be served.

Working in close cooperation with the Congress, the Parole Commission sought to remedy this situation by imposing upon itself a system of guidelines for decisionmaking. Using a table based on nine characteristics of the offender and a classification of the severity of the offense, the Commission devised a set of guidelines for the time to be served before release. The Parole Commission's guidelines—and the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act of 1976 which codified these administrative reforms—had two laudable objectives: (1) to treat like offenders who committed similar crimes as equally as possible; and (2) to moderate at least to some extent the sentencing disparities resulting from a lack of a national sentencing policy.

By all objective standards, however, these reforms in the federal parole system must be judged a failure. In fact, they were doomed from the outset. The Parole Commission's attempts at sentencing reform have three serious inherent limitations.

First, the Parole Commission lacks control over the most important sentencing decision of all—whether or not to incarcerate.

Second, the Parole Commission must operate within the framework of the judge's original sentencing decision.

Third, the parole release guidelines neither articulate a comprehensive sentencing policy nor give the inmate comprehensible reasons for denial of parole. Therefore, the fundamental weaknesses in the overall sentencing system persist.

A NATIONAL SCANDAL

Decades upon decades of legislative indifference, judicial neglect and administrative uncertainty have taken their toll.

The present state of affairs in sentencing is a national scandal.

No aspect of criminal law reform is more deserving of this Subcommittee's attention. Nor does any other area hold out the promise of as rich a return on the investment of time and energy. We have reached a point where more of the resources of the criminal justice system must be devoted to the process by which we punish those who violate our laws.

SENTENCING DISPARITY

The long-festering problems of our sentencing system are perhaps best dramatized by the shocking statistics concerning sentencing disparity that we have discovered.

A natural—indeed, an inevitable—byproduct of this “nonsystem” is that similar offenders in the United States guilty of similar crimes commonly receive grossly disparate sentences. To a large extent, sentencing in the federal system is a judicial lottery, a game of Russian roulette. In perhaps no other corner of the criminal justice map is it truer that the quality of justice is a function of the luck of the draw.

Almost 40 years ago United States Attorney General and later Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson issued an indictment of the sentencing process that still rings true today.

“It is obviously repugnant to one's sense of justice that the judgment meted out to an offender should be dependent in large part on a purely fortuitous circumstance; namely the personality of the particular judge before whom the case happens to come for disposition.”

As part of our study, we evaluated the latest available sentencing statistics compiled by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. For fiscal year 1972, we found widespread sentencing disparity. Table I from our book depicts the average length of sentence imposed for six offenses: homicide and assault, robbery, burglary, larceny, auto theft, and forgery and counterfeiting. In each of the 11 federal judicial circuits, we selected the two districts that sentenced the greatest number of offenders for the selected offenses.

A few representative examples dramatize the disparity.

Offenders found guilty of robbery received an average sentence of 39 months in the Northern District of New York. The average in the nearby Eastern District of New York, however, was 130 months.

Elsewhere the average sentence for robbery ranged from 60 months in Montana to 240 months in the Northern District of West Virginia.

Violation of federal forgery and counterfeiting laws drew an average sentence of 12 months in the Northern District of New York. This compares with 49 months in the Eastern District of New York and 67 months in the District of Columbia.

The most conspicuous and disconcerting disparity occurs when one person receives a prison sentence and another person—who commits the same crime and is similar in virtually all respects—receives probation. Table 2 from our book illustrates the substantial variation among federal district courts as to the percentage of offenders convicted of the same offense receiving probation in fiscal year 1972.

Again, a few example point up the magnitude of the problem.

While 100 percent of offenders convicted of homicide and assault in the Northern District of New York received probation, none of their counterparts in Western District of Missouri, were put on probation.

Probation was the preferred sentence for only 17 percent of the convicted forgers and counterfeiters in the Eastern District of Kentucky, while it was used in 79 percent of the cases involving the same offenses in the Central District of California.

JUDICIAL INCONSISTENCY

The possibility that such extremes can be attributed to an acute individualization of justice in sentencing—and not to the standardless exercise of discretion or judicial inconsistency—is largely disproved by self-studies conducted by the judges in several federal judicial circuits.

At one midwestern sentencing workshop, federal judges were given identical pre-sentence reports of five defendants and asked to pronounce sentence. The results are enlightening. One convict, who was an income tax evader, was fined by three of the judges, released on probation by 23 judges and imprisoned by 23 others for times spanning one to five years.

A car thief was released on probation by 43 judges. Six of their colleagues, however, decided to commit the same defendant under the Youth Corrections Act.

The most pronounced disparity was visited on a bank robber. Twenty-eight judges recommended diagnostic treatment, 14 judges imposed straight sentences ranging up to 20 years, six recommended indeterminate sentences for maximum periods ranging from 5 to 20 years, and three recommended probation with psychiatric care.

A more recent experimental study of sentencing disparity by 50 federal judges in the Second Circuit (New York, Connecticut, and Vermont) dramatically confirms the existence of substantial differences in sentencing treatment of the same defendants by different judges. As Table 3 from our book shows, the study required that all 50 judges impose sentence on 20 different defendants charged with different federal offenses selected to represent the sentencing business of the circuit. Each judge was furnished with the same representative pre-sentence report prepared for each hypothetical offender.

The results of this study put to rest any notion that sentencing disparity is a minor problem or a small price to pay for our commitment to individualized treatment of offenders.

A wide range of disagreement existed among the 50 judges about the appropriate sentences. The study concludes that "the pattern displayed is not one of substantial consensus with a few sentences falling outside the area of agreement. Rather, . . . absence of consensus is the norm."

Despite the impact of parole in decreasing time served on a sentence, the substantial disparity of sentences imposed shown in Table 3 would carry over to disparity in time actually served.

As to the critical threshold decision whether to place a defendant on probation or to imprison, the judges disagreed in a staggering 16 out of 20 cases.

Considerable disparity also existed in the lengths of probation terms and amounts of fines.

The distribution of the sentences bore no relationship to the length of a judge's service. No evidence was found that experience on the federal bench tends to bring judges closer together in their sentences.

Substantial disparity exists within districts—for example, among judges sitting in Brooklyn—as well as among all judges in the Second Circuit.

Substantial disparities are the inevitable result of judicial discretion exercised by almost 400 federal district judges, unfettered by legislatively established criteria and not subject to the uniform requirements of procedural regularity and prescribed substantive criteria which appellate review lends to almost every other area of the law.

ADVERSE IMPACT ON CORRECTIONS

We must not overlook the perception of inmates—"consumers" of the system. Prisoners believe—and our research substantiates—that their sentences have been imposed in a random and unjust way, under a tyrannical system sanctioned by law. As Norman Carlson testified earlier today, this well-founded attitude undermines effective corrections administration. James V. Bennett, another progressive, reform-minded Director of the United States Bureau of Prisons, stated over a decade ago:

"The prisoner who must serve his excessively long sentence with other prisoners who receive relatively mild sentences under the same circumstances cannot be expected to accept his situation with equanimity. And the more fortunate prisoners do not attribute their luck to a sense of fairness and justice on the part of the law but to its whimsies. The existence of such disparities is among the major causes of prison riots, and it is one of the reasons why prison so often fails to bring about an improvement in the social attitudes of its charges."

ADDITIONAL ADVERSE EFFECTS

The present sentencing system produces many other harmful, and at times corrupting, consequences.

At the trial level, it contributes to "judge-shopping", as defense counsel scramble to arrange appearances before judges renowned for their "leniency" and to flee the courtroom of the most notorious "hanging judges".

Trial judges are encouraged not to be candid in stating reasons for sentences. If the judge discloses the basis for his sentencing decision, he may be reversed, while his silent counterpart does not similarly risk reproach and reversal.

At the postconviction level, the Parole Commission performs its weighty task with as little direction from Congress as the judges receive. Federal judges and Parole Commission members work at cross purposes in a vast sea of ignorance.

The confusion of roles between these two institutions—neither of which seems to contribute to the rehabilitation of inmates—has eroded public confidence in our correctional system. This mounting public dissatisfaction persists even though American sentences imposed, as well as the actual terms served before parole or mandatory release, are far longer than those in other Western countries.

TOWARD JUSTICE AND EFFECTIVENESS

On the basis of these findings, the Yale study concluded that there are three major flaws in the federal sentencing process: (1) a lack of legislatively prescribed sentencing purposes and criteria for accomplishing those purposes;

(2) inadequate trial and appellate procedures to ensure rationality and fairness, to reduce uncertainty, to minimize disparities; and (3) a dearth of empirical information about almost all aspects of the sentencing, parole and corrections systems.

In devising a rational sentencing reform strategy, the Subcommittee should be guided by the tandem objectives of fairness and effectiveness. Sentencing legislation should provide a procedural framework that will encourage a just and effective sentencing system. In a broad sense, this can be done—

By requiring judges to explain and justify each sentence;

By supplanting the parole system with a determinate sentencing scheme;

By establishing a federal sentencing commission, which through research and experience will devise guidelines for federal sentencing policy; and

By providing for appellate review of sentences.

As lawyers and law teachers—but more importantly as citizens who believe that our sentencing and corrections processes need not be unjust, discriminatory and ineffective—we urge you to reject mere cosmetic changes and to resist the pressures of those defending the status quo.

Instead, we urge you to scrap the present system and begin anew. S. 1437 shows that you have made an impressive start in the right direction.

We have learned from our three-year study of sentencing that there are no instant solutions. Certainly, structuring judicial discretion and reducing unfairness will not make the system wholly effective. We are hopeful, however, that this unprecedented effort will be worthwhile. By specifying the goals we expect the system to achieve and by establishing substantive standards and decisionmaking procedures by which to attain these goals, the system's effectiveness should be vastly improved.

Regardless of the ultimate shape of a sentencing system, the Yale study found that a number of reforms are absolutely essential in maximizing the likelihood that the process will be just and effective. Of course, there are variations on these themes. In the few minutes remaining, we will briefly outline some of these and comment how S. 1437 measures up to these standards.

PURPOSES OF PUNISHMENT

Congress must clearly delineate the goals or purposes of the sentencing system. This is peculiarly a legislative function. The Yale sentencing statute identifies six goals similar to the four purposes set forth in § 101(b) and § 2003(a)(2) of S. 1437: to afford deterrence to criminal conduct, to protect the public, to provide for rehabilitation, to promote respect for law by means of denunciation, to provide just punishment for the offense and to reflect the relative gravity of the offense.

This list is by no means exhaustive. The relative merits of these sentencing goals are the current subject of scholarly debate. To be sure these arguments will persist. The Yale study concluded that, on the basis of the present paltry state of knowledge, none of these goals can be categorically rejected.

While we have strong reservations about the "medical model", coercive behavioral change, and incarceration for rehabilitative purposes (which are discussed later), we have not abandoned all hope that certain in-prison rehabilitative programs—of limited scope and with adequate funding—might have some measurable effect upon recidivism. We nevertheless remain uncertain as to what does and does not work, what is right and what is wrong, and what is necessary and what is unnecessary.

One noteworthy omission from S. 1437 is any definition of such critical terms as "adequate deterrence" and "just punishment". It is crucial that all sentencing judges, as well as the federal sentencing commission, rely upon the same meaning for these fundamental principles.

SENTENCING PRIORITIES

Congress must assign priorities to the specific, declared goals of the sentencing process. Again, this weighing of goals is uniquely a legislative responsibility. As Chief Judge David L. Brazelon of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has observed:

"This confusion of purposes needs to be unraveled and the precise social justification for a particular confinement should be forthrightly recognized. It is only in this manner that we can think clearly about the conditions and extent of confinement, and rationally evaluate our response to disturbing behavior that warrants societal intervention. Of course, more than one purpose may be served by a particular confinement. But we should be clear as to which purpose justifies which punitive or rehabilitative action."

S. 1437 is deficient in this regard. The statement of sentencing purposes in § 2003(a) does not indicate any priority. This issue should not be delegated to sentencing judges or the sentencing commission.

In § 2302(d) of the proposed Yale statute, we have suggested that deterrence and protection of the public (incapacitation) should be the dominant objectives of the federal sentencing process. While this ranking suits our study group's preferences, it of course need not be the one adopted by Congress. The important point is that Congress should clearly spell out its priorities.

INSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES

Congress must allocate responsibilities for the various sentencing goals and functions. The current confusion about the respective roles of courts, corrections authorities and parole boards has led to duplicative and contradictory decisionmaking. It has also engendered needless and counterproductive uncertainty among decisionmakers and those subject to their decisions.

S. 1437 assigns tasks to the sentencing court, the Court of Appeals, the Parole Commission, the Bureau of Prisons, and the United States Sentencing Commission. Nevertheless, the statute essentially recodifies the present overlapping jurisdictions. Part of this problem would be remedied by the total abolition of parole, a recommendation that we will discuss in a moment.

PROCEDURAL SAFEGUARDS

The federal sentencing system must contain detailed trial and appellate court procedures to assure rationality and fairness and to minimize sentencing disparities. Differences in treatment should rest only upon an objective, factual basis relevant to a legitimate, articulated governmental interest in sentencing persons convicted of crime. S. 1437 is landmark legislation in view of its insistence on procedural guarantees of fairness in terms of access to sentencing information, a statement of reasons for a sentence, appellate review of sentences, and presumptive sentencing guidelines for all types of sentences.

We would suggest, however, that S. 1437 is flawed in several respects.

(a) The sentencing procedure does not require the judge to consider separately each of the goals of sentencing. In this area, procedure has a great deal to do with substance. One method might be the "lockstep progression" outlined in § 2302(d) of the proposed Yale statute. Under this system, the judge must first consider the amount of prison time for deterrence purposes, then for incapacitation, next for rehabilitation, and so forth. In addition, the judge is furnished with specific criteria to consider in evaluating each sentencing goal. This type of procedure is essential in assuring that the judge independently and faithfully considers each sentencing purpose.

To ensure compliance for any sentence imposed—whether probation, fine, imprisonment or a combination of these—the judge must place on the record the reasons for the sentence imposed. Otherwise, effective sentence review is impossible.

We applaud section 2003(b) of S. 1437. This provision requires a statement of "general reasons for . . . imposition of the particular sentence" and the reason for the imposition of a sentence outside the guideline sentencing range of the Sentencing Commission. Section 2302(d)(6) of the proposed Yale statute has a similar provision.

(b) To date rehabilitation efforts have not proven effective for the majority of offenders. This controversial topic is discussed in Chapters 3, 6 and 9 of our book. Any sentence for rehabilitative purposes should have an absolute ceiling. The Yale study recommends two years as a maximum. In Section 2302(d)(3), we also impose stringent criteria for sentencing an offender to prison for purposes of rehabilitation and treatment.

S. 1437 places no restrictions on the use of imprisonment as a rehabilitative tool. We urge the Subcommittee to recognize the mounting evidence of a lack of a direct correlation between length of incarceration and rate of recidivism. Substantial questions of civil liberties are raised by imprisoning someone when there is no realistic prospect that any significant benefit will result from this confinement.

(c) Appellate review of sentences is a vital element of any meaningful sentencing reform measure. Some institutional check on excessive and overly lenient sentences is a touchstone of procedural regularity and fairness. Appellate review also facilitates the development of a case law of sentencing and serves as a mechanism to upgrade the rationale and rationality of sentencing. Furthermore, appellate review should result in fewer appeals on the pretext of trial error when the true reason for the appeal is the severity of the sentence. Finally, the appeals of sentence would greatly enhance both the defendant's and the public's respect for the judicial system.

Section 3725 of S. 1437 provides for appellate review of sentences. This provision, however, is too restrictive. Under this section, appeals may be taken only from sentences outside the guidelines—the most egregious sanctions. This restriction, while largely based on an understandable desire not to overcrowd appellate dockets, is unfortunate. A broad right of appeal is necessary to minimize disparity since even sentences within the guidelines can be improper. A defendant should also have the right to test on appeal the accuracy of the judge's application of the guidelines in his case. Any abuses of this remedy can be handled by the appellate courts under traditional appellate review doctrines.

Moreover, the concern for flooding the appellate courts with sentence appeals is unfounded. Under § 3725(c) of the Yale statute, two standards for appellate review are established. A more stringent standard for setting aside a sentence within the guidelines—"clearly unreasonable" as opposed to only "unreasonable" for sentences outside the guidelines—places a considerable obstacle in the way of unmeritorious sentence appeals.

THE SENTENCE OF LAST RESORT

For too many judges today, imprisonment of an offender has become a habit. Under the federal sentencing system, imprisonment should always be the sentence of last resort. Federal sentencing legislation should incorporate an explicit presumption against incarceration—or at the very least a presumption in favor of the least drastic sanction(s) to accomplish the congressionally-established sentencing goals. Before a court considers a prison term of any length, it should first determine whether the sentencing goals in a particular case can be accomplished through the use of probation, special probationary conditions, and/or a fine.

The probation provisions of S. 1437 are excellent and provide a variety of imaginative alternatives to incarceration. We would recommend, however, that the absolute exclusion of Class A felons and certain drug and weapons offenders from eligibility for probation in §§ 2101(a), 1811(b) and 1823(b) be eliminated. We are opposed to any form of mandatory minimum sentences. They rob the sentencing system of flexibility and promote disparity.

We endorse the concept of swift and certain punishment and uniform sentencing practices. The Yale study and proposed statute are based on these principles. The price of mandatory minimum sentences, however, is too high for the speculative benefits from such inflexible laws. Indeed, the latest study of New York's bitter experience with severe mandatory penalties for narcotics offenses concluded that they did not prove a deterrent. We should never adopt a sentencing statute that squeezes all discretion out of the system. There will always be a need for judgment exercised by humane, sensitive and intelligent men and women.

ABOLISH PAROLE

Parole should be abolished.

The best available research on deterrence shows that the most important deterrent effect arises from the certainty and not the severity of punishment. Under present parole laws, an inmate enters prison in an agonizing holding pattern—waiting for that "magic moment" when the parole examiners decide he or she is ready to be restored to the community. But most of the available evidence—discussed in Chapters 3, 6 and 9 of our book—conclusively demonstrates that parole boards do not enjoy unique expertise in rehabilitation. Indeed, the U.S. Parole Commission has abandoned institutional performance or "rehabilitative progress" as parole release considerations.

At this point, the question naturally arises: "Is there any reason to perpetuate the parole system?"

The answer, we respectfully submit, is "No".

As we have already indicated, the Parole Commission largely duplicates the initial sentencing function performed by the trial judge. With the elimination of rehabilitation as a parole release factor, the Parole Commission relies upon the same information (usually in the form of a presentence investigation report) on which the judge based the sentence.

Parole injects a paralyzing uncertainty into the original sentencing decision. In addition to detracting from the judge's ability to control the type and length of sentence, this uncertainty deprives an inmate of the incentive to prepare seriously for release and fosters self-defeating despair.

Recent social science studies, including a pioneering empirical study of federal parole practices in the Yale Law Journal by William Genego, Peter Goldberger and Vicki Jackson, document the fallacy of the rehabilitative ("medical model") myth. At least with present research tools, rehabilitation—defined in the terms of increasing likelihood of successful adjustment upon release—cannot be observed, detected, or measured.

Parole should be replaced by a determinate sentencing system. The sentencing court should set the amount of time to be served. A defendant sentenced to prison would know then and there the period of incarceration. The proposed Yale statute is built on the foundation of a determinate (or flat or fixed) sentencing scheme. Three states—Maine, Illinois and California—have adopted this type of legislation.

S. 1437 does not explicitly abolish parole. Under § 2301(c), the trial court could effectively eliminate parole for an offender and set a fixed sentence by imposing the maximum authorized term of parole ineligibility of nine-tenths of the sentence imposed. Under proposed § 994(a)(1) of Title 28, the Sentencing Commission could administratively abolish parole through mandatory guidelines. These measures are a decided improvement over existing law.

These provisions, however, are a back door approach to eliminating parole and could cause more harm than good. The present problem of widespread disparity could be exacerbated by a situation in which some inmates would be eligible for parole while their similarly situated cellmates would have to serve their entire sentence. Furthermore, the parole process is a creature of the Congress. If it is to be abolished, it should be done by politically accountable leaders.

We urge the Subcommittee to make the abolition of parole and the creation of a determinate sentencing system the cornerstones of the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977. The excellent legislative work of this Subcommittee would be immeasurably enhanced by the addition of this urgent sentencing reform to the impressive list already contained in S. 1437.

SUBSTANTIAL REDUCTION OF PRISON TERMS

Authorized prison terms in this country are far too long.

Presently, parole and "good time" credits have the combined effect in most cases of reducing an inmate's sentence by one-half to two-thirds. With the abolition of both of these substantial sentence-reducing devices, maximum authorized sentences—except for the most serious Class A felonies carrying a maximum of life imprisonment—should be reduced by one-half.

Even without the abolition of parole, maximum sentences should be reduced. Almost a decade ago, the American Bar Association, after a comprehensive study of sentencing in this country, concluded:

"It should be recognized that in many instances in this country the prison sentences which are now authorized, and sometimes required, are significantly higher than are needed in the vast majority of cases in order adequately to protect the interests of the public."

The Subcommittee is to be commended for its reduction of the maximum prison terms for Class B, C, and D felonies. We suggest, however, that these modest reductions are inadequate. The task of setting ceilings on prison terms for offenses should not be left to administrative agencies such as the Parole Commission or Sentencing Commission.

EARLY RELEASE PLAN

With the elimination of good time (and hopefully, parole), an inmate, as Norman Carlson indicated earlier today, will have no "light" at the end of the tunnel." The Yale study concluded that some time-reduction provision should be retained as an incentive to assure good behavior and discipline.

In Chapter 9 of our book, we recommend an "early release" plan. This program, which has been endorsed by the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, would be limited to the last one-tenth of the sentence. This is a substantially smaller percentage of the original sentence authorized by the present "good time" laws. Early release decisions would be made by the Bureau of Prisons solely on the basis of institutional conduct and performance. Release would occur at nine-tenths of the sentence.

SENTENCING COMMISSION

To give meaning and effect to the legislatively-prescribed sentencing goals, criteria and procedures, a United States Sentencing Commission should be established. One of the most indictable aspects of the present system is the dearth of information about virtually all phases of the sentencing, parole, and corrections processes. The Commission would undertake ongoing research to evaluate different sentencing goals and to determine the best way to implement each objective. In addition, the Commission would promulgate guidelines for recommended normal ("benchmark" or "presumptive") sentence ranges to structure the sentencing judge's decisions.

As Judge Frankel, the first proponent of such a Commission, has observed:

"As is true in other domains, the notion of research and development [in the field of sentencing] must embrace more than the generation of scholarly studies, though such studies are surely wanted. There must be a commitment to change, to application of the learning as it is acquired. There must be a recognition that the subject will never be definitively 'closed', that the process is a continuous cycle of exploration and experimental change."

The proposed United States Sentencing Commission is the centerpiece of impressive sentencing reforms of S. 1437. With its ambitious charter, the Sentencing Commission has been given broad powers to instigate unprecedented changes in the federal sentencing system. We urge the passage of this provision.

We would suggest a few matters for your consideration.

Under § 994(a), you may want to require that the Judicial Conference's appointees to the Sentencing Commission come from a cross-section of the public and private sector. It would be a serious mistake if all the commissioners were either federal judges or private attorneys.

Under § 994(d), the Sentencing Commission is required to consider certain factors in classifying categories of offenders for purposes of its sentencing guidelines. Some of these factors include the offender's education, family and community ties, vocational skills and previous employment records. The Subcommittee, we are sure, is aware of the care which must be used in employing such considerations. Not only are there serious doubts about the utility of some of these factors in making assessments of risk of recidivism. There is also the potential for inadvertent discrimination on the basis of race and income. We would recommend that the Subcommittee highlight these concerns in its report so that the Sentencing Commission will be fully aware of congressional sensitivity to these issues and that after studying these factors, the Sentencing Commission need not utilize them if it finds them inappropriate.

Under § 994(g), the guidelines of the Sentencing Commission may be disapproved by only one House of Congress. Such one-House veto provisions are of arguable constitutionality and are under attack in the courts. We do not favor a congressional role in the process of implementing sentencing guidelines. If there is to be legislative involvement, however, we would recommend a procedure similar to 18 U.S.C. § 3771 now used in connection with the promulgation of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure by the Supreme Court.

Finally, we recommend that S. 1437 be amended to add a requirement that the Sentencing Commission follow the public notice and comment provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act in promulgating sentencing guidelines and general policy statements. We commend to the Subcommittee's attention § 5(b) of S. 204, the Federal Sentencing Standards Act of 1977, introduced by Senators Hart and Javits.

The sentencing provisions of S. 1437 represent a dramatic improvement over existing law. S. 1437 reflects Congress' faith that a just sentencing system can be effective in promoting respect for law, deterring crime, rehabilitating some types of offenders, and incapacitating serious offenders. The prospect of this far reaching legislation being enacted in this Congress—to those of us who have pressed for these reforms—is heartening.

We would be pleased to answer any questions.

Senator HATCH. I think your prepared statement has covered the subject very comprehensively.

You commented on the failure of Congress to establish sentencing guidelines.

What role do you envision for Congress with respect to promulgation of guidelines or even supervision of guidelines once they are promulgated?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Section 994 of the present bill, sir, provides for a one-house veto provision after a laying on the table of, I believe, 180 days.

As we point out in our statement, this is of arguable constitutionality and the issue is being litigated. In our book, we favor no congressional role because we think we have to give this commission stature and prestige. The legislative responsibility is to establish what the purposes of sentencing should be and what the criteria are for reaching those purposes.

If, however, there is to be a legislative role in scrutinizing the guidelines, it should be similar to what we do with the present Federal criminal rules of procedure in which both Houses of Congress have to act to set them aside, so to speak.

We do not recommend that Congress get in the business of saying that this type of crime with this type of offender should result in imprisonment for 12 to 16 months. We think this is a task for your sentencing commission through the research functions which we envision and which this bill—which gives it a very ambitious charter—also envisions.

Senator HATCH. Would the Congress have any oversight over the Commission in any guidelines that it might publish?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Certainly. If Congress were dissatisfied with the guidelines, it could always enact legislation repealing them.

Senator HATCH. To the extent of its oversight authority?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Yes. That would be the traditional oversight function of the Congress which we would encourage because we do not think it has always been exercised in the past.

These hearings and this legislation are glowing testimony to the fact that Congress now sees it has a vital role to play in the area of corrections.

Senator HATCH. I go along with you. I think in the case of a lot of legislation which causes serious problems in implementation is put on the books by Congress, turned over to the bureaucracy, without any further thought by Congress, and the bureaucracy pretty well does whatever it wants with the legislation.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Only when we have a crisis, for example the Attica situation in New York, then people start getting concerned about it. I think what you are doing here may obviate those types of problems in the Federal system down the road if you pass this type of legislation.

Senator HATCH. In suggesting that parole be abolished, are you advocating that there should be no postrelease supervision?

Mr. O'DONNELL. As they say, you have gone to the jugular, Mr. Chairman.

At the Yale workshop over 3 years, this was one of the most hotly debated topics. We conclude in the book that there should not be traditional parole release supervision. However, with what we call a split sentence—so much time in prison, then probation—there would be a supervisory period. We do favor the probation-type of supervision.

Also, as Mr. Curtis points out, there are halfway houses and other types of phased release into the community.

Senator HATCH. Would those options still be available?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Certainly. In fact, this bill endorses and certainly gives the Director of the Bureau of Prisons every amount of authority he needs in that respect.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your testimony today and we wish all three of you luck on your book.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness is Professor Ernest van den Haag.

Professor, I apologize that we are pressed for time.

Welcome to our committee.

STATEMENT OF ERNEST VAN DEN HAAG, NEW YORK, N.Y.

Mr. VAN DEN HAAG. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am Ernest van den Haag. I am a lecturer in psychology and sociology at the New School for Social Research in New York. I have been a professor at a variety of universities and am now adjunct professor of law, New York Law School.

I have written a number of books, the latest of which is called "Punishing Criminals: Concerning a Very Old and Painful Question." Because the subject of that book interests me, I am here once more. I appreciate the opportunity to testify.

Let me very briefly summarize my prepared statement.

I think the bill before you is very great progress over what we had before. But I would like it to go further.

I think that the purpose of nonmandatory, nonflat sentencing and the purpose of parole basically is to permit judges—and, later on, parole boards—to determine whether a particular offender is more likely to be rehabilitated and, accordingly, to either tailor the sentence to his personality or tailor the length of confinement later on to his progress in rehabilitation.

I do not think this can work. I do not think a judge can determine what kind of personality the offender before him has. As a result, the discretion by judges tends to be tailored to the judge's personality rather than to the defendant's. This is not particularly desirable.

I also feel that no one has ever been able to show that behavior within prison enables parole boards to infer anything about behavior after release. Yet, this prediction is the only argument in favor of the existence of parole boards. Anything other than behavior within prison, the sentencing judge can be made fully aware of. Hence, he can consider all other factors in deciding on his sentence.

The only predictive elements that I would seriously consider are the previous offenses of the defendant. Of these, the sentencing judge can be made aware. Hence, I do not see any good reason for the existence of parole or of parole boards.

I do see some reason for giving prisoners time off for good behavior—about 10 percent of their sentence and no more. Else the warden would have excessive power. Of course, this time off for good behavior can be abused. Nonetheless, it is an important disciplinary means in the hands of the warden. I would retain it.

Somewhere between a quarter and a half of all of our prisoners are recidivists. The data on this matter are very uncertain. Anyway, the rest—about 50 percent—are not. There is no evidence in the record—and I am quite familiar with the whole literature—to indicate that any rehabilitation program has ever made a difference here or abroad. I have in mind such countries as Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, which are famous for their prison reforms. There is no evidence that any rehabilitation program has made any difference whatsoever in the behavior of the convict upon release.

Some are recidivists; some are not. Prison may have an influence, but no study I know of has ever shown that any particular rehabilitation program has ever made a difference in the proportion of released offenders who become recidivists. This is provided, of course, that the comparisons are proper, that one compares a group of convicts who have been subjected to rehabilitation programs with a group of others who have committed the same offense, come from the same socio-economic background, are of the same age, et cetera and have not been subjected to the program.

Lest I be misunderstood, I want to make it clear that I do not necessarily advocate lengthier confinement for all offenders. I do advocate less arbitrarily determined confinement and effectively more equal and certain sentences determined by law and by the courts, without any parole provisions whatsoever.

A frequent misunderstanding, which I heard repeated here by some of the previous witnesses before you, is that our prisons would become overcrowded if parole boards did not release people.

It is obvious, however, that shorter effective sentences, if they are desired, can achieve the same effect as parole does now.

More important, more severe effective sentences, if they do reduce the crime rate by reducing the numbers of crimes committed by those actually incapacitated, would still cost less than release would cost if it leads to more crime.

Thus, if the prison population were to increase, investment in more prisons might be entirely worthwhile.

But still more important is this. If the punishment of offenders does deter others—and in my book, "Punishing Criminals," I have presented very considerable evidence that it does—then the result of more severe and certain punishment would be to keep a greater proportion of offenders behind bars; but also to reduce the total number of offenders. Thus, ultimately, the proportion of offenders behind bars would increase; the number may decrease as the number of offenses decreases. Hence, there would be ultimately no overcrowding of prisons.

Whether the absence of parole will increase the severity of sentences will depend on legislation and on the sentencing guidelines that you have mentioned.

As has been mentioned before—and I wish to agree—confinement should be only a last resort. However, I think every second offender for violent crimes certainly should be confined.

The alternative to confinement, very often, is fines. The trouble with fines is that most offenders are not capable of paying a fine.

But I do wish to make it clear that, if we do consider fines, I would suggest these be stated not in sums of money but in income days. That is, the sentencing judge would sentence the defendant to 10 days' income or 50 days' income. There are obvious reasons, in terms of equity and fairness, for preferring this. A fine of say $500 would obviously be too heavy a burden for some and a tripling one for others. A fine of 10 income days would more nearly equalize the burden.

But I am afraid that fines as an alternative to imprisonment are in many cases not practical.

There is one other point I wish to make about parole and rehabilitation.

We do sentence people to punishment, not because of the future expected behavior—criminal or otherwise—but because of their past behavior. If that were not so, the work of our courts in ascertaining guilt would be wholly in vain. We could leave it to psychologists, if they are capable of that, to tell us who will commit a crime or who will not.

We do not do that. Our system is called a system of criminal justice. Justice means that people are punished only if they have committed a crime and only in proportion to the seriousness of that crime.

Hence, it seems to me that, on principle and by logic, the future behavior of offenders should not be a sentencing consideration. Their past behavior should determine the sentence.

Their past behavior, on the other hand—let me add—is also what is most predictive about their future behavior. I should say that a man who has committed two crimes is far more likely to commit crimes in the future than a man who has committed only one crime. Hence, it seems to me that whatever consideration you want to give to future behavior can easily be fitted with the proper consideration of past behavior.

We usually believe, based, perhaps, on our belief in rehabilitation, that young people should be treated most leniently and older people should be held more responsible for their wrongdoing. Hence, the young tend to get more lenient treatment.

I think that is exactly the reverse of what we should do.

Practically all violent crimes are committed by people between the ages of 14 and 30 to 35. Hardly anyone commits a crime requiring physical exertion after the age of 40.

It seems to me, therefore, that we can afford, so to speak, to be relative lenient with older criminals and we cannot afford to be lenient with younger criminals.

I certainly do not wish to condemn a person to prison for a long term simply because he is young. But younger criminals who give signs of becoming career criminals, by committing more than one crime—having, say, two previous convictions—I should think, in your sentencing provisions, you should deal with as career criminals. Chances of changes in his commitment to crime are extremely small. Early release simply means that the offender will continue his criminal career as usual to the age of 35 or 40.

Hence, contrary to the present practice in a number of States—which is to give practical immunity to people under 16, whatever crimes they commit and to treat quite leniently young people—I would advocate that the emphasis be reversed.

I think that the abolition of parole and the appropriate mandatory flat sentencing of career criminals alone are likely—quite apart from the deterrent effects—to reduce the crime rate by half, since at the present time, more than 50 percent of all violent crimes are committed by people out on parole or probation.

The abolition of parole for all offenders and the mandatory sentencing urged would by incapacitation and by deterrence decrease the crime rate much further. Thus, our Government could fulfill the promise of the Declaration of Independence to secure the life, the liberties, and the pursuit of happiness of our citizens.

It is to “secure these rights” that “governments are instituted among men” according to our Declaration of Independence.

If one looks at the present practices of the criminal justice system, including the correctional establishment, one may think that it was to secure the happiness of lawbreakers that our Government was instituted. Yet, as Lincoln warned, our citizens “become tired and disgusted with a government which offers them no protection.”

I think we have reached this point.

I congratulate you for considering a bill which promises to change that.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

We are grateful that you took time to be with us today and give us your insights.

Your statement will be made a part of the record. I am sure it will be interesting to all who read it.

[Material follows:]

My name is Ernest van den Haag. I am lecturer in psychology and sociology at The New School for Social Research, and an Adjunct Professor of Law, New York Law School, as well as a psychoanalyst in private practice. I studied here and abroad and received a Ph.D. in 1952 from New York University. Since then I have been a Guggenheim Fellow and a Senior Fellow of the National Endowment for the Humanities. I have published about 200 articles and seven books, the most recent of which is Punishing Criminals: Concerning a Very Old and Painful Question (New York: Basic Books, 1975). My present address is 118 West 79th Street, New York, N.Y. 10024. As the title of my latest book indicates, I have a considerable interest in the way we are dealing with criminals, and I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss the topic with you. I shall confine myself to the sentencing provisions of S. 1437.

S. 1437 limits the discretion of judges and enables them to limit the discretion of parole boards. This is progress, but in my opinion, it would be better to limit the discretion of judges much further and to eliminate parole and parole boards altogether.

I.

In 1952, Mr. Justice Black wrote: “Retribution is no longer the dominant objective of criminal law. Reformation and rehabilitation of offenders have become important goals of criminal jurisprudence.”<sup>1</sup>

His description of the trend was correct; but Justice Black’s acceptance of it I deem to be a mistake. Apart from incapacitation, the purpose of punishment must be to do justice: To punish those who by violating the criminal law deserved and have invited the punishment threatened by it. This is the threat or the promise of the law. As is any promise, that threat is a moral obligation that must be carried out regardless of usefulness. (There is a common misunderstanding here: It is believed that the obligation is to the criminal. It is not. It is to those who, perhaps because of the threat, did not commit crimes.) Further, if the threat is not carried out when the law is broken, it becomes incredible and, therefore, ineffective in restraining future lawbreakers. This would defeat the second purpose of the legal threat: To restrain prospective future lawbreakers from breaking the law.

Promises should be kept; threats should not be made unless one proposes to carry them out. Else they will be regarded as bluffs. If they are, threats cannot restrain or deter prospective law violators. Deterrence requires that the threats of the law be carried out by inflicting punishment—not rehabilitation—on those who volunteer to risk it, by breaking the law. Crime is deterred by the threat of punishment only as long as it remains credible. Thus, unlike Mr. Justice Black, I believe that the “dominant objective of criminal law” must be to do justice by punishing as threatened and thereby also to deter others. Rehabilitation, however desirable, cannot take the place of justice and deterrence. Moreover, attempts to achieve it lead to gross injustice and necessarily must fail, as indeed they have. Let us consider the distortions of justice that have occurred to accommodate these attempts.

II.

At the present time, considerable sentencing discretion is given to courts. After they have exercised it, parole boards determine what part of that sentence passed by the court is actually served. I oppose the discretion given judges and favor narrowing it to near zero. The law should mandate the sentence for each crime.<sup>2</sup> I propose further that parole and parole boards be abolished altogether.

Essentially sentencing discretion is left to courts because (a) the circumstances of each crime differ, and it is felt that the judge, familiar with the case, is the best person to adapt the sentence to those circumstances; (b) the personality of each criminal is different, and again it is felt that the judge is more able than the legislator to adapt the punishment to the individual personality of the offender, to his degree of guilt, and to his chances for rehabilitation.

Certainly each crime is committed in different circumstances of an aggravating or extenuating nature, which legitimately ought to influence the sentence imposed by the court. However, these circumstances can be classified and listed in the law to a very large extent. Judges can be legally instructed to increase or decrease sentences accordingly. Thus, judicial discretion can be severely limited while aggravating or extenuating circumstances still can properly influence sentences. This limitation of judicial discretion is desirable, for without it elements of judgment (negatively expressed, of capriciousness) necessarily prevail. They give the appearance of injustice, at least of inequality, and sometimes the substance as well. Moreover, uncertainty about the sentence to be expected reduces the deterrent effect of punishment—crime becomes more of a gamble than it need be. Thus, I would make all sentences mandatory, allowing judges to increase or decrease the mandated sentence by no more than 10 percent for reasons (to be stated in passing sentence) beyond those specified in the law.<sup>3</sup>

Defendants differ, and this, too, is alleged to necessitate judicial discretion. Some, it is argued, have personalities more and others less susceptible to rehabilitation. This may be so. But, as has been noted, the purpose of a sentence is to punish those guilty of crime—rehabilitation is incidental to such punishment. Else, defendants not in need of rehabilitation could be released, guilty or not, and unrehabilitated offenders would have to be kept indefinitely. This would be unjust. Nor would it serve deterrence—it would indeed grant everybody immunity for at least one crime, provided he is found unlikely to commit other crimes.

<sup>2</sup> The only penalty that I believe should not be mandatory is the death penalty. Courts should be able to choose between it and life imprisonment for the reasons that the Supreme Court has specified in recent decisions.

<sup>3</sup> S. 1437, a bill now before Congress, proposes a sentencing commission that would elaborate guidelines. This, if properly done, would have nearly the same effect as making sentences mandatory.

At any rate, there is no evidence whatsoever that judges, even when aided by probation reports, or by psychologists, are able to gage personality differences and to adapt sentences to them. Sentences are much more likely to be adapted to the personality of the judge than to that of the defendant. Of this there is empirical proof in the literature, which suggests that some judges are considerably more lenient (or severe) than others, who may be presumed to sentence a similar assortment of personalities and offenses. Additional evidence indicates that some judges habitually deal with some types of offenses severely, while other judges deal leniently with that same type of offense. That much about judicial discretion. I suggest that it be so restricted that offenders having committed the same crime, as legally defined, can expect the same mandatory sentence.

III.

The major purpose of parole has been to release from prison offenders who, in the opinion of the parole board, are rehabilitated. Since the parole board thus determines within a minimum and maximum fixed by the court the actual length of any sentence, it necessarily makes all sentences indeterminate. This practice is unjust; it leads to wholly capricious punishment; and, finally, it does not and cannot achieve its purpose of releasing the rehabilitated and keeping those who are not—regardless of whether that purpose itself is justifiable.

No one has ever shown that behavior within prison enables parole boards to infer anything about behavior upon release. Experience indicates that it does not. And why, indeed, should behavior in the very special conditions of prison tell us much about behavior outside? Yet all elements, other than behavior within prison, are already available at sentencing time and do not require a parole board to second-guess the sentencing judge. Still, the idea that a parole board can estimate progress in rehabilitation by considering behavior in the prison setting persists. (So do parole boards.) Let me add that the idea implied by Mr. Justice Black, and accepted by influential writers, that rehabilitative treatments can replace punishment, is theoretically absurd. Rehabilitation could succeed only when preceded by punishment: Punishment, if sufficient, may show the offender that crime is self defeating and might motivate him to avoid it in the future. Possibly, rehabilitation programs may subsequently help him to do so, but unless the program follows punishment, the offender has no motive for actually wishing to be rehabilitated. His crime has paid. Therefore, he cannot be rehabilitated. In practical terms, no program has yet been discovered to effectively help rehabilitation.<sup>4</sup> Perhaps rehabilitative programs to help noncareer criminals will be discovered and validated in the future. Although they may be added to it, they can never take the place of punishment as long as it is to be just and deterrent. At present, rehabilitative programs simply foster, abet and reward whatever histrionic and manipulative abilities prisoners possess. For, what is actually evaluated by parole boards is how well the prisoner get along with prison authorities and their notions of of appropriate prison behavior,<sup>5</sup> or of behavior indicating rehabilitation.

Somewhere between a quarter and a half of our prisoners are recidivists. (The data do not permit greater specification.) The rest are not. There is no evidence that any rehabilitation program here or abroad has ever made a difference in these proportions, in producing a change, in leading more people to be lawabiding upon release. It is quite possible that imprisonment itself does have effects, at least on the nonprofessional offenders, or that there are spontaneous changes. But there is no evidence either for (unintentional) criminalizing or for (intended) rehabilitative effects, i.e., no evidence that released offenders upon release commit either fewer or more crimes than they would have committed had they never been imprisoned. (Possibly the rehabilitative and criminalizing effects of imprisonment statistically offset each other.) Above all, there is no evidence that any specific treatment during confinement—any rehabilitation program—makes a difference.

<sup>4</sup> One must be careful to distinguish (1) rehabilitation brought about by the influence of extraordinary personalities—which, by definition, cannot be institutionalized; (2) rehabilitation by age, punishment, or other factors; (3) rehabilitation by a specific non-punitive program. It is the latter that nowhere has succeeded when institutionalized.

The methods now used by parole boards do not ascertain the likely future behavior of a prisoner. Hence, there is no reason why the sentencing should not be left to the law and the judge. The parole board should be altogether abolished. Evidence abounds indicating that a disproportionate number of crimes are committed by previously incarcerated offenders, many released on parole. Among them are many career criminals whom parole boards believed rehabilitated.

Lest I be misunderstood, I do not necessarily advocate lengthier confinement for all offenders. I do advocate less arbitrary decisions on confinement and more equal sentences determined by law and by the courts, without any parole provisions whatever. I do not wish to eliminate "time off for good behavior" either. As long as it is a privilege and not a right, and left entirely to the prison administration to grant or withhold, "time off for good behavior" is a valuable tool of prison discipline. However, the maximum "time off" should never exceed 10 percent of the sentence being served. Else prison wardens gain excessive arbitrary power and sentences would no longer be determined by the law and by the courts. On the other hand, 10 percent of the sentence is enough incentive for proper conduct for any convict at all responsive to positive incentives.

IV.

It is frequently thought that our prisons would become over-crowded if parole boards did not release people. But if shorter effective sentences are desired, this can be accomplished by reducing penalties judicially or legislatively. Parole boards are not needed to shorten time served.

However, if severe effective sentences do reduce the crime rate by reducing the number of crimes committed by those incapacitated—and that is likely, since many crimes are committed by a small number of "career criminals"—lengthy confinement would still cost less than release would. The additional crimes committed by the released convicts cost more to victims and to the criminal justice system than confinement does. Thus, if the prison population were to increase, investment in more prisons might be entirely worthwhile.

But such an increase of the prison population, though likely in the short run, is unlikely in the long run. If the punishment of offenders does deter others,<sup>6</sup> more severe and certain punishment would keep a greater proportion of offenders behind bars, but it also would reduce the total number of offenses by deterring prospective offenders. Although the proportion of offenders behind bars would increase, their total number would decrease as the number of offenses decreases.

Whether or not the absence of parole actually increases the severity of punishment depends on the legislature and on the courts, which can increase or decrease the length of sentences. And that is where the decision belongs. Parole boards have no special competence which legislatures or courts lack, to, in effect, determine sentences, nor can they learn any relevant facts not available to the sentencing courts.

V.

Legislators and judges and, not least, parole boards often appear to believe that offenders are to be confined not for the crimes they committed, but for the crimes they may or may not commit. Thus, they should be confined or released not on the basis of past behavior, including crime, but on the basis of predicted future behavior. The actual length of the sentence served is made to depend on whether criminal or lawabiding behavior is predicted.

As indicated, there is no basis for making such prediction other than the kind of lawabiding or lawbreaking behavior of which courts are made aware. Hence, there is no reason for post-sentence modification or determination of length of time to be served in prison by parole boards. But the idea of determining sentences on the basis of future behavior is anyway contrary to our principles of justice, and to our principles of social defense.

Clearly, if we are interested in future rather than past behavior, our elaborate process of determining guilt—which is always and only incurred by past behavior—would be unnecessary. (Unless guilt itself predicts future behavior. In which case, parole boards once more would be superfluous, since the courts would be able to predict future behavior.) If, however, past guilt is thought necessary and sufficient to determine sentences regardless of future behavior, then subsequent determination, or change, of the time to be served is unnecessary. And surely guilt, past behavior, should be decisive. Criminal statutes threaten with punishment those who violate them. They do not threaten punishment to those who are believed likely to break the law in the future. However, unless carried out against the guilty, the threats of the law become incredible and ineffective. And the performance of anti-social acts is encouraged as the threat that was to deter them loses its credibility.

Justice consists in meting out the punishments threatened by law and deserved by guilt to those—and only to those—who voluntarily have run the risk of suffering them, regardless of predictions, or guesses, about their future behavior. By doing justice we also hope to deter others from offenses, as they see that offenders suffer the punishments threatened. Not all will be deterred, but it seems obvious that the deterrent effectiveness of punishment depends on the certainty and severity of punishment that can be expected by lawbreakers—on the expected cost of lawbreaking compared to the benefits expected by the lawbreaker.<sup>7</sup>

Before turning to the effectiveness of punishment, let me illustrate briefly why guilt, and guilt alone, must determine the actual sentence served. Suppose a man kills his wife. Quite often such a man need not be incapacitated—he is unlikely to kill anyone else. Further, the crime itself may have fully rehabilitated him: He wanted to kill this particular woman, his wife, and having done so he may be a good citizen in the future, he may never remarry, and if he does, live ever after happily with his new wife.

We punish such a person for the sake of justice—to carry out the threat of the law, to inflict the punishment deserved—and of deterrence. We feel, in Tolstoy's words, that the seeds of every crime are in everyone of us. Hence, other husbands need to be restrained from doing what may tempt them by seeing what happens to one who has done it. This way we keep most wives surviving. Or, for that matter, most husbands. Obviously, neither rehabilitation nor incapacitation is needed or relevant—any more than they were needed for the "Watergate" criminals, for most white collar criminals or for most "crimes of passion." But justice and deterrence are indispensable.

The threat of punishment obviously has not deterred those who are guilty of crimes. Some, to be sure, are altogether undeterrable. Others are so committed to a criminal career that they are quite unlikely to be deterred or to be rehabilitated by any reasonable punishment. (This is often the case for minor professional criminals, e.g., pickpockets.) But the threat continues to deter most of us. Those who cannot be deterred, if guilty of crimes, must be incapacitated at least temporarily, to prevent them from committing the additional crimes they would commit if free and to deter others from entering a criminal career.

I do not advocate punishment of offenders for what they have yet to do. They can only be punished for their past crimes. I do suggest, however, that the law mandate courts to impose a much more severe sentence on second offenders than on first offenders who commit serious crimes. Anyone who has not learned from his first conviction and punishment is well on his way to a criminal career; whatever mitigates a first offense does not mitigate the second. Anyone who commits a third offense must be considered a career criminal. He should, if convicted, be incapacitated for a lengthy period if his crime was violent, or if, like burglary, it involves physical exertion. He should not be released before he reaches the age of 40. At that age resumption of his criminal career is unlikely. Few people commit violent crimes after 35. Age rehabilitates. Thus, contrary to present practice, youthfulness generally requires longer, while age permits shorter confinement: The young career criminals are most likely to commit additional crimes, and least likely to be rehabilitated. Leniency toward young career criminals is based on the sentimental but demonstrably wrong premise that they are more likely to reform than older ones. The sentiment is generous but unrealistic. And the result is not generous as far as the victims of crime are concerned. While mandatory sentences should be determined by the gravity of the crime as defined by the law and by the courts, upon a third conviction the offender, particularly the assaultive offender, should not be released before reaching the age of 40. The law should take the habitual aspect of the criminal career into consideration.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> The idea that certainty alone matters, or matters more than severity, is true under some conditions (including mostly the present ones) and not others. E.g., certainty of mild punishments invites crime. There is an optimum combination of certainty and severity, and neither variable is in principle more important than the other, since deterrence is the product of these joint causes.

It is well known that career criminals commit a disproportionate number of all crimes. Nearly 50 percent of all violent crimes are committed by career criminals, many released on parole. The abolition of parole and the appropriate mandatory flat sentencing of career criminals alone are likely to reduce the crime rate by half, merely by incapacitation, quite apart from deterrent effects. Mandatory sentencing and the abolition of parole for all offenders, by incapacitation and by deterrence, would decrease the crime rate much further. Thus, our government could fulfill the promise of the Declaration of Independence: to secure the life, the liberties and the pursuit of happiness of our citizens. It is "to secure these rights" that "governments are instituted among men," according to the framers. If one looks at the present practices of the criminal justice system, including the correctional establishment, one may think that it was to secure the happiness of lawbreakers that our government was instituted. Yet, as Lincoln warned, our citizens "become tired and disgusted with a government which offers them no protection." I think we have reached that point.

A MEANS TO REHABILITATE?

Since offenders voluntarily take the risk of punishment, and since punishment may include treatment thought suitable for correction, the Kantian injunction not to use anyone just as a means, even for his own benefit, need not prohibit the rehabilitative treatment of offenders as long as it remains incidental to but does not replace retributive justice. Yet attempts to rehabilitate often do, and even were meant to, replace retribution.<sup>1</sup> In the nature of the matter, "correction" requires individualized, i.e., different, treatment for each criminal, treatment linked to him rather than to his crime, whereas retribution and deterrence are linked to the act not the actor, and unlike rehabilitation require the same punishment for the same offense. Thus, rehabilitative treatment unless incidental to retribution—unless it neither decreases nor increases the punishment imposed for the offense—tends to be inconsistent with justice, whereas deterrence is not.

The utilitarian theories, which stress the correction of offenders, have found wide acceptance in modern times. Thus, the late Mr. Justice Black wrote: "Retribution is no longer the dominant objective of criminal law. Reformation and rehabilitation of offenders have become important goals of criminal jurisprudence."<sup>2</sup> The idea that "punishment" is primarily for rehabilitation is:

... subscribed to by many if not most psychiatrists, by most practitioners of the behavioral sciences who think about problems of the criminal law, by the overwhelming majority of "professionalized" workers in the correctional field—probation officers, case workers, and the like—and by an increasing number of those popular writers who perform the extremely important function of translating the ideas of the intellectually advanced into current popular terms. Its catchwords—"treat the criminal, not the crime," "punishment is obsolete," "criminals are sick," and the like—are standard fare in large circulation magazines, and show that the popular culture has absorbed, even if it has not yielded to, the behavioral approach to crime.

Concerned with the future personality and conduct of the offender, the "behavioral approach" replaces the justice model of punishment with a therapeutic one. Hence Barbara Wootton urges that "the formal distinction between prison and hospital [be] . . . eventually obliterated altogether."<sup>3</sup> A similar view is expressed in a letter to the New York Times (Dec. 27, 1973): "We on the left should be careful not to violate the principles we preach, among <sup>8</sup> Society obviously needs less protection from one who is at the end of his criminal career. Therefore, we can do with fewer years of incapacitation. Moreover, it is likely that a year in prison at 40 is subjectively a greater loss than a year in prison at 20.

<sup>1</sup> The only criminal code that acknowledges rehabilitation of the offender—individualized treatment—substantially unaffected by the gravity of the crime as its major goal is that of Greenland. However, Greenland is an exception also owing to historical traditions and the nature of its society.

which are the following: Acting in revenge is wrong . . . prisons, if they do not reform, should be closed." The writer rejects punishment (which he confuses with revenge) and believes that if society cannot rehabilitate convicts, it must release them. He does not believe incapacitation or deterrence useful. He is joined by renowned philosophers such as Richard H. Brandt, who proposes:

" . . . if an accused were adjudged guilty, decisions about his treatment would then be in the hands of the experts, who would determine what treatment was called for and when the individual was ready for return to normal social living . . . it would be criminal-centered treatment, not crime-centered treatment. [For] it is doubtful whether threats of punishment have as much deterrent value as is often supposed."

Because they intend to meet the individual's needs, and concentrate on helping rather than punishing him, the future-oriented treatment theories often are regarded as more rational, charitable, and humanitarian than retributive theories, which punish past acts according to legal definitions and prescriptions and ignore individual rehabilitative "needs." What could be more humane than to deal with everyone according to his individual "needs"? To forget about guilt and the past, and to try to cure or correct for a better future? To help the criminal rather than to punish the crime? What could be more rational?<sup>4</sup>

One can argue that the justice model is more just than the therapeutic model, but the argument may amount to a disguised definition. It is more interesting to ask which model is ultimately more helpful to the offender and to society. With regard to the offender, the charity of the therapeutic model is suspect because it is compulsory. Convicts do not volunteer to be corrected. Most do not feel sick at all and do not want to be cured. They are held in a correctional institution to be treated against their will.

In the justice model the convict, punished according to desert, leaves when he has served his time, as legally prescribed for the crime for which he was convicted. He does not depend on the approval or disapproval of his jailers. The correctional or therapeutic model implies that he will leave when his needs have been met. The needs, however, are not those he feels but those he is felt to have. Experts and prison authorities decide on them, and on the length of his stay. The "needs" they attribute to the convict derive from their own notions about proper behavior and lifestyle. At best, experts define the convict's needs according to their reading of the significance of his prison behavior (or, sometimes, of his way of life) in predicting his conduct when released. If he is held because bad behavior is predicted, he is, as it were, made to suffer in advance for his expected future acts. Perhaps these social precautions can be justified as such, but not as punishment nor as a treatment. For treatment in the medical sense surely is in the convict patient's interest as he defines it, and punishment refers to past offenses only.

Justice, at any rate, becomes irrelevant. There can be no "just correction," no "just therapy." Correction or treatment can be effective or ineffective, needed or not, but neither can be just or unjust any more than an appendectomy can be, or Vitamin C. The link between guilt and the punishment deserved by it—justice—is severed and replaced by a link between therapy and expected future conduct. Dr. Karl Menninger acknowledges the therapeutic view when he writes: "The very word 'justice' irritates scientists."<sup>5</sup>

To be an involuntary patient and to depend on the uncertain judgment even of competent and well-intentioned authorities is also demeaning. The correctional model might well mean that offenders are released when they are sufficiently submissive—when they get along with prison authorities, including psychiatrists

<sup>4</sup> Strictly speaking, the humanitarian motive must be distinguished from the corrective-therapeutic one. The latter is instrumental and in principle could lead to painful or cruel, as well as humane, measures, depending on what is effective, whereas humane treatment is a moral precept, justified not by effects but by its intrinsic moral rightness. In practice, however, "humane" treatment is usually justified by the expected therapeutic effects.

<sup>5</sup> Those who originally sponsored rehabilitation as the main goal of legal sanctions against law violators are beginning to recoil having seen the consequences. Thus, Struggle for Justice, A Report Prepared for the American Friends Service Committee (Hill and Wang, 1971), although still encumbered with many clichés, suggests that at least some among the Quakers to whom we owe the rehabilitative emphasis have seen the light. Partial Justice (Alfred A. Knopf, 1974) by Willard Gaylin, a psychoanalyst, reports on interviews with some forty federal judges which led Gaylin to conclude that sentencing becomes capricious when discretionary, more influenced by the divergent life experience of and social workers. David Greenberg's "The desire to help when coupled with a desire to control is totalitarian," exaggerates only a little. Furthermore, psychiatry is not an exact science. Hence, capricious detention for involuntary treatment is hard to distinguish from detention based on a bona fide diagnosis. Once the therapeutic model replaces a definite punishment with indefinite, involuntary "correction," it may turn out to be less humane, as well as less just than the retributive model.

IS IT EFFECTIVE?

Rehabilitative treatment has not been shown to be effective in reducing recidivism: the recidivism rates of those treated in different programs by different methods do not differ from the rates of those not treated at all, whether in the U.S. or elsewhere. Attempts to rehabilitate need not be given up, although the result so far is discouraging. A way may yet be found. And even if it does not portend rehabilitation, humane treatment is always justified for its own sake, as is justice. However, given the evidence we now have we should no longer regard rehabilitation as a major purpose to which punishment is suited. Retribution, deterrence, and incapacitation should have priority. Let me quote from an extensive report to substantiate the above.

With few and isolated exceptions, the rehabilitative efforts that have been reported so far have had no appreciable effect on recidivism.

The survey was limited to the rehabilitation methods generally in use during the period from 1945 through 1967, including small caseloads on probation or parole, intensive supervision in specialized caseloads, early releases from confinement, variation in sentence length and degree of custody, casework and individual counseling, psychotherapy, group therapies of various kinds, so-called "milieu therapy," halfway houses, pre-release guidance centers, tranquilizing drugs, plastic surgery, and other factors. Methods not evaluated included work release, methadone maintenance, recent forms of so-called "behavior modification," and what have come to be called diversion methods.

The weight of the evidence is that the addition of treatment elements ("programs" of the kind evaluated) to the system has no appreciable effect in changing offenders into non-offenders.

Those placed on probation do no worse than those imprisoned and may do slightly better. Small caseloads on probation do no better than standard caseloads. Probation supervision (as currently practiced) is not an effective "treatment," i.e., does not substantially improve the behavior of those supervised over what would be expected. A large number of treatment programs took place outside prison. The burden of evidence is not encouraging.

Prof. Ulla Bondeson found in Sweden "that different methods of confinement do not create any different effects." Bondeson "compared four different types of correctional institutions; Christiansen, Moe & Sehnolt (1972) compared two different types of imprisonment; and Uusitalo (1972) compared open labor camps with closed prisons. The effects did not differ." Bondeson concludes: "Despite shorter terms of confinement, more open institutions, and more treatment resources given both during and after institutionalization, the Swedish correctional institution seems to produce recidivism rates as high as the American. . . ." (If drunken driving is excluded, the recidivism rates still remain as high as in the U.S.)

These results are not unknown, but unceasing efforts are being made to ignore or deny them. Thus, Dr. Seymour L. Halleck still insists that "rehabilitation is a more important goal than punishment." And the following revealing note appeared in New York magazine:

Theoretically, "work release" contributes to the rehabilitation of prison inmates by freeing them for outside jobs under certain conditions. The New York each judge than by the crime or the criminal. Gaylin might have spared himself the interviews by looking at any of the classical texts on criminal law. One reason Bentham advocated uniform sentencing standards determined by the crime and independent of the individual criminal was that sentences tailored to the criminal would necessarily be unequal and never above the suspicions of bias. Furthermore, he knew that the sentence would depend not on the criminal but on the judge who evaluates him. It would be unavoidably capricious. Yet physicians, psychiatrists, and psychoanalysts have long advocated discretionary procedures for the sake of rehabilitation. It is good that some of them finally have come to regret their advocacy. Gaylin concluded: "We must mechanize justice because we are not yet up to the love and understanding that is essential if discretion is to serve justice." "Not yet"—There is no reason to believe that we will ever be.

Post, for example . . . editorializes that "the repeater rate has been significantly cut; therefore so has crime." Nothing about the program could be further from the truth.

. . . More than one out of four in the program escape, a substantial number cause so much trouble that they're returned to prison; the recidivism rate for the program's "graduates" is so high that when it is combined with the other statistics, the probability is that "work release" participants are more likely to commit future crimes than the average prisoner released directly to the streets.

A large bureaucracy of professionals and quasi-professionals has gained a vested interest in "rehabilitative" activities on which its power, prestige, and income depend. Hence, the pressures for ever more "rehabilitation."

WHY REHABILITATION DOES NOT WORK

There are three major reasons for the failure of rehabilitation, even under favorable circumstances. In unfavorable circumstances prison may lead to criminalization more readily than to rehabilitation.

1. Only diseases can be cured by treatment. Few offenders are sick. There is no convincing independent evidence that convicts are more sick than non-convicts.<sup>6</sup> Those who feel that all offenders suffer from some disorder to be corrected by treatment confuse their moral disapproval with a clinical diagnosis. Theoretically, it seems likely that many offenses are rational acts on the part of the offender; to minimize offenses one must change not the offender but the cost-benefit ratios that cause offenses to be rational.

2. Even the offenders who are clinically sick—some certainly are—are not likely to be rehabilitated coercively. As Norval Morris puts it, "facilitated change" must replace "coerced cure"—i.e., the comforts of the prisoner and the duration of his incarceration must be entirely independent of his acceptance of a treatment program, which should be addressed only to those who want it. However, Prof. Morris has given no evidence of an available program that, if uncoerced, would be successful. It is one thing to point out that coerced rehabilitation does not work; it is quite another to show that if uncoerced it does work.

3. Rehabilitative treatment is necessarily ineffective, unless it follows or is part of independent retributive punishment for another reason as well. When a person decides sua sponte to undergo psychotherapy (or for that matter medical treatment), he does so because he is dissatisfied either with his state of mind—e.g., he may suffer from anxiety—or because he is dissatisfied with his own behavior. However dimly, he realizes that he does not achieve what he intends to or succeed in the relationships or careers he wants because he defeats himself, perhaps because of an unconscious conflict. He seeks treatment to help him decide what he wants and to help him achieve it.

In contrast, the offender's intention is defeated by his own behavior only inasmuch as it is punished. Otherwise he need have no reason for dissatisfaction. It is the punishment that makes his behavior unrewarding and thus, perhaps, causes him to wish to change it. Unless his offense is punished, his behavior need not be self-defeating or irrational; therefore he has no reason to desire the change that the psychiatrist might have helped him make had he desired it. To be a successful thief may be immoral, but it is not self-defeating or irrational. To be an unsuccessful one may be. A criminal becomes unsuccessful inasmuch as he is punished. Rehabilitative efforts make sense only if offenses are made unrewarding, self-defeating, irrational, and ultimately painful. Only punishment can achieve this.<sup>7</sup> Hence rehabilitation can follow, but it cannot take the place of punishment.

Senator HATCH. Our last witness this morning will be Dean Don M. Gottfredson of the School of Criminal Justice, Rutgers University at Newark, N.J.

Welcome to our committee.

<sup>7</sup> To be sure, there are offenders who offend because they unconsciously seek punishment. There is evidence for the existence of such offenders, but none to indicate that their number is significant or that the unconscious need for punishment is decisive in producing their offenses.

STATEMENT OF DON M. GOTTFREDSON, DEAN, SCHOOL OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY, NEWARK, N.Y.

Mr. GOTTFREDSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am very pleased to be here. I will summarize my prepared statement.

I have indicated in my prepared statement some of my credentials. The principle one, I think, that brings me here is some involvement with others in research on the topic of guidelines for paroling decisions and sentencing decisions.

Certainly I do appreciate the opportunity to testify about those parts of the bill that concern sentencing. I mainly wish to support the concept of the sentencing commission and adoption of a sentencing guideline system.

I would also like to offer some suggestions that I hope you will consider toward a more complete implementation of this concept.

The concept of sentencing guidelines as incorporated in this bill is derived from developments in the U.S. Parole Commission. About seven years ago, there was considerable criticism of that Commission, then the U.S. Parole Board, including arguments, as usual, that its decision-making practices were arbitrary, capricious, and disparate.

At about that time, a study began in close collaboration with the members of the U.S. Parole Board that developed as part of that research the concept of guidelines as now used throughout the U.S. Parole Board system.

I have summarized the nature of those guidelines in the written statement; but I will skip over that in the interest of time. I would like to urge the committee and committee staff to look closely at that experience in the U.S. Parole Board. I do think it provides a very useful model, all of the elements of which are not immediately apparent without a fairly thoughtful look at that experience.

A major advantage of this system is that its development requires the explicit description of paroling policy. Hence, it is open, public, and available for public review and criticism.

Indeed, a central feature of this system is its provision for repeated review and criticism. This allows for—and indeed invites—subjecting parole decision-making criteria now in use to rigorous scrutiny with respect to both the moral and effectiveness issues raised. The moral issues then may be debated more readily; the effectiveness issues may be tested.

I should have mentioned that these studies of parole and sentencing were done with assistance from the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

A similar program is underway with a number of State paroling authorities and is nearly completed. Seven state parole boards have been involved in that. I could mention quickly that, in four of those, guidelines are now being implemented. Those are the states of North Carolina, Missouri, Louisiana, and Virginia. Also, the paroling authority in Minnesota has adopted and is using a very similar guidelines model.

The concept that a paroling authority or a judiciary may develop guidelines for use in their decision-making is in conflict with the be-belief that these decision makers require only the individual wisdom of the board member or judge whose determination should be in no way restricted.

That is, it is inconsistent with the idea of complete, unbridled discretion for each board member or judge. Similarly, the concept of guidelines conflicts with the belief that paroling authorities or judges should exercise no discretion in determining the timing or mode or release from prison, the length of stay in confinement, or the choice of alternative sentences.

Thus, two quite different viewpoints are simultaneously rejected as a beginning point for the guidelines concept incorporated in the parole guidelines and in the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977.

These are the belief, on the one hand, that sentences should be entirely fixed by statute, leaving no room to maneuver on the part of the judge or paroling authority; and, on the other hand, the belief that the sentence should be wholly indeterminate, leaving it to expert authority.

The former viewpoint generally would be associated with those who argue for mandatory sentencing, with sentences fixed by the Congress or legislatures; while the latter view would be the extreme limit of a treatment philosophy undergirding the concept of indeterminate sentencing.

If discretion in sentencing is not to be wholly eliminated, then some mechanism for its structure and control and for explicit statement of sentencing policy is needed.

Such a system has been demonstrated to be feasible, not only in the case of parole decisions, but in sentencing as well. Similar guidelines now have been developed and found to be feasible in a study completed in collaboration with several state courts. A guidelines model is briefly described in my statement; it is in use in the courts of Denver, Colorado.

On the basis of this experience, I believe the establishment of a sentencing commission and the development of guidelines as proposed in the bill to be feasible and to offer the potential for markedly increased equity in sentencing. I would like to suggest, however, some specific changes in the bill.

In paragraph 2301, concerning the sentence of imprisonment, in subparagraph C, about authorized terms of parole ineligibility, the imprisonment that may be required to be served before eligibility for parole is any term found appropriate by the court in the light of the provisions of the offense class categorization, although no term of parole ineligibility may extend into the last one-tenth of the sentence imposed.

This has a potential for markedly increasing time to be served in confinement, exacerbating problems of prison overcrowding by increasing sanctions in ways not apparently intended by the authors of the bill. This provision could very radically reduce the range of discretion of the Parole Commission, virtually abolishing parole.

There is, of course, as we have seen yesterday and today, a continuing national debate on this topic. Parole boards continued to be criticized on one of three grounds: either on procedural grounds, on the uncertainty issue, or on effectiveness issues.

I would like to point out that the guidelines model at least partially addresses the first two of the principal concerns.

The general issue of parole abolishment is one that should be addressed and resolved by the Congress after full study of the potential consequences. It should not be resolved by a sentencing commission such as proposed. That is, the question of parole retention or abolishment is a critical structural issue that will affect the entire criminal justice system, not just sentencing.

Parole decisions occupy a keystone position in the process. Changes in the structure may be expected to affect prosecution decisions, including plea bargaining, and prisons in very significant ways.

There are several points in the bill—and I have mentioned these in a little bit more detail in the written statement—that seem to me inconsistent in the sense that they do not reflect a full implementation of the guidelines model proposed as a kind of centerpiece in this bill.

I have reference, for example, to the section that discusses pre-trial release. The general decision problem is the same in that circumstance as in sentencing. There seems to be no reason that guidelines for pre-trial release cannot be developed providing a specific policy for use in determining a release before trial.

Similarly, in the section discussing juvenile delinquency, some general parameters to the initial decision as to detention of juveniles are listed. Again, it would seem desirable to, by some means, develop guidelines to structure and control this important decision.

Similarly, at the point in which the youth has been adjudicated to be delinquent, alternative dispositions are noted; but it is not specified that guidelines for this decision shall be developed and promulgated.

If increased equity in sentencing of adults is desired, surely we wish the same for children. These would be a question about the appropriate body to develop and promulgate these guidelines. I do not have a recommendation about that.

When the consideration of a prisoner for release on parole is considered, it seems to me that the relation between the present parole commission and the sentencing commission is rather unclear.

Surely, as we have seen, there will be those who will argue that, with a development and implementation of the sentencing commission and guidelines model, the parole commission and the parole function can be eliminated. I believe that this would be unwise and that the present parole commission structure should be retained.

The sentencing guidelines can reduce unwarranted disparity, but they cannot ensure its elimination. With nearly 400 judges interpreting the use of the guidelines developed, considerable room for such disparity remains. Envisioned as a two-step process with both the judiciary and the paroling authority operating under explicit policy, a coordinated increase in sentencing equity can be foreseen.

The broad limits can be set by the Congress. The sentencing guidelines can somewhat limit and better control the exercise of discretion by the judges. A smaller body operating also under explicit statements of policy provided by the guidelines can, in the end, best determine the actual time to be served in prison.

I briefly discuss in the prepared statement the composition of the committee. My comments are very similar to those of Judge Frankel in terms of the general issue that sentencing concerns the whole criminal justice system. I propose, also, the presidential appointment process.

In summary, I want to say mainly that it is a feasible concept. It is demonstrably feasible by the experience in the United States Parole Board, other parole boards in the United States, and in the one sentencing study that I mentioned.

I would like to congratulate Senators McClellan and Kennedy for inclusion of that concept in the bill and to congratulate the committee for its attention to these important issues.

I thank you again for the chance to be with you, sir.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

Your prepared statement will be made a part of the record.

TESTIMONY OF DON M. GOTTFREDSON, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
JUNE 8, 1977

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Don M. Gottfredson. I am the Dean of the School of Criminal Justice at Rutgers University in Newark, New Jersey. Previously, I was Director of the Research Center of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency at Davis, California. I have been a consultant, advisor, or member of various national and state commissions or task forces on delinquency, crime and criminal justice, am Chairman of the New Jersey Correctional Master Plan Policy Council and a Fellow of the National Center for Juvenile Justice of the National Council of Juvenile Court Judges. With others I have done research on the topic of guidelines for parole and sentencing decisions. In this testimony, I speak only for myself.

The opportunity of testifying about the aspects of S.1437 that concern sentencing is appreciated. I mainly wish to support the concept of the sentencing commission and the adoption of a sentencing guideline system. I would like also to offer some suggestions that I hope you will consider toward a more complete implementation of this concept.

The concept of sentencing guidelines as incorporated in this bill is derived from developments in the United States Parole Commission. About seven years ago there was considerable criticism of that Commission (then the United States Board of Parole) including arguments that its decision-making practices were arbitrary, capricious and disparate. The Board began a pilot project in 1972 that included hearings by panels of hearing examiners, the providing of written reasons in cases of parole denial, an administrative review process, and the use of guidelines for decision-making. Previously, the Board had no written general policy providing a frame-work within which its individual case decisions were made. The decision-making procedures developed were expanded in October, 1974 to all federal parole decisions.

The guidelines developed by study of the decisions of the Board in the prior year, were designed to structure and control the Board's discretion. They were developed in close collaboration with the Board in a study of parole decision-making (funded by the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration) for which I was responsible together with Professor Leslie T. Wilkins of the School of Criminal Justice at the State University of New York in Albany.<sup>1</sup> These guidelines were based on the research finding that the main considerations of the Board were for the seriousness of the offense, the risk of recidivism, if paroled, and the inmates institutional behavior.

The guidelines now used by the Parole Commission are in the form of a two dimensional chart. On one dimension, the seriousness of the offender's commitment offense is considered. Six categories of offense seriousness are designated, and for each the Commission has listed examples of common offense behaviors for that category, arrived at by consensus judgments of the Commission

Members. On the other dimension, four categories of parole prognosis or "risk" (of parole violation) are defined. These classifications of offenders were established by an empirically developed parole prediction device, called a "salient factor score," used as an aid in making prognosis assessments. For each combination of offense seriousness category and offender (salient factor score) class, a decision range is provided. This decision range specifies the customary paroling policy in terms of the number of months to be served before release (subject to the limitations of the judicially imposed sentence) assuming that the prisoner has demonstrated good institutional behavior. After the offender is classified according to both offense seriousness and risk of parole violation if released, the parole board member or hearing examiner checks the table to determine the expected decision. The guidelines define the usual policy. A range of months is used in order to allow for some variation within broad seriousness and risk categories. Should the decision-maker wish to make the decision outside the expected range, then he or she is required to specify the factors that made that particular case unusual (such as particular aggravating or mitigating circumstances, unusually good or poor institutional adjustment, or credit for time spent in a sentence of another jurisdiction). Decisions outside the specified guideline ranges are not only permitted but expected; and they are taken in about twenty percent of the cases, with specific reasons given.

Since it was thought that use of the guidelines could induce rigidity, just as the absence of guidelines could produce disparity, the Commission adopted two basic procedures for examining, modifying and updating them. First, the Commission may modify any guideline category at any time. Second, at six month intervals the Board is given feedback from the decision-making of the previous six months and examines each category to see whether the median time served has changed significantly. At these policy meetings, feedback is provided the Board concerning the percentage of decisions falling outside each guideline category and the reasons given for these decisions. This serves two purposes: the reasons for the deviations from the guidelines may be examined to consider their appropriateness, and the percentages of decisions within and outside the guidelines for each category can be evaluated to determine whether the discretion range for the category is appropriate. That is, too high a percentage of decisions outside the guideline range without adequate explanation may indicate either that a wider range is thought necessary or that the hearing panels are inappropriately exceeding their discretionary limits. On the other hand, a very high percentage of decisions within the guidelines may indicate a mechanical application with excessive rigidity. The guidelines themselves cannot provide answers to these questions of policy. But by articulating the weights given to the major criteria considered, explicit decision guidelines permit assessment of the rationality and appropriateness of parole board policy. In individual cases they structure and control discretion, thus strengthening equity, without eliminating that degree of discretion thought necessary.

A major advantage of this system is that its development requires the explicit description of paroling policy. Hence, it is open, public, and available for public review and criticism. Indeed, a central feature of the system is its provision for repeated review and revision. This allows for, and indeed invites, subjecting parole decision-making criteria now in use to rigorous scrutiny with respect to both the moral and effectiveness issues raised. The moral issues may be debated more readily; the effectiveness issues can be tested. Recent legislation (Public Law 94-233) has codified this administratively developed system (effective May 14, 1976).

Similar work also with Law Enforcement Assistance Administration support has been undertaken recently in a number of state paroling authorities; these are the parole boards in Washington State, The California Youth Authority, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, Missouri and Louisiana. In the latter four state parole boards guidelines now are being implemented. Also, the paroling authority in Minnesota has developed and is using similar guidelines.

The concept that a paroling authority or the judiciary may develop guidelines for use in their decision-making processes is in conflict with the belief that these decision-makers require only the individual wisdom of the board member or judge whose determination should be in no way restricted. That is, it is inconsistent with the idea of complete unbridled discretion for each board member or judge in determination of the decision outcome. Similarly, the concept of guidelines conflicts with the belief that paroling authorities or judges should exercise no discretion in determining the timing of or mode of release from prison, the length of stay in confinement, or the choice of alternative sentences. Thus, two quite different viewpoints are simultaneously rejected as a beginning point for the guidelines concept incorporated in the parole guidelines and in the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977. These are the belief on one hand that sentences should be entirely fixed by statute, leaving no room to maneuver on the part of the judge or the paroling authority, and on the other hand, the belief that the sentence should be wholly indeterminate, leaving it to expert authority. The former viewpoint generally would be associated with those who argue for mandatory sentencing with sentences fixed by the Congress or legislatures, while the latter view would be the extreme limit of a treatment philosophy undergirding the concept of indeterminate sentencing. If discretion in sentencing is not to be wholly eliminated, then some mechanism for its structure and control and for explicit statement of sentencing policy is desirable.

Such a system has been demonstrated to be feasible not only in the case of parole decisions, but in sentencing as well. Similar guidelines now have been developed and found to be feasible in a study completed in collaboration with several state courts.<sup>9</sup> Following similar procedures and working in collaboration with representatives of the Denver, Colorado Court, the Vermont State Courts, the Polk County Court, and the Essex County, Newark, New Jersey Court, analogous guidelines were developed and are now being implemented in the Denver Court. These guideline models include, for each class of offense, classifications of seriousness (on the one hand) and of the offender (with respect to prior convictions, legal status, and other items) on the other. A report of this study includes more detail about the development and use of these guidelines.

On the basis of this experience, I believe the establishment of a sentencing commission and the development of guidelines as proposed in S.1437 to be feasible and to offer the potential for markedly increased equity in sentencing. I would like to suggest, however, some specific changes in the bill.

In paragraph 2006, concerning orders of restitution, it would be preferable that line 11 read "in addition to or instead of" the sentence that is imposed. This change (i.e., adding "instead of") would encourage judges to use restitution in appropriate instances as an alternative to confinement rather than always as an addition to other sentences imposed (as now implied).

In paragraph 2301, concerning the sentence of imprisonment, in sub-paragraph (C) concerning authorized terms of parole ineligibility, the imprisonment that may be required to be served before eligibility for parole is any term found appropriate by the court in the light of the provisions of the offense class categorization, although no term of parole ineligibility may extend into the last one-tenth of the sentence imposed. This has a potential for markedly increasing time to be served in confinement, exacerbating problems of prison over-crowding by increasing sanctions in ways not apparently intended by the authors of the bill. This provision could very radically reduce the range of discretion of the Parole Commission, virtually abolishing parole. There is, of course, a continuing national debate on this topic. Parole boards continue to be criticized on three general grounds. These have to do with procedures (including issues of fairness, equity and due process concerns), with adverse effects of uncertainty, and with the issue of effectiveness in regard to criminal justice goals. The first two issues are at least partially addressed by paroling guidelines. The general issue of parole abolishment is one that should be addressed and resolved by the Congress after full study of the potential consequences. It should not be resolved by a sentencing commission such as proposed. That is, the question of parole retention or abolishment is a critical structural issue that will affect the entire criminal justice system—not just sentencing. Parole decisions occupy a keystone position in the process; and changes in the structure may be expected to affect prosecution decisions (including plea bargaining) and prisons in very significant ways.

<sup>9</sup>Wilkins, Leslie T., Kress, Jack M., Gottfredson, Don M., Calpin, Joseph C., and Gelman, Arthur M., Sentencing Guidelines: Structuring Judicial Discretion, Albany, New York: Criminal Justice Research Center, October, 1976. See also, Kress, Jack M., Wilkins, Leslie T., and Gottfredson, Don M., "Is the End of Judicial Sentencing in Sight?" Judicature, 60, 5, December, 1976, 216-222.

In paragraph 2302, concerning imposition of a sentence of imprisonment, and sub-paragraph (C) it is indicated that the court "for extraordinary and compelling reasons" may reduce imprisonment to the time that the defendant has served; it would seem preferable that this read "the court, for stated extraordinary and compelling reasons . . ."

In Chapter 35, concerning release and confinement pending judicial proceedings, release pending trial in a non-capital case is discussed in paragraph 3502. Although release conditions are described and factors to be taken account in determining release are presented generally, it is not indicated that guidelines for these release decisions are to be developed by the sentencing commission. The general decision problem is the same as in sentencing; and there seems to be no reason that guidelines for pre-trial release cannot be developed, providing a specific policy for use in determining release before trial. For example, guidelines structured according to the seriousness of the alleged offense and the likelihood of the defendant's appearance for trial could be developed and used to increase equity in these decisions as well. Whether or not such guidelines should be developed by the sentencing commission or by another body is an issue that should be explored.

Similarly, in paragraph 3603, juvenile delinquency proceedings are discussed. In determining whether allegedly delinquent youth taken into custody shall be detained or released, general criteria are listed. Again, it would seem desirable to develop guidelines to structure and control this important decision. In sub-paragraph (E), concerning the disposition when the court finds a youth to be a juvenile delinquent, alternative dispositions are noted; but it is not specified that guidelines for this decision shall be developed and promulgated by the sentencing commission. If increased equity in sentencing of adults is desired, surely we wish the same for children. The appropriate body for determining such guidelines is again an important question.

In paragraph 3831, the consideration of a prisoner for release on parole is considered. Although the Parole Commission and its recent reforms in parole decision-making would be retained, the relation of that body to the sentencing commission seems unclear. Surely there will be those who argue that with the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977 and creation of a sentencing commission, the parole function may be eliminated. I believe that this would be unwise and that the present Parole Commission structure should be retained. The sentencing guidelines can reduce unwarranted disparity, but they cannot ensure its elimination. With nearly 400 federal judges interpreting the use of the guidelines developed and promulgated by the sentencing commission, considerable room for such disparity remains. Envisioned as a two-step process, with both the judiciary and the paroling authority operating under explicit policies, a coordinated increase in sentencing equity can be foreseen. The broad limits can be set by the Congress, the sentencing guidelines can somewhat limit and better control the exercise of discretion by the judges, and a smaller body, operating also under explicit statements of policy provided by the guidelines, can in the end best determine the actual time to be served in prison. If the Parole Commission were to be eliminated, it probably would be found necessary to invent something like it within the Bureau of Prisons, for example, to determine such releases as provided for in paragraph 3822, concerning the temporary release of the prisoner for short terms or for participation in training or educational programs in a community or for work.

In paragraph 991, the United States Sentencing Commission is established. The bill is silent on the qualifications of the nine members to be designated by the Judicial Conference of the United States to serve on the sentencing commission. It seems highly desirable that a number of these persons should be those who generally are involved in day-to-day sentencing or paroling decisions. But sentencing is not a matter of concern to judges alone. It may be wise that the commission be broadened by requiring the appointment of a small number of additional members representing other aspects of the criminal justice system, including the areas of prosecution and corrections. Such appointments could be made by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

In sub-paragraph (F) of paragraph 994 concerning the duties of the commission, it is indicated that the sentencing commission "shall promulgate and distribute to the United States Parole Commission" guidelines . . . for use . . . in determining whether to parole a prisoner and in determining the length of the term and conditions of parole. If this section stands, it would seem desirable to have one or more members of the parole commission on the sentencing commission. It may be preferable to simply leave the present parole commission structure intact.

Two aspects of the powers of the commission, spelled out in paragraph 995, deserve rather to be listed as duties of that commission in paragraph 994. Particularly, it should be the duty of the commission to monitor the use of guidelines, including the giving of reasons outside the ranges specified, and the conducting of regular reviews, in order to modify the policy statements as needed. No matter how excellent the guidelines initially developed may be, as changes occur in the environment in which they are imbedded, they will become out of date. The guidelines structure probably should not be considered if it does not have built into it a system for the guidelines modification. Thus, it is necessary that the sentencing commission be admonished to invent the guidelines system as an evolutionary process. To be most useful, the guidelines procedures themselves ought to be continuously under review and the results of such review must determine modifications in the original design of the guidelines system. The guidelines system may be designed, but there must also be designed a system to continuously redesign the design. Similarly, the commission is empowered, in paragraph 995, to establish a research and development program and to conduct training and short term instruction for judicial and probation personnel and others. These functions too should be listed as duties.

In summary, the concept of decision guidelines has been demonstrated to be feasible in the area of parole and in at least one state court. Such guidelines have considerable potential for formulation of a consistent general sentencing policy. By articulating the weights given to the main criteria considered, it can allow interested publics to assess the rationality and appropriateness of the policy set out by the judiciary and paroling authorities. In individual case decision-making, the method provides for structuring and controlling discretion without eliminating it and thereby holds considerable promise for sentencing improvement particularly with respect to issues of fairness or equity.

I would like to congratulate Senators McClellan and Kennedy for inclusion of this concept in S.1437 and congratulate the committee for its attention to the bill as a whole including this needed and promising sentencing reform. I urge you to include the sentencing commission and guidelines concept in the final version, with the modifications suggested. I very much appreciated the opportunity to testify. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. You, of course, have extensive experience in the practical difficulties of formulating and implementing guidelines. I think you have described the proven feasibility of sentencing guidelines in other jurisdictions.

Do you think the guidelines contemplated by this bill can, in fact, be promulgated and used by the Federal courts?

Mr. GOTTFREDSON. I do believe it is a feasible thing. I believe it is a complex, difficult task.

I note with some trepidation the 24 months at the end of the bill when this would take effect.

I believe that could be realistic. I think you would have to insure adequate funding for that exercise. I believe that the best development of those guidelines, no matter what the composition of the sentencing commission, will necessarily involve active collaboration by judges in that activity. It will involve a good bit of educational work and training about the concept with judges. It will require quite a lot of data collection and analysis.

I think it is conceivable that good progress can be made during that 2-year period. It is at least conceptually possible that that could be sufficient time.

If the committee and the Congress were to take me quite seriously in the other recommendations about other parts of the criminal justice system and the juvenile justice system, I think that becomes considerably complex. I think that probably it would be necessary to embark upon separate studies in each of those areas to determine how those guidelines ought to be developed and used.

Senator HATCH. Thank you again. We appreciate your appearance and your testimony here today.

We will recess these hearings until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

HEARING ON REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

---

THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1977

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURE
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10 a.m. in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Orrin Hatch (acting chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senator Thurmond.

Staff present: Paul C. Summitt, chief counsel; D. Eric Hultman, minority counsel; Paul H. Robinson, counsel; Michael M. Hunter, legislative counsel to Senator Hatch; and Mabel A. Downey, chief clerk.

Senator HATCH [acting chairman]. The subcommittee hearing will come to order.

We have had exceptional witnesses this week in what we consider to be extremely urgent and important changes in the criminal laws of the United States of America, in particular S. 1437 and other proposed legislation we are considering at this time.

We are particularly honored to have another distinguished group of witnesses this morning to testify before the subcommittee.

We will begin this morning with Mr. Harold D. Koffsky, a consultant to the Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law, who will introduce Judge Zirpoli's statement.

We will then hear from Judge Gerald B. Tjoffat, chairman of the Committee on the Administration of the Probation System, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Following him, we will call on Judge William H. Webster, of the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

We are very honored to have these men with us this morning, representing the Judicial Conference of the United States.

Mr. Koffsky?

STATEMENT OF HON. ALFONSO J. ZIRPOLI, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES AND JUDGE, U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, REPRESENTED BY HAROLD D. KOFFSKY, CONSULTANT TO THE COMMITTEE ON THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. KOFFSKY. Thank you, Senator.

Judge Zirpoli has asked me to come up here and present his statement for the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it will be entered into the record at the conclusion of your testimony.

Mr. KOFFSKY. Judge Zirpoli wrote the chairman of the subcommittee expressing his extreme regrets at not being able to be here but explained that his judicial commitments prevented him from doing so and, also, that anything he might say would reiterate the statements of Judge Tjofflat and Judge Webster.

He endorses everything they are going to say. Up until now, he has been the spokesman for the Judicial Conference on S. 1437 and of predecessors. But these other committees have particular expertness in the field, and he felt that it would save the time of this committee, if he deferred to their statements.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Koffsky.

[Material follows:]

STATEMENT OF ALFONSO J. ZIRPOLI, SENIOR UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. Chairman, I am Senior United States District Judge Alfonso J. Zirpoli, Chairman of the Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law of the Judicial Conference of the United States. As such representative of the Judicial Conference, I wish to thank the Chairman for the privilege accorded the judiciary to express its views on Senate bill 1437.

Since January of 1971, at the direction of the Judicial Conference, our Committee has been engaged in a continuous study of the Brown Commission Report, Senate bill 1, and the many House versions thereof, and we are presently engaged in a similar study of Senate bill 1437, which should be completed by late July of this year for submission to the Judicial Conference at its September meeting. Hence, in commenting on the bill before you my colleagues and I must for the most part utilize past positions of the Conference.

Commencing in April, 1973, we have made five reports to the Senate Judiciary Committee and in March of this year we submitted a report to the House Judiciary Committee. In those reports the Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law focused its primary attention on the provisions of Senate 1, now incorporated in Senate 1437, covering "General Provisions and Principles" found in Part I and "Offenses of General Application" found in Chapter 10 of Part II. On the provisions of the bill relating to sentencing, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and utilization of magistrates we have bowed to the superior expertise of the Conference committees having primary responsibility in these respective areas. Hence, the position of the judiciary on sentencing and appellate review of sentences will be presented at this meeting by Judge Gerald B. Tjofflat, a member of the Conference Committee on the Administration of the Probation System, and Judge William B. Webster, a member of the Conference Advisory Committee on the Criminal Rules.

While our Committee has yet to complete its study of Senate 1437 and submit its recommendations to the Conference, I feel reasonably certain that our recommendations will conform to those to be made by my colleagues, Judges Tjoflat and Webster.

With your kind indulgence, I should like to make one further observation. Because the primary concern of our Committee centers on Part I and Chapter 10 of Part II of the bill and the impact that the interpretation and execution of such provisions on the day-to-day operations of the courts and the fairness of their procedures, we trust and respectfully pray that before this committee gives its final approval to Senate bill 1437, it will give further consideration to the views and recommendations made by the Conference in its last report relating to:

1. General Principles of Construction, § 112;
2. Culpable States of Mind, § 302;
3. Bars to Prosecution, § 511(e);
4. Criminal Conspiracy, § 1002;
5. Criminal Solicitation, § 1003;
6. The Federal Civil Commitment of Offenders with Mental Disease or Defect, §§ 3611-3617;
7. The need for amendments to the Bail Reform Act of 1966, § 3502;
8. The need to amend the Speedy Trial Act of 1974 to make the exclusions of section 3161(h) applicable to the interim time limits of section 3164;
9. The failure of Senate 1437 to include the provisions of the Youth Corrections Act which would give the courts discretionary authority to set aside convictions under appropriate circumstances; and
10. The effective date of the proposed Act.

Mr. Harold D. Koffsky, consultant to our Committee who submits this statement in my behalf, is prepared to offer any assistance you or the members of your staff may require of him and I shall, of course, be happy to comply with any request you may make of me.

Respectfully submitted.

STATEMENT OF HON. GERALD B. TJOFLAT, MEMBER, COMMITTEE ON THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE PROBATION SYSTEM OF THE JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES AND JUDGE, U.S. COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT

Judge TJOFLAT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am Gerald B. Tjoflat, and I have been a U.S. Circuit Judge for the Fifth Circuit since December 1975. I served as United States District Judge for the Middle District of Florida from October 1970 until my appointment to the appellate bench. From June 1968 until October 1970, I was a judge of the Circuit Court, Fourth Judicial Circuit of Florida.

Since January of this year, I have been a member of the Advisory Corrections Council authorized by 18 U.S.C. 5002. Since January 1973, I have been a member of the Judicial Conference Committee on the Administration of the Probation System.

The Probation Committee was established as a standing committee of the Conference in 1963. It has oversight responsibility for the organization and work of the federal probation system and the formulation and conduct of sentencing institutes for judges and others, as authorized by 28 U.S.C. 334.

As a member of that committee and at the request of its chairman, I appear before you today to address S. 1437, a bill to codify, revise, and reform the federal criminal code.

I have reviewed those portions of S. 1437 that have reference to the concerns of the Probation Committee: namely, the sentencing provisions and the provisions relating to the agencies that carry out the sentences—the Federal Probation System, the Bureau of Prisons, and the U.S. Parole Commission.

At your request, I shall limit my testimony to sections appearing at pages 167 to 179, 256 to 274, and 301 to 307 of the bill. I shall comment on those sections in the order in which they appear.

As you know, neither the Judicial Conference nor the Committee on the Administration of the Probation System has had the opportunity to consider or render an expression of views on this legislative proposal. However, the committee has considered previous versions of this legislative proposal and made certain recommendations.

Throughout my testimony, I shall identify those statements that are based on previous recommendations by the committee or the conference.

I have reviewed all of part III, pages 167 to 179, and shall restrict my comments to those sections where I recommend change.

Section 2001, authorized sentences, subsection (b) authorizes sentences for an individual of probation, fine, or imprisonment. Since its review of the report of the Brown Commission and the subsequent legislative proposals, the Probation Committee has consistently recommended that there be provision for a sentence of unconditional discharge without imprisonment, fine, or probation.

The courts presently have the power to effect such a sentence by imposing imprisonment for a period of less than 1 full day, ordering probation for 1 day, or imposing a nominal fine. A sentence of unconditional discharge would take public notice of and authorize this informal practice.

Senator HATCH. I think that is a very good point. I am sure the committee will be cognizant of your suggestions in that regard.

Judge TJOFLAT. We don't think it would disturb the spirit of the bill at all.

Senator HATCH. And it certainly allows the judge some leeway in a situation which merits that type of treatment.

I commend you for bringing that to the attention of the committee.

Judge TJOFLAT. Thank you.

Subsection (a) of section 2002, presentence reports, indicates that a probation officer shall make a presentence investigation of a defendant "found guilty of an offense."

I recommend striking the language "found guilty of an offense," thereby removing the limitation that a presentence investigation can be conducted only on a convicted person.

Rule 32 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure authorizes the conduct of a presentence investigation prior to conviction. The only restriction has been that the report's contents could not be disclosed to anyone, including the court, before conviction.

Recent amendments to rule 32 and rule 11 provide for the investigation to be conducted and the report to be considered in connection with a plea agreement. In actual practice, approximately one-third of all presentence investigations are conducted prior to conviction.

Subsection (c) provides that as part of the presentence examination process, the court may order a psychiatric examination by "two or more examiners."

I recommend that provision be changed to "examination by one or more examiners where there is no issue of mental disease or defect but the court simply wants psychiatric guidance in shaping the sentence."

Speaking from my experience as a district court judge, one psychiatric report should be sufficient in a case—except the most unusual—that reaches the sentencing stage. Issues of mental disease or defect have generally been resolved before conviction.

Senator HATCH. I think that is another excellent point, and I hope that the staff will look at that.

We should be able to have preguilty plea reports or presentence reports as needed by the courts.

Judge TJOFLAT. Subsection (a) (3) of section 2003, imposition of a sentence, requires that the court consider the sentencing range established by the sentencing commission in effect “on the date the defendant committed the offense.”

It would seem more practical for the court to consider guidelines that were in effect at the time of sentencing.

Determining what guidelines were in effect at the time of the offense could prove difficult if there had been a significant delay in prosecution and conviction. Using the incorrect guidelines could result in appeal.

Finally, it seems that the whole justification for guidelines is based on their currency. Guidelines are supposed to reflect the best information available at that time about the effectiveness of sentencing. It would seem to me that using old guidelines in current sentencing could increase rather than decrease disparity.

Subsection (b) requires the court to state general reasons for imposition of a particular sentence and, if the sentence is outside the range of the guidelines issued by the sentencing commission, the reason for imposition of a sentence outside the range.

The Probation Committee has consistently opposed the requirement for statements of reason for particular sentences as provided by the previous versions of this legislative proposal.

I note that the language of subsection (b) calls for “general reasons” as opposed to the very detailed and specific reasons that have been required in the previous versions and would have, without question, been an open invitation to wholesale appeal.

Unfortunately, the committee as a whole has not had an opportunity to review this particular section. I recognize that it is a vital element, and I am certain they would find it more acceptable than the previous proposal.

Section 2006, order of restitution, provides that in addition to any other sentence that is imposed, the court can order that the defendant “make direct restitution to a victim” in an amount and manner set by the court.

I recommend that the word “direct” be stricken, thereby allowing the court to order collection and disbursement by the clerk of the court. This will provide for the monitoring process necessary for notification of the Attorney General in the event the defendant fails to pay the restitution.

Subsection (a) of section 2101, sentence of probation, establishes restrictions on the court’s ability to sentence a defendant to a term of probation. The Probation Committee has consistently recommended that no offender should be excluded from consideration for probation. Therefore, I recommend striking the three general restrictions.

Subsection (b) (1) establishes a minimum term of 1-year probation for a felony. Here, again, the committee feels that the sentencing judge should have the latitude to set any term of probation within a maximum period authorized by law. Therefore, I recommend eliminating the 1-year minimum term.

Subsection (a) of Section 2103, Conditions of Probation, provides one mandatory condition of probation: that the defendant not commit another crime during the term of probation.

I recommend the inclusion of the following conditions as mandatory conditions: Report to a probation officer at reasonable times as directed by the court or the probation officer; Permit the probation officer to visit at reasonable times and hours at the place of residence or elsewhere; Answer truthfully all reasonable inquiries by the probation officer; Notify the probation officer promptly of any change in situation, residence, or employment; Obtain permission of probation officer to leave the judicial district; Follow the probation officer's instructions; and Inform the probation officer immediately if arrested or questioned by a law enforcement officer.

These are the conditions of probation that the committee has recommended that the district courts adopt as general conditions of probation. If these conditions are adopted as mandatory conditions, you should delete numbers 15 through 18 of the discretionary conditions listed at subsection (b) of this section.

With further regard to the discretionary conditions at subsection (b), I recommend the inclusion of one that would provide for participation in an alcohol or drug treatment program as a condition of probation in an appropriate case.

Subsection (b) of section 2104, running of a term of probation, indicates that the term of probation shall "not run during any period in which the defendant is imprisoned in connection with a conviction of a Federal, State, or local crime."

This section should be modified to make it clear that this does not include a period of imprisonment imposed as a condition of probation under section 2103 (b) (11). There should be some guidance as to what constitutes imprisonment.

Is it the intent of Congress that probation should be tolled during short-term sentences for minor offenses? Computing the term of a probationer confined for short terms for traffic or similar petty offenses could present an administrative problem. It could create honest uncertainty in everyone's mind whether the offender was still on probation and could become a crucial issue in determining jurisdiction at the time of a subsequent violation. I recommend the court retain authority to toll the term of probation.

Subsection (c) prohibits the court's terminating probation in a felony case until after one year. The Probation Committee has recommended that the one-year limitation be stricken and that the court have the latitude to terminate probation at any time in any case.

Section 2302, imposition of a sentence of imprisonment, subsection (c) gives the court authority to reduce the imposed term of imprisonment or term of parole ineligibility to time served upon motion of the Director of the Bureau of Prisons and for "extraordinary and compelling reasons."

I recommend that the words "extraordinary and compelling reasons" be stricken. This will leave the court with the authority it now has under the recently enacted Parole Commission and Reorganization Act, 18 U.S.C. 4205.

I have reviewed all of chapter 38, pages 258 to 274, and, again, shall comment on only those sections where I recommend change.

Section 3801, supervision of probation: I suggest you amend this section to provide for supervision of a juvenile who has been placed on probation under chapter 36.

Section 3802, subsection (a), appointment of probation officers, provides that a court may, in its discretion, remove a probation officer previously appointed. The Probation Committee has previously recommended that this provision be amended by striking "in its discretion" and substituting "for cause."

Subsection (c) provides that if a court appoints more than one probation officer, one may be designated by the court as chief probation officer and shall direct the work of all probation officers serving in the court.

The Probation Committee recommends that you strike the phrase "in the court" at the end of that sentence and substitute "in the judicial district." This will make clear that there will be only one chief probation officer in a judicial district.

Finally, I would ask that you add to that section the authority for the appointment of volunteer probation officers now found in 18 U.S.C. 3654.

The Federal Probation System has a long history of significant contributions by volunteers, including persons serving in that capacity while under internship programs for advanced degrees in the social sciences. As you know, there is a prohibition against accepting volunteer services without statutory authority. The Probation Committee does not want to lose that authority.

Subsection (g) of section 3803, duties of probation officers, requires a probation officer to "perform any duty with respect to a person on parole that the Parole Commission may designate."

The committee has recommended that this subsection be amended to further provide that a probation officer "perform preparole investigations and any duty with respect to a person on parole, and so forth."

Section 3832(b) provides that a probation officer shall prepare a preparole report on request of the Parole Commission. I feel, however, that this responsibility should be stated specifically within this list of duties of probation officers.

I recommend another subsection requiring that a probation officer "shall, upon request of the Attorney General or his designee, furnish information about, and supervision of, persons within the custody of the Attorney General while on work release, furlough, or other authorized release from their regular place of confinement."

This additional duty was considered in the form of a legislative proposal drafted by the Department of Justice and approved by the Judicial Conference at its April 1972 meeting. Incorporation of this duty in the statute would give authority to actual practice. Probation officers for some time have performed this duty.

Section 3805, transfer of jurisdiction over a probationer, provides a procedure for the transfer of jurisdiction of a probationer from one district to any other district to which he "is required to proceed as a condition of his probation."

This language is restrictive and does not cover the majority of instances where a transfer from one district to another is not effected as a condition of probation. I recommend that you substitute the word "goes" for "is required to proceed as a condition of his probation."

Section 3806, arrest and return of a probationer, provides for the arrest of a probationer and his immediate return before the court having jurisdiction. I find no provision for the issuance of a summons or warrant for probation violation.

Therefore, I recommend the following language which is a modification of that now found in 18 U.S.C. 3653:

At any time within the probation period, the court having jurisdiction over the probationer may issue a summons or a warrant for his arrest for violation of probation occurring during the probation period. A probationer, when arrested for violation of probation, shall be taken without unnecessary delay before the court having jurisdiction over him.

I recommend the addition of two sections to this subchapter. The first relates to what I assume was an omission in the drafting of the proposal—the duties of the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States courts with relationship to the Federal probation system as found now at 18 U.S.C. 3656. This appeared in previous versions of this proposal.

I recommend that the entire section 18 U.S.C. 3656 be included at this point.

The committee has recommended one additional duty; that is, that the director be required to:

Collect, publish, and disseminate to the U.S. Sentencing Commission—to each judge and probation officer—statistical and other information concerning Federal sentencing practices, including, to the extent possible, information setting out by category the sentencing practices in each district, in each circuit, and in the nation with regard to persons with similar offenses under similar aggravating or mitigating circumstances.

I recommend an additional subsection under the duties of the Director of the Administrative Office; that is, that he—

May operate or contract for the operation of appropriate facilities and services for the care of probationers or parolees, including, but not limited to, residential halfway houses, addict and alcoholic treatment centers, counseling services, employment training, and placement; may arrange and pay for emergency aid and shelter; and may purchase the implements of employment.

The Judicial Conference at its September 1975 meeting was informed that the Probation Committee had endorsed in principle the concept of providing supportive services to persons on probation or parole through contract arrangements. The Congress has expressed policy in this area through title II of the Speedy Trial Act extending limited contract authority to the probation system for persons on pretrial release.

The committee has had the continuing concern that a person participating in a program of rehabilitation under a contract arrangement, while in pretrial release, could not continue the treatment program when placed on probation.

A specific example is the need for contract authority in drug treatment programs. These programs for persons on probation or parole are now provided by the Bureau of Prisons under authority contained in the Probation Act, 18 U.S.C. 3651, the parole laws, 18 U.S.C. 4209, or the criminal provisions of the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act, 18 U.S.C. 4255. I cannot find that any of these provisions are carried forward.

There should be specific provision for these services somewhere in this legislative proposal.

The committee has informed the Judicial Conference at its April 1976 meeting of its view that the provision of drug treatment services seems to be a function more appropriate to the executive branch than the judicial branch.

We recognize, however, that the responsibility for persons under probation and parole rests with the federal probation system and that drug treatment services are necessary for the proper operation of the probation system. Aside from the issue of who provides them, the services must be available.

Finally, I recommend that you make provision for setting aside the convictions of probationers who are successful on probation.

I have noted that this legislative proposal does not carry forward the Youth Corrections Act. One vital element of that act should be carried forward, and that is the ability to set aside a conviction in an appropriate case.

The committee has recommended, and the Judicial Conference has approved, a draft legislative proposal that was introduced but not acted on in the past session of Congress. I would recommend that this additional section provide that:

Upon the unconditional discharge of an offender sentenced to probation, the court may thereafter in its discretion set aside the conviction and issue to the offender a certificate to that effect.

In the case of an offender on whom no sentence of imprisonment or probation is imposed, the court after the expiration of two years from the date of conviction, in its discretion may set aside the conviction and issue to the offender a certificate to that effect.

A conviction so set aside by this section shall not constitute a conviction within the meaning of any law or regulation of the United States.

This additional section would allow for the setting aside of convictions for probationers, regardless of age. It would provide an incentive to offenders to succeed on probation and would partially alleviate the restrictions which are imposed on individuals previously convicted of a felony.

Under the present system, life-long disabilities are indiscriminately applied as bars to employment, banking, credit, and licensing. Thus, an ex-offender often finds it impossible to compete for employment or in business, even though no prison term was imposed.

As a practical matter, pardons are unavailable to many individuals eligible for such relief. This additional section would be a modest step to provide some relief.

The relief is discretionary on the part of the court. The recommended provision would apply to certain special classes of offenders: those who successfully complete a period of probation and those who the court decided did not require a period of supervision. The latter group would be eligible only after a period of time.

The proposal also defines, in part, the effect which will be given to a certificate. Full definition is left to judicial development.

There is nothing in the proposal that requires the expunction or sealing of records, nor does it constitute a "license to lie."

Likewise, we do not contemplate that this change would in any way create a "perennial first offender."

Subsection (b) of section 3831, consideration of a prisoner for release on parole, establishes the time schedule for a prisoner to receive his first consideration for parole. The mechanics for determining the time for the first parole hearing seem to be unnecessarily complicated.

Was your intent to establish a system whereby a prisoner did not receive his first parole hearing until his date of parole eligibility had passed?

As I understand the procedure, a prisoner who had received a 3-year sentence without a term of parole ineligibility would be eligible for release on parole after 6 months. However, by application of subsection (b) (1), he would not receive parole consideration until after 7 months.

I suggest that you change this section to provide that a prisoner shall receive first parole consideration at least 60 days prior to this parole eligibility date.

Subsection (c) of section 3834, term and conditions of parole, establishes one mandatory condition of parole that the parolee not commit another crime during the term of parole. My comments made previously regarding the conditions of probation at section 2103(a) and (b) also apply here.

I recommend adopting the same 7 additional mandatory conditions and deleting discretionary conditions, numbers 15 through 18, in addition to number 11 which you have already deleted. I feel these are appropriate and reasonable conditions which should apply in all parole cases.

Finally, I ask that you include as a discretionary condition of parole the addition I suggested earlier with regard to probation requiring a parolee to participate in an alcoholic or drug treatment program during the term of parole as now provided by 18 U.S.C. 4209.

Subsection (c) deals with the effective period of a parole term. My comments here are similar to those made in section 2104(b). There should be some statement as to what constitutes imprisonment and the effect of short jail sentences for minor offenses in the computation of the term of parole.

Subsection (b) of section 3835, revocation of parole, establishes the requirement for a preliminary hearing whenever a parolee is taken into custody for violation of a condition of parole. The purpose of this hearing is to determine if there is probable cause to believe that he has violated a condition of his parole.

I recommend that this subsection be amended to conform with present law by providing that conviction for a federal, state, or local crime committed subsequent to release on parole shall constitute probable cause—18 U.S.C. 4214(b) (1).

Finally, I find no provisions for continuing the U.S. Parole Commission as you have provided for the Bureau of Prisons and the Federal Prison Industries in title III at page 308.

With regard to the U.S. Sentencing Commission, in your invitation for testimony, you indicated your awareness that the Judicial Conference has not yet established a formal position on this legislative proposal. I am certain you are also aware that the Judicial Conference at its April 1976 meeting disapproved a bill that would have established a U.S. Sentencing Commission.

In the context of the conference's previous action, I shall comment on what I would like to see if the Congress should establish a U.S. Sentencing Commission.

The lack of sound knowledge to provide the base for sentencing has been a matter of concern for years. No one is more aware than the judge on the bench of the lack of a sound body of knowledge to assist him in discharging his sentencing responsibilities.

Usually he has no guidelines, except his own experience to tell him how sentences have worked out in the past. There are no valid actuarial or prediction tables to indicate what the outcome of a particular case will be. He does not know what other judges in other courts have done with respect to similarly situated defendants.

When imposing a sentence, he has in mind one or more of the objectives you propose at section 101—deterrence, protection of society, just punishment, and rehabilitation of the offender.

However, he has no assurance that a given sentence will achieve these objectives. Nor does he know the actual effectiveness of the various correctional agencies that will carry out the sentence.

It was these very concerns that prompted the Congress to establish the Advisory Corrections Council, of which I am a member, 18 U.S.C. 5002.

The council met regularly until 1959 when it disbanded after the chairman resigned and the Attorney General did not appoint a successor.

The council was responsible, in part, for two pieces of legislation: One authorizing institutes and joint councils on sentencing, 28 U.S.C. 334, with a primary objective of reducing disparity of sentencing, and the other to provide greater flexibility in sentencing alternatives and parole procedures—formerly 18 U.S.C. 4208 and 4209 and now 18 U.S.C. 4205 and 4216.

The Advisory Corrections Council was reinstated in December of 1976 with the designation of former Deputy Attorney General Harold Tyler as chairman by the then Attorney General Levi. I was designated by the Chief Justice to fill one of the three judicial positions on the council.

The council has met twice this year, and the focus of our attention has been on the need for a comprehensive statistical system in the criminal justice field and the need for a more effective and rational system of sentencing.

Notwithstanding the efforts that have been made to learn more about the effectiveness of sentencing—the work of the Advisory Corrections Council, the institutes and joint councils on sentencing, and the work of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts and the Federal Judicial Center—the fact remains that we are not much further along in understanding the whole process than we were years ago. I do not say this in any sense of criticism of the efforts that have been made in the past, but in recognition that much needs to be done.

The goals of the U.S. Sentencing Commission, as proposed, would be of immense assistance to the entire system of criminal justice if achieved. Whether or not achievement of these goals is dependent on establishment of a new commission is a matter for Congress to decide.

Any organization charged with the stated goals of the commission should be a central body with authority to draw information from, and effect change of, the various parts of the system. Your legislative proposal would establish that capability.

Section 991, U.S. Sentencing Commission—establishment and purpose, would establish the commission in the Judicial Branch and provide for the appointment of the members by the Judicial Conference, subject to removal by the Conference for cause.

This form of organization should provide the necessary independence from pressures that might be brought to bear on the Commission if it were outside the judicial branch.

Establishment within the judicial branch might also enhance the Commission's acceptance.

Since this legislation calls for judges to relinquish some of their independence in sentencing, it is probably well it be to another body established within the judiciary.

While the proposal does not eliminate judicial discretion in sentencing, it does establish guidelines for the exercise of that discretion and provides a benchmark for appellate review of a sentence.

Section 994, subsection (a), duties of Commission, provides that the Commission shall promulgate and distribute to all courts of the United States and to the U.S. Probation System its guidelines for sentencing. I believe you should make it clear that such guidelines are to be publicly distributed for the benefit of the bar and the general public. You may wish to consider requiring general publication for comment before adoption.

Subsection (e) requires the Commission to establish a "substantial sentence of imprisonment" in its guidelines for certain types of offenders.

In my opinion, the Commission should have the latitude to establish guidelines within the maximum penalties that Congress has established by statute. Guidelines should be based on the best and most current information available and not mandated by a statutory provision.

This particular requirement runs contrary to the purpose of the Commission and impinges on its independence.

I have a similar comment regarding subsection (g) of Section 994 which gives the Congress authority to approve or disapprove guidelines promulgated by the Commission.

The Commission should have the latitude, as an independent commission in the Judicial Branch, to establish guidelines based on the results of its studies.

Subsection (b) of section 996, director and staff, requires the staff director to appoint the Commission's employees under the competitive civil service laws.

I feel that the Commission should have the latitude to appoint its employees without regard to the competitive civil service laws and regulations as is the general appointment procedure within the judicial branch.

This concludes my remarks concerning the sections of S. 1437 listed in your request for testimony. There are, however, several sections at other points in the bill which embody provisions that have been the subject of the Probation Committee's concern. I have prepared comments on these sections as an appendix to this testimony and ask that they be included for the record.

I appreciate your courtesy, Mr. Chairman, and I shall be pleased to answer any questions you may have.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, they shall be included in the record.

APPENDIX

STATEMENT OF JUDGE GERALD B. TJOFLAT, JUNE 9, 1977, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES

The following listed sections of S-1437 have been the subject of concern of the Judicial Conference Committee on the Administration of the Probation System.

I shall first address two types of offenses: bail jumping as it relates to the sentenced offender who has been ordered to surrender for service of sentence and crimes against the person as they relate to employees of the U. S. probation system. Both of these areas have been the subject of consideration and recommendation by the Judicial Conference.

SECTION 1312—BAIL JUMPING

Section 1312 establishes as an offense the failure to surrender for service of sentence pursuant to a court order. In connection with a penalty for the offense I recommend the subsection (c) (1) (B) be amended to include the language "or pending surrender for service of sentence." I find no specific provision for this type of release in chapters 35 or 36 of the bill and recommend provision for authority to release for the purpose of voluntary surrender for service of sentence.

In 1974 the Probation Committee endorsed procedures drawn by the Bureau of Prisons, the Probation System, and the Marshals Service that provided for the voluntary surrender of selected offenders. The Bureau of Prisons reports great success with this program and the savings to the Government are obvious.

Specific authority in the statute will encourage sentencing judges to make greater use of this procedure. Some judges have expressed reluctance to release for this purpose since criminal contempt appeared the only sanction available where an offender failed to surrender. At the request of the Probation Committee the Judicial Conference at its September 1974 meeting approved a legislative proposal that would establish failure to surrender as an offense. Adoption of section 1312 would fill this need.

SECTION 1601, ET SEQ.—HOMICIDE, ASSAULT, KIDNAPPING, AND RELATED OFFENSES

Certain sections of chapter 16 establish Federal jurisdiction where offenses are committed against an "employee of the U. S. probation service." These provisions are consistent with numerous recommendations of the Judicial Conference that probation officers be included in the protection statute (18 USC 1114).

I recommend that this language be amended to provide Federal jurisdiction where these offenses are committed against an employee of a pretrial services agency. Title II of the Speedy Trial Act required the Administrative Office to establish 10 pretrial services agencies. Five of these agencies are administered by the Probation Division of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and five are administered by local Boards of Trustees. The employees of these agencies investigate, supervise, and work in the same circumstances of hazard as probation officers. They should enjoy the same protection. I am not certain that they would be covered under the current proposed language of these sections. Finally, I suggest that you change the title "U. S. Probation Service" to "U. S. Probation System," wherever it appears. The original act of Congress was an act to establish a probation system in the United States district courts. Subsequent amendments have referred to it as a system and I believe the word "system" is more descriptive of the organization than the word "service."

SECTION 3016—U.S. PROBATION SERVICE

Subsection (a) of section 3016 provides that a U. S. probation officer may carry a firearm pursuant to regulations issued by the Judicial Conference of the United States. The Judicial Conference considered an identical legislative proposal on recommendation of the Probation Committee at its March 1974 meeting. Although the Conference did not approve the legislative proposal it did subsequently approve guidelines which established as policy that probation officers should not carry firearms, however, the guidelines do provide for exceptions to that general policy. As I look at subsection (a), the Conference could continue to carry out its intent that carrying of firearms by probation officers should be the exception rather than the rule.

Subsections (b) and (c) give a probation officer authority to arrest a probationer or a parolee with a warrant or without a warrant if the officer has "reasonable grounds" to believe that the probationer or parolee has violated a condition of release. The Probation Committee in considering similar proposals in the past has consistently recommended that a probation officer's authority to arrest be limited to the arrest of probationers and that "reasonable grounds" be changed to "cause." Probation officers have always had the statutory authority to arrest probationers and the extent to which they exercise this authority is defined by court policy. In the unusual circumstances where a probation officer does arrest a probationer without the court having issued a warrant such a probationer is brought immediately before the court.

Under current practices parolees are arrested generally by the U. S. marshal after the U. S. Parole Commission has issued a warrant. Although probation officers have authority to arrest a parolee under the Youth Corrections Act this authority is not exercised. As a matter of fact it is the policy of the U. S. Parole Commission that probation officers shall not arrest parolees even with a warrant. I grant that in a limited number of circumstances probation officers find themselves hampered in the performance of their duties by not being able to arrest a parolee on the spot of an observed violation. However, weighing this against the due process problems if probation officers were to routinely arrest parolees, I am lead to believe we can do without this authority.

SECTION 3602—ARREST AND DETENTION OF A JUVENILE DELINQUENT

Subsection (e) of section 3602 places a 60-day limitation on the detention of a juvenile pending trial. I recommend that you retain the 30-day limitation now established by 18 USC 5036. Thirty days seems long enough to hold a juvenile pending trial unless there is some particular showing of need for additional delay.

SECTION 3603—JUVENILE DELINQUENCY PROCEEDINGS

Subsection (e) of section 3603 provides that after a hearing the "court may suspend the finding of juvenile delinquency, place him on probation, or commit him to official detention." If it is your intent that suspension of the finding of juvenile delinquency is a disposition unto itself I suggest you add the language "on such conditions as it deems proper" now found at 18 USC 5037(b). This allows the court to suspend the find of delinquency, permit the juvenile to participate in an informal program of supervision, then dismiss the entire proceedings. The current juvenile delinquency act at 18 USC 5032 prohibits changing from one type of proceeding to another once proceedings have reached a certain stage. You may wish to consider its inclusion as I find no similar provisions in this proposal.

Subsection (f) (1) of section 3603 provides that a juvenile may be placed on probation for a term not to exceed the period of minority. I recommend that you incorporate language from the current juvenile delinquency act which further restricts the authorized probation term to the maximum term that could have been imposed on an adult convicted of the same offense (18 USC 5037(b)).

SECTION 3605—USE OF JUVENILE DELINQUENCY RECORDS

Subsection (a) of section 3605 cites six limited circumstances under which a court may release information from the record of a juvenile. I would recommend that you include one additional circumstance under which information may be released by authorizing a court to release such information it deems essential to a program of education, employment, training, or rehabilitation in which the juvenile is participating while under supervision.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your testimony, Judge.

I think you have pointed out a number of very interesting changes that we should consider in the committee. A number of the areas you covered have been hotly debated, as you know. I think you have brought some very meritorious, substantive changes to us today.

Some witnesses before this subcommittee have suggested that the members of the Sentencing Commission be appointed by the President.

What would be the view of the Judicial Conference to this particular proposal?

Judge TJOFLAT. I think that since we are treading in new territory for the first time, that we don't have much history to go by. That is essentially a congressional decision.

If the Commission is to be within the judicial branch, you have a separation of powers problem. The President, of course, appoints article III judges and other members of the judiciary. I really can't tell you what the Judicial Conference attitude would be.

The Probation Committee is going to meet next month, as other committees are, and the Conference will be meeting, either at the end of August or early in September. I am sure that if the bill is still in the hearing stages, or in the consideration stage, that statement can be augmented by the views of the Conference.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Judge. We appreciate that.

With regard to the marijuana sections, this decriminalizes the mere possession of less than 10 grams. How do you feel about that?

Ten grams would be a little more than one-third of an ounce.

Judge TJOFLAT. These are my personal views, but I think that—Senator HATCH. We are interested in that. You have had extensive experience as a Federal district and circuit courts.

Judge TJOFLAT. My personal views depend on whether or not you are going to decriminalize trafficking in the drug.

Senator HATCH. No.

Judge TJOFLAT. As long as you're not decriminalizing the trafficking in the drug and you are restricting it narrowly to use privately, I don't think—no; I don't disagree with that.

Senator HATCH. What I am asking is whether you disagree with having a criminal penalty for possession of more than 10 grams.

Judge TJOFLAT. No.

Senator HATCH. Even though it penalizes possession without requiring the trafficking element.

Judge TJOFLAT. That's right.

The more that you possess, the greater the inference is that it's involved in some kind of a trafficking operation.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Nor do you disagree with the decriminalization with regard to less than 10 grams.

Judge TJOFLAT. That's right.

Senator HATCH. There have been a lot of people in our society, including Mr. Bourne who suggested that it should be decriminalized as to less than one ounce—I personally agree with this particular section as being a more in-depth approach to a very serious problem in our society.

I just wanted to have your viewpoint since you have so much experience on the bench.

Judge TJOFLAT. I am drawing on all my experience on that.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate your being here this morning, and the excellent testimony that you have given.

I have been chairing these committee sessions at the specific request of Senator McClellan and Senator Thurmond. I have appreciated the testimony we have heard so far. I think it's been very enlightening.

Judge Webster, we are looking forward to hearing what you have to say.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM H. WEBSTER, ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL RULES, JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES, AND JUDGE, UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Judge WEBSTER. I would like to ask that my complete statement be made a part of the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it is so ordered and will be entered at the end of your oral testimony.

Judge WEBSTER. I will attempt to highlight the main points which might be of interest to the chairman and to the members of the committee.

I shall direct my comments primarily to section 3725 dealing with sentence review.

The views of the Judicial Conference of the United States find expression in a proposed Federal rule, rule 35.1, which is incorporated in H.R. 7245, which was introduced on May 17, 1977, by Congressman Rodino.

Perhaps the most useful thing I could do this morning is to suggest some of the differences and some of the thinking that went into that rule as it may possibly apply to the final workout of section 3725 in this bill.

The particular emphasis that I hope will attract your attention is the proper role of discretion—both at the district court level and in the appellate courts—on the subject of sentence review and the use and application of the guidelines and the policy statements which this bill provides for.

I would like to refer to the evolution of the thinking of the advisory committee on the whole subject of sentence review over the past 6 years.

We have been studying this rather intensely over this period of time, and our thinking has gone through quite a change.

In the early 1970's, sentence review as a matter of right was viewed with considerable hostility from within the Federal judiciary, even though the United States is said to be the only Nation in the free world that does not have some form of sentence review.

For a number of years it was an open secret that appellate courts were finding ways to reverse cases on the basis of trial error because of excessive sentences. We were getting a lot of bad precedent as a result. Errors that normally would be called harmless were found to be prejudicial. So we began to look into this.

I will skip over the thought processes of the committee considering sentencing councils.

We went, as perhaps you know, to a panel review by district judges, which we finally abandoned when we concluded that the district judges were simply overwhelmed with present responsibilities and either unwilling or unable to take on the business of panel review of sentences. We addressed ourselves again to appellate review of sentencing.

That is all set out in my statement. In view of the time constraints, I would like to go to some of the differences between rule 35.1 and 3725.

Under 3725, a defendant would have no right to appeal for review of a sentence unless it exceeded the maximum punishment established by the proposed Sentencing Commission in guidelines to be promulgated under proposed 28 U.S.C. 994.

Proposed rule 35.1, on the other hand, would apply a screening approach in all cases, other than those involving a sentence of death which is not governed by the rule.

Review is not limited to a sentence in excess of a certain maximum, as in section 3725, but as a threshold requirement, the sentence must be one of imprisonment—execution of which is not suspended. And that is a slight difference.

The sentence must not have been entered pursuant to a plea bargain adopted by the court.

While section 3725 excludes plea bargained sentences from the right of review, it does not appear to distinguish between executed and suspended sentences.

The need for review of a suspended sentence prior to revocation of probation is not clear.

Under rule 35.1, the right to review of a sentence would be subject to a prior determination by the court of appeals through a screening-process method that "a showing has been made of a substantial basis for determining that the sentence is clearly unreasonable."

We are accustomed to using the screening process for weeding out frivolous claims. I think that this method of approach, within the court of appeals, has a great deal to commend it, even though guidelines along the road may point out definite areas which should be respected in the screening process.

I seriously urge the committee to consider leaving room for the application of a screening process which is not entirely controlled by the guideline method. I'm not sure whether a sentencing guideline will invariably keep out, from review, the sentences which perhaps ought to be reviewed because of individualized circumstances that are aggravating or mitigating.

Both your approach and the Judicial Conference's approach are designed to achieve the same protection for the defendant, with rule 35.1 perhaps offering a less-confining entry to review.

Much is going to depend on the range of punishment guidelines established by the Sentencing Commission under section 924. We don't know how wide those ranges are going to be, so we don't know how much discretion is going to be left to the court of appeals.

I might also mention that we excluded fines from the process of sentence review. We thought that the impact on the individual would not be the same as in the case of imprisonment, and we wonder whether appellate review of fines is warranted. We ask that the committee would consider this question.

The Government gets to appeal under the proposed bill that we are considering this morning, section 3725, whenever the sentence is less than the minimum recommended in the Sentencing Commission.

Rule 35.1 would give a right of appeal if it was less than one-third of the maximum permissible. I think that's a policy question, and I simply call it to your attention.

Senator HATCH. Do you anticipate any difficulties with double jeopardy problems concerning government appeal of sentences?

Judge WEBSTER. In terms of H.R. 7245, we were sufficiently concerned about our ability to handle that by the rulemaking process, but we asked that the Congress consider dealing with it.

As far as double jeopardy is concerned, I do not think that is a problem. There is ample case authority for enhancement of sentences.

Senator HATCH. Do you both agree on that?

Judge TJOFLAT. Yes.

Judge WEBSTER. I would like to talk about the policy statements.

This provision concerns me quite a bit. Section 3725 excludes from sentence review, either by the defendant or the Government, sentences which are "consistent with policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to section 28, U.S.C. 994(a) (2)."

These, of course, are merely general policy statements that are intended to further the legitimate objectives of sentencing sanctions which are also defined: deterrence, protection of the public, just punishment, and rehabilitation.

But it is not at all clear when, or by whom, that determination is made.

The use of the policy statement here appears to override the maximum-minimum guidelines test.

We would ask: Would a policy statement, for example, that all defendants convicted of crimes committed with weapons should receive the maximum term permitted by law preclude all sentence review?

I would submit that this language may very well be a catch 22, which should be very carefully analyzed before you accept it as an exception to the right of sentence review.

If you will recall, it says that there will be no sentence review if there is a policy statement that is consistent with the sentence. Someone is going to have to decide that at some stage before we know whether there is a right of sentence review.

Here, again, the use of the screening process by the appellate courts with an area of interim discretion would have some utility.

I have a great deal of doubt about the use of the policy statement, particularly since we don't know quite what it might be.

It may very well be that such a policy would exclude sentence review, when it really should be granted by the appellate court. It makes it a condition of eligibility. I think this is cause for considerable concern.

Both your bill and H.R. 7245 use the clearly unreasonable standard of review; that is, that the sentence is clearly unreasonable. Although rule 35.1 couples the finding with clearly unreasonable and excessive or clearly unreasonable and insufficient.

We have since heard from a number of judges who are worried about that. They understand the term "abuse of discretion." They are not sure what "clearly unreasonable" is.

Senator HATCH. Excuse me, Judge. There is a vote on the floor with regard to the clean air bill.

The subcommittee will stand in recess for just a few minutes.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH. The Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedure will come to order.

I apologize for the length of time which it took, but we had three votes in a row.

I apologize especially to you, Judge, for interrupting your excellent statement right before you were almost through.

But these things do occur, and I think you understand them.

Judge WEBSTER. I do want to stress one or two things that appear in the statement that I think need further consideration by the committee.

I was attempting to make the point that the use of policy statements, as a method of eligibility for sentence appeal, had a catch 22 provision in them. I won't repeat myself there.

I have mentioned that the clearly unreasonable test had generated some questions among judges, but since it appears also in H.R. 7245 which is the proposed rule 35.1, I wouldn't pursue that.

I do want to come down hard on the question of discretion.

It may be said by some that sentence review is the result of the failure of the judges to meet their sentencing responsibilities with consistent fairness. I think this is much too broad an indictment.

Most judges perform their sentencing duties conscientiously and with great care.

I submit that the aberrational sentence should be the main target of sentence review.

We are going to have some degree of disparity by the nature of the fact that individuals are different, but what we are trying to reach is the aberrational sentence.

To the extent that discretion is taken from the judges, it must necessarily be placed elsewhere. If the guidelines are too tight and the sentence range is too narrow, then discretion is passed from the judge to the prosecutor, who can more fully control the sentence by selecting the nature of the charge and the number of counts.

I think it will be useful to utilize a Sentencing Commission to promote a greater degree of uniformity in sentencing philosophy.

It seems to me that article III judges should not be totally hamstrung by guidelines promulgated by the Sentencing Commission.

The process of evolving suitable guidelines promises to be a lengthy one, and certainly one guided by ongoing experience.

Your committee may wish to consider utilizing the screening process which I discussed before the recess and which is contained in proposed rule 35.1, at least in those areas in which the guidelines do not yet point the way.

It is entirely possible that appellate courts, in their analysis of sentences on review, may be able to contribute a useful body of law from which guidelines may be drawn by the Commission. In order for this to be possible, the appellate courts may need a greater area of discretion in accepting or rejecting demands for review of sentences.

This concludes my statement. I would be glad to answer any questions.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM H. WEBSTER, UNITED STATES CIRCUIT JUDGE AND MEMBER ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL RULES

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am William H. Webster, Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. I appear as a member of the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules. On behalf of our Chairman, Judge J. Edward Lumbard, and the other members of the Committee, I thank you for this opportunity to present our views on Senate Bill 1437. I shall direct my comments primarily to §3725 dealing with sentence review.

The Judicial Conference of the United States has endorsed a slightly different approach to sentence review and has forwarded its recommendation to the Vice President and the Speaker of the House. I am informed that a bill embodying this concept has been introduced by Congressman Rodino as H.R. 7245.

I think I can make best use of my time this morning if I share with the members of the Committee some of the evolution in the thinking of the Advisory Committee on this important subject.

For over six years, sentence review has been the object of an on-going study by the Advisory Committee, and the Federal Judiciary has been widely exposed to the issue through Workshops, Joint Sentencing Institutes and the writings of legal scholars.

The pendency of earlier bills in the Congress calling for various forms of sentence review has given substantial impetus to our work, since many of us felt some form of sentence review was inevitable and that the Judiciary should make its contribution in the selection of the most appropriate procedure.

I must say in candor that in the early 1970's sentence review as a matter of right was viewed with considerable hostility from within the Federal Judiciary, even though the United States is said to be the only nation in the free world without some form of sentence review. That feeling, while still intact in some quarters, has largely been ameliorated.

For a number of years, it was an "open secret" that a conviction was occasionally reversed upon appeal because appellate judges deemed the sentence to be excessive. In order to do this, it was necessary to find reversible trial error. There were substantial indications that this practice was producing bad legal precedent on trial error issues that would have been deemed harmless but for the sentence that the defendant received.

In the middle 1970's, a number of circuit courts began to cut around the edges of the traditional barrier to sentence review by finding authority to review a sentence where the trial judge had failed to exercise his discretion and instead applied an inflexible mechanical policy, such as giving maximum sentences to all draft evaders. Other appellate courts began to assert their authority to reverse based on a finding of gross abuse of discretion sufficient to shock the conscience of the court. The absence of uniformity within the circuits and the inability to adjust, other than to vacate, a sentence made review under inherent powers an unsatisfactory method of dealing with the problem.

The Advisory Committee considered three different alternatives within the rule-making powers of the courts:

(1) Sentencing councils.—The use of the other judges within the district to collaborate on sentences has been tried in a number of districts and is probably most effectively utilized in the Southern District of Michigan, which includes Detroit. While not technically sentence review, it meant that more than one judge contributed to the sentence determination and presumably reduced the amount of disparity within the district. The Advisory Committee recognized the advantages that this method might have in an urban district, but concluded it would be less useful in a nonurban district with judges spaced apart. Moreover, members of the Committee representing the defense bar expressed the concern felt by defendants who were in effect sentenced by judges before whom they did not appear.

(2) Appellate review.—The Advisory Committee was initially of the view that too few (then 34 out of 90) appellate judges had had sentencing experience and that review of this function should be retained at the district court level. Moreover, the Committee in the main was doubtful that a substantive law of sentencing, desirable as it might sound, could be successfully developed through the appellate process. Accordingly, the Committee opted for a system of panel review by district judges.

(3) Panel review.—In 1975, after considerable exposure, the Advisory Committee and the Standing Committee recommended a system of review by a panel of three district judges, similar to the state systems in effect in Massachusetts and Maryland. The standard of review was to be “excessiveness.” The right of review was limited to a defendant who received a sentence that might result in imprisonment for two years or more. Review was to be conducted on the basis of the papers on file, including the presentence report. The Judicial Conference of the United States did not act upon proposed Rule 35(c), but instead referred the matter back to the Advisory Committee for further exposure and study. The results of such study, coupled with the responses from district judges following recirculation of proposed Rule 35(c), convinced the Committee that district judges were generally overwhelmed with existing responsibilities and were either unwilling or unable to assume responsibility for panel review. We therefore redirected our attention to appellate review.

At the same time, we concluded that a strong case had been made for giving the government the right to seek review of a sentence alleged to be insufficient. Because increasing a sentence has substantive implications, it was concluded that any rule incorporating sentence enhancement should be enacted by the Congress in the first instance rather than by means of the Rules Enabling Acts. H.R. 7245 incorporates the proposed Rule 35.1 endorsed by the Judicial Conference.

Perhaps the best way to point up our specific thinking is to discuss the main points of difference between proposed Rule 35.1 and §3725 of S. 1437.

APPEAL BY A DEFENDANT

Under §3725, a defendant would have no right to appeal for review of a sentence unless it exceeded the maximum punishment established by the proposed Sentencing Commission in guidelines to be promulgated under proposed 28 U.S.C. §994. Proposed Rule 35.1, on the other hand, would apply a screening approach in all cases other than those involving a sentence of death, which is not governed by the Rule. Review is not limited to a sentence in excess of a certain maximum, as in §3725, but as a threshold requirement the sentence must be one of imprisonment, execution of which is not suspended, and the sentence must not have been entered pursuant to a plea bargain adopted by the court. While §3725 excludes plea bargained sentences from the right of review, it does not appear to distinguish between executed and suspended sentences. The need for review of a suspended sentence prior to revocation of probation is not clear.

Under Rule 35.1, the right to review of a sentence would be subject to a prior determination by the court of appeals that “a showing has been made of a substantial basis for determining that the sentence is clearly unreasonable.” Courts of appeal are experienced in preliminary screening and clearly frivolous claims can be swiftly weeded out in this manner.

It seems to me that your Committee must decide whether sentencing guidelines will invariably exclude the clearly unreasonable sentence when individualized to take into account aggravating and mitigating circumstances. Both approaches are designed to achieve the same protection for the defendant, with Rule 35.1 perhaps offering a less confining entry to review. Much will depend upon the range of punishment guidelines established by the Sentencing Commission under §924.

Your Committee may also wish to consider carefully whether guidelines for fines can be drawn with sufficient general application to provide a triggering mechanism for appellate review. After much consideration, the Advisory Committee concluded that fines do not have the same impact upon the individual as does imprisonment and the economic circumstances of defendants are so varied that it is impossible to set either a dollar limit or fraction-of-maximum-permissible-fine limit which is applicable to all cases. Appellate review of fines alone may prove to be unwarranted.

APPEAL BY THE GOVERNMENT

Both Rule 35.1 and §3725 permit appeals by the government. Rule 35.1 adopts as its test whether the sentence is less than one-third of the maximum permissible term of imprisonment. Section 3725 on the other hand permits appeal if the sentence includes a fine or imprisonment or a term of parole ineligibility less than the minimum recommended in the Sentencing Commission guidelines. Both approaches exclude plea bargained sentences. Rule 35.1 would not permit a government appeal based on the failure of the district court to impose consecutive rather than concurrent sentences.

POLICY STATEMENTS

Section 3725 excludes from sentence review, either by the defendant or the government, sentences which are "consistent with policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §994(a)(2)." These are merely general policy statements that are intended to further the legitimate objectives of sentencing sanctions: deterrence, protection of the public, just punishment and rehabilitation. It is not at all clear when or by whom that determination is made. The policy statement appears to override the maximum-minimum guidelines test. Would a policy statement, for example, that all defendants convicted of crimes committed with weapons should receive the maximum term permitted by law preclude all sentence review? It is submitted that this may be a Catch-22 which should be carefully analyzed before accepting it as an exception to the right of sentence review.

The policy statement exception presents one further difficulty. It appears to be a condition of eligibility for review.

Who makes the determination in the first instance when the defendant seeks to file his notice? It appears that the appellate court will have to deal with §3725(a)(1), most likely as a preliminary administrative determination. This suggests that the screening process proposed by Rule 35.1 may have considerable merit and should be more flexible and more broadly applied than the present bill permits.

"CLEARLY UNREASONABLE"

Both Rule 35.1 and §3725 use the "clearly unreasonable" standard of review. This seems to be a new term of art. Many judges have expressed the view that the "abuse of discretion" standard of review is more of a known quantity. Under Rule 35.1 the court of appeals is required to find, as a condition of upsetting the sentence, that it is either unreasonable and excessive or that it is unreasonable and insufficient. Under §3725 the court of appeals must expand upon its determination by stating "specific reasons for its conclusion." A finding of "insufficiency" or "excessiveness" would not appear to satisfy this requirement. The extent of the explanation required is apparently left to future explication by the Supreme Court.

DISCRETION

It may be said by some that sentence review is the result of the failure of the judges to meet their sentencing responsibilities with consistent fairness. This is much too broad an indictment. Most judges perform their sentencing duties conscientiously and with great care. The aberrational sentence should be the main target of sentence review.

To the extent that discretion is taken from the judges, it must necessarily be placed elsewhere. If the guidelines are too tight and sentence ranges too narrow, then discretion is passed from the judge to the prosecutor, who can more fully control the sentence by selecting the nature of the charge and the number of counts.

It may be useful to utilize a Sentencing Commission to promote a greater degree of uniformity in sentencing philosophy, but it is submitted that Article III judges should not be hamstrung by guidelines promulgated by the Sentencing Commission.

The process of evolving suitable guidelines promises to be a lengthy one, certainly one guided by on-going experience. Your Committee may wish to consider utilizing the screening process contained in proposed Rule 35.1, at least in those areas in which guidelines do not yet point the way. It is entirely possible that appellate courts, in their analysis of sentences on review, may be able to contribute a useful body of law from which guidelines may be drawn by the Commission. In order for this to be possible, the appellate courts may need a greater area of discretion in accepting or rejecting demands for review of sentences.

Senator HATCH. Judge, I appreciate your statement and the excellent suggestions both of you have made. We will certainly give every consideration to them before reporting this bill.

Thank you for coming today. We appreciate having you with us.

Our next witness is Hon. Harold R. Tyler, chairman of the Advisory Corrections Council.

We welcome you, Judge Tyler.

With your service and experience on the bench and as a former Deputy Attorney General, I am sure you will be helpful to the Committee. We are very pleased to have you with us today, and we are looking forward to hearing what you have to say about this and the enlightenment you can provide with regard to this particular piece of legislation and the amendments thereto.

STATEMENT OF HON. HAROLD R. TYLER, CHAIRMAN, ADVISORY CORRECTIONS COUNCIL

Mr. TYLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would ask that my written statement be made a part of the record, and I will summarize some of the main points very briefly.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate that. We will incorporate your statement in the record, without objection, at the completion of your oral remarks.

Mr. TYLER. Very broadly, Mr. Chairman, I am here this morning to submit my views in support of the thrust of the sentencing provisions which appear in part III of S. 1437 and also in that appendix to the draft bill, known as part E, which would add a new chapter to title 28 of the judicial code and provide for a U.S. Sentencing Commission.

Essentially, as I see it, what this committee is considering is the legislative establishment of the outer limits of punishment in the Federal courts; and, second, the creation by Congress of an administrative body to be known as the Commission on Sentencing which will provide guidelines to typical sentences for categories of offenses and offenders; and, third, the authorization of the trial judges to impose specific or fixed term sentences, presumptively within the Commission-established guidelines but with necessary flexibility to go outside those guidelines in appropriate cases.

Then, of course, in the latter event, the thrust of the new proposals would be to allow sentence appeals to the duly constituted courts of appeal where the trial judge decided, for reasons stated in particularity on the record, to go outside of the administrative proposed guidelines.

It seems to me that this will be an imaginative and novel approach in our history and one which will permit us to build up a body of case law, a body of knowledge and learning on an empirical basis.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, one of the important parts of the Sentencing Commission mandate would be to accumulate information, statistical and otherwise, which we are sadly lacking and have been sadly lacking in the Federal system, particularly in the punishment arena, for all of our history.

I think some of us overlook this feature of the present proposal. I am happy to say that the draftsmen have not. The emphasis is very clear, and I think all to the good.

As other witnesses have testified, Mr. Chairman, the hope is—and I think it's a reasonable hope—that the scheme here will go a long way toward eradicating what I will call irrational disparity.

Surely, I think, there must be common agreement that there is no sentencing scheme in any country, let alone ours, where one has or one could expect to have total similarity in sentencing under various penal sections.

I don't think we want that, and I don't think it would be possible to achieve, even if we wanted it.

What this new proposal does, however, is to allow us for the first time to be in a position to eradicate unreasonable disparity which has no basis on the record. Such disparity does not comport with our notions of fairness and due process of law, and it does not serve the public image of justice for sentencing.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, to put it very bluntly, I would say this new scheme would allow us to have some simple candor and honesty in our sentencing arrangements.

You know, and I know, as lawyers, that for years we have read in the papers that an offender, John Doe, has been sentenced to 15 years but we know he is not going to serve 15 years. He is going to serve perhaps 5 years.

The public doesn't understand this. We lawyers perhaps do, but I'm not even sure we do all the time.

I believe that this new system will allow fixed-term sentences, hopefully for modest terms and not unduly harsh and repressive terms, and that everybody will know where they stand the day the sentence is imposed.

That, of course, includes most particularly the offender himself. If he knows that he is going to get a minimum of 4 years and a maximum of 6, that is better for him and it's better for us who have to be also considered, because punishment can only be sensible and only be politically acceptable if it's clear and honest to everybody in the general public, as well as those of us who labor in the system.

Earlier this morning, I heard some colloquy between you and Judge Tjofflat, I think, on the provisions in subparagraph (a) of section 991 of new chapter 58, providing for the designation of nine members of the Sentencing Commission by the Judicial Conference.

I would argue that the present draft is a little unclear because it doesn't really make it apparent what skills and what talents and what disciplines are to be possessed by members of this commission.

I think the present draft could be read to permit, if not encourage, the appointment of nine judges.

As an ex-Federal judge, Mr. Chairman, I am comfortable with the notion, from a parochial viewpoint, of having judges on the Commission; but I'm not so sure when I try not to be parochial that that would be a good idea entirely. Therefore, I would earnestly suggest, as others have, that there be reconsideration of this paragraph, particularly along the lines of maybe getting some other appointing authorities, in addition to the Judicial Conference, even though this Commission will be part of the judicial branch of government.

As I see it, there is nothing illegal about having the President, or perhaps one or more houses of the Congress, to make the appointments.

After all, the Congress and the President are in on the appointment of Federal judges. There seems to me to be no good reason why they couldn't be in on the appointment of these Commission members.

More than that, I would also advocate that we try to get different disciplines.

Judges aren't the only people concerned with sentences in the United States. Sentences are too important, also, to be left to the judges alone.

I think most judges in the federal system recognize this.

I would advocate that a number of disciplines be reflected among the members of this Commission. I would say, for example, prosecutors, parole officials, and perhaps even lay persons, and other professionals—from the medical profession, perhaps. In short, I think this is an important feature which deserves further consideration which I know the subcommittee will give to the matter.

I am also bold enough, Mr. Chairman, to point out that the present draft of chapter 58 is a little sketchy about the nature, pay, skills, and experience of the staff director and staff employees.

If this Commission is as important as I think we all agree it's going to have to be, I think the Congress might want to make it clear what key staffers are going to be paid and the kind of people that should be encouraged to be staff members of this Commission.

It is not going to be easy to write guidelines. We know that. We need the best brains and the best people we can get to assist in that, and anything that the Congress can do to make that clear in the staff provisions I think might be very helpful to the success of this scheme later on.

I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, with the utmost bluntness and candor, that I am one of those who thinks that the day of the parole boards and the parole commissions is coming to an end.

However, I would like to add, as I think other witnesses have said, that one of the features of the present draft that I think is quite practical and sensible is that though this proposal doesn't quite get rid of the parole commission, it does leave open to it certain duties which are fairly important—perhaps the most important of which is to make sure that there isn't an injustice perpetrated unwittingly by a sentence that turns out not to fit the offender, even where the judge has considered everything as best he can and has acted within the guidelines.

There may be another reason that is not spelled out, and it shouldn't have to be. But it may be in the minds of the Congress and, if so, I would think wisely so.

It is probably a good idea to think of keeping the Parole Commission in place for awhile longer, just to see how the Sentencing Commission scheme functions.

Although I am one who would concede, Mr. Chairman, that if the Commission works well there would then be no need of parole commissions as we now know them; but it may be the better part of wisdom and practicality to go slow, as the present draft does, in order to see how the Commission works.

Finally, I would note a concern which I'm sure will be echoed by others. It probably shows up in the present draft best in subparagraph (e) of section 994 where an attempt is made, as I read it, to have the Congress tell the Sentencing Commission that there should be a presumption in favor of imprisonment for certain categories of offenses and offenders.

As best I can tell, this goes back to the old organized crime legislation, where the big manager of a narcotics scheme was singled out, you will remember, for special sentence treatment, and so on.

That is all understandable. I just would like to make two points, however.

The present draft, to me, seems to be unnecessarily ambiguous. The language used in the first sentence, for example, to the effect that a substantial sentence of imprisonment shall be provided "for most cases."

That phrase "for most cases" seems to me susceptible of difficulty of interpretation in the future. I really believe what is intended is to say there should be a presumption in favor of incarceration.

If that is it, I think it might be better said that way.

I would like to make this broader point. I continue to think that the legislature—in our instance, the Congress—must be involved where punishment is being provided in terms of rules or guidelines. Therefore, I think the legislature is entitled to put on the outer limits, as this proposal does, and also maybe to suggest priorities for consideration. But I think it has to be drafted in such a way so as not to fetter unduly the discretion and wisdom of the Sentencing Commission itself.

My own view is that the draftsmen here in this committee are already sensitive to the need of balancing those two polar limits, but I wanted to make the point since I am somewhat troubled by the present language as I read it in section 994.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one observation:

Earlier this spring, Dean Morris of the University of Chicago and other witnesses in a symposium run by the Library of Congress, which is now reflected in a report of the House Judiciary Committee, pointed out that in our system surely, if not in other systems, when a society lays down rules for punishment, they really are laying down something far more important. Sentencing provisions more than any other portions of a penal code stake out what a society means to be its criteria of justice.

If that is so, and I believe it is so most fervently, then the particular genius of the present proposal is that it allows the legislature to have its say, as it should, on what are America's criteria of justice.

It allows, also, a chance to get away from the hobgoblins of the legislative action which have always been with us; that is, the Congress, for example, is so terribly overburdened it can't catch up and have an annual review of penal code provisions, including sentence provision.

Here we have a chance for the legislature to stay in the fray, as it should, to allow somebody who is constantly in the business to review the matter on a regular basis and, finally, in the third part, to allow the sentencing judge who has to deal with the offender before him to have sufficient discretion to tailor the punishment to fit that particular individual.

That seems to me to be a very promising tripartite approach to sentencing.

I think that we would be remiss if we didn't push forward and see how this goes. I suspect that it would be peculiarly American in the best sense if we could pull it off.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, judge, for your comments.

Do you envision Congress playing any role in the sentencing guidelines?

Mr. TYLER. As I read the present draft, Mr. Chairman, the Congress will have a chance to review, because the Sentencing Commission will have to furnish its guidelines in a report to the Congress and then the Congress will have the right to approve or disapprove. Although I know some are opposed to this because they think it will cut into the discretion and independence of the Commission, for my part I think that's a good idea.

If you take our system of government, I really think the Congress can't get out of this entirely. As I read the draft, Congress doesn't propose to get out of it entirely, and I think it is balanced pretty well. I think it's worth a try just along these lines.

Senator HATCH. With experience on the bench and at the Department of Justice, do you envision any problems with appellate review of sentencing? If so, what problems?

Mr. TYLER. I have to confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am somewhat less than objective here because I was one of the co-schemers last year in the Department that worked on aspects of this draft which still incorporates many features, including this one on appellate review.

I was hopeful, quite frankly, that this scheme of appellate review would satisfy everybody. Very simply, what I mean by that is this: I happen to believe that we should have appellate review and that that review should be done by the duly constituted courts of appeal and not by panels of district judges, such as the Judicial Conference of the United States has recommended rather consistently.

On the other hand, I sympathize with those—including many of my friends on the courts of appeal in this country—who feel that they would be inundated by sentencing appeals if they were allowed generally.

The peculiar attraction of this proposal in this legislation is that it should tend to limit the appeals to serious appeals, but in a way that is totally visible to outsiders.

One of the reasons that I do not quite accept the views of my good friend, Judge Webster, that this can be done by an individual court of appeal screening process is that the courts differ in their procedures. And the public can't know and understand individually, internal court procedures.

Also, I'm not entirely sure that we should solely rest upon rules of screening designed to expedite the internal workings of a court, particularly when we are dealing with important subjects like punishment.

Therefore, my hope is that this particular scheme will insure that only serious sentence issues get up to the courts of appeal.

I also think, however, that it is important that the serious issues go up to the courts of appeal, because I think they're the best institution to build the case law of sentencing which our system so badly needs.

Senator HATCH. Do you favor the complete abolishment of the parole release function?

Mr. TYLER. Yes, Mr. Chairman. In theory, I do. Simply because what I look to this proposal to provide us with a scheme of fixed sentences and thus get away from the old indeterminate sentence.

Hopefully, the fixed sentences will not be unduly harsh or long; that they will be fixed even in terms of providing, after a period of incarceration, a short period of release on the streets, which we now call parole. But the judge can do that.

Very simply, it seems to me, in theory at least, we can look to the day when there will be no need for a separate superstructure known as the Parole Commission.

As I said earlier, I sympathize and join in with those who would say: A note of caution; let's not rush to abolish the U. S. Parole Commission which is the only parole commission I know of which in the last few years at least regularized their procedures. They deserve a lot of credit for that. Until we're sure how the new scheme works, maybe it's well, as this proposal says, to keep them in place a while longer.

Senator HATCH. A number of witnesses have suggested that the legislature should in this bill prevent the Sentencing Commission from promulgating guidelines which would impose a sentence of imprisonment solely for the purpose of rehabilitation.

Do you agree or disagree with that? Some say the issue of rehabilitation shouldn't even be mentioned in the bill.

Mr. TYLER. No; I understand that, and I know a good many very respectable people in the academic world who say that. But, frankly, I am not prepared, Mr. Chairman, to give up on the notion of rehabilitation entirely.

Senator HATCH. Neither am I.

Mr. TYLER. I agree that we aren't very good at rehabilitating so far as we know, just by putting man in prison, even though I happen to think some of our prisons are first-rate, contrary to what a lot of people think.

But even in those first-rate institutions, I don't think we know how to rehabilitate. But I still don't think the Congress or the courts can totally abdicate and say they don't believe in rehabilitation any more.

Senator HATCH. I have been asking this question to a few witnesses on the subject of marihuana and its decriminalization below 10 grams: What would be your viewpoint on that?

Mr. TYLER. In other words, make the 10 gram limit the cutoff point?

Senator HATCH. Right. Possession of anything below that would be decriminalized; anything above that would be subject to the effect of this act.

Mr. TYLER. I don't have much trouble with that. It would certainly be an improvement over what we're doing now.

I heard when you put this question to Judge Tjoflat. I think I would agree with him on that, basically.

Senator HATCH. But you still believe that we should have penalties for possession of amounts over a certain gram-size, but there should not be a record for some kid who has been indiscriminate.

Mr. TYLER. What bothers me, and I assume bothers people like Judge Tjoflat too, is this.

Our experience seems to indicate that if a person has more than a quantity that seems reasonable for his own use, the chances are he is probably dealing.

I am reluctant to see us decriminalizing dealing for profit, because that has its obvious consequences.

I am not sure I am sophisticated enough in my knowledge to know whether it should be precisely at 10 grams, but that seems to me more sensible than——

Senator HATCH. Than 1 ounce which might make 50 to 75 cigarettes?

Mr. TYLER. Yes.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Bourne testified before one of our subcommittees that one ounce would make something like 75 marihuana cigarettes. That is quite a few.

Mr. TYLER. Yes.

Senator HATCH. So this seems to be at least a reasonable approach in your eyes.

Mr. TYLER. Yes.

Senator HATCH. Thank you. We appreciate your testimony here today and the time you have taken to come here.

STATEMENT OF HAROLD R. TYLER, JR.

At the kind invitation of this subcommittee, I appear today to speak to S. 1437, The Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977. More particularly, it is my understanding that the subcommittee would like me to address myself to the sentencing provisions of this bill. Hence, I wish my remarks to be understood as focusing upon Part III of S. 1437 (Sections 2001 et seq.) and that appendix of the draft bill known as Part E, which purports to add a new chapter No. 58 to Title 28 of the United States Code, providing for a United States Sentencing Commission to be part of the Judicial Branch of Government.<sup>1</sup>

My testimony is frankly supportive of the thrust of these provisions in S. 1437. As I read the proposals, the Senate is considering therein at least the following significant items: (1) Legislative establishment of the outer limits of punishment; (2) the creation by Congress of an administrative board to be known as the commission on Sentencing which will provide guidelines to typical sentences for categories of offenses and offenders; and (3) authorization of the trial judges to impose specific or "fixed term" sentences, presumptively within the Commission-established guidelines, but with flexibility to go outside the guidelines, which latter event would subject the particular sentence to appellate review in duly constituted courts of appeal in the federal system. Accepting the major features of the proposal to be substantially these, I am of the opinion that the new sentencing sections will be more imaginative than those to which we have been accustomed and, more important, will permit an orderly development of legal sentencing—i.e., the creation of a "common law" of sentencing in the federal courts which will serve as a model for all segments of the criminal justice systems in the United States.

It should be conceded, however, that even if and when the new proposals become law, it will take a number of years before a significant edifice of case law on punishment can be erected in the federal system. Also, it is probable that the new proposals will not by themselves reduce instances of crime very much, if at all. Yet, with these caveats, I nonetheless submit that the proposals now under consideration before this subcommittee will allow us to deal more justly and sensibly with the criminal process on the federal level than heretofore—and this in keeping with our best notions of fairness and due process of law.

Turning to more specific potential advantages of these proposals, they will allow flexible responses to the problems of irrational disparities of sentencing within the federal system. Although I recognize that some argue to the contrary, every study on the subject indicates beyond serious doubt that there are unjust disparities, some within the same courts. Surely, one cannot contemplate any system whereby complete uniformity of sentences could or should be achieved. What attracts me to the present proposals is that they will go a long way toward eradicating unreasonable disparities. In addition, the guideline methodology will permit avoidance of the serious rigidities of mandatory minimum sentences. As this subcommittee knows, we have experimented with mandatory minima in the federal system before, most importantly and obviously in the narcotics offenses field, with conspicuous lack of success from most viewpoints. Moreover, mandatory minima at best only serve to shift discretion from the courts, which have to consider each individual case, to the legislature, which does not and cannot do so.

In addition, it is important to note the sensible resolution of the much-debated issue of sentence appeals in the federal system. The current proposals would provide for such appeals only in those instances where the sentencing judge chooses to go outside the guidelines proposed by the sentencing commission. In my judgment, this mechanism would serve to confine the appeals to serious issues and to assure that the courts of appeal are not unduly burdened by sentencing appeals on their dockets.

As has already been publicly noted,<sup>2</sup> Part III of S. 1437 and proposed new Chapter 58 of Title 28, United States Code, would largely eliminate the federal parole system as we know it and provide fixed sentences—either fixed terms of incarceration without parole or terms of incarceration followed by specific periods of parole. There is much to be said in favor of this approach, if only because offenders would know in advance exactly what to expect and so too would the interested public. In short, there would be precision and candor in our sentencing procedures—qualities sadly lacking now and within recent memory. Further, this approach may, with luck, lead us away from unnecessarily lengthy terms of incarceration.

As stated at the outset, the current proposals permit legislative guidance without the rigidities and time-lags which have heretofore been the hallmarks of legislative action in the field of punishment during virtually our entire history as a nation. This is important if one believes, as I do, that punishment questions, more than any other parts of a criminal code, involve the "fairly complex problem of definition of the criteria of justice."<sup>3</sup> The Congress, thus, must have an important role in determining criteria of justice. The pertinent promise of Part III is that its provisions enable Congress to fix the punishment maxima in the first instance and thereafter to exercise veto power, if it chooses, over specific guidelines within the maxima laid down by the administrative commission. But, at the same time, the commission and the judges in individual cases still will have the necessary flexibility and discretion to deal not only with individual cases but to take into account accretions of statistics and knowledge that hopefully will be forthcoming in the years ahead.

This last point leads to another intriguing and important potential of the existing proposals. Here I am talking about the mandate which Congress proposes to place upon the Commission to gather statistics and other relevant information on a regular and current basis in the field of punishment. In my opinion, the lack of any such capacity in the present federal system is one of our most critical weaknesses. Hence, for this reason alone, I respectfully submit that the new Commission, once it is properly staffed and in being, may turn out to offer as its most valuable contribution the collection of information and knowledge in this most important and difficult field.

Before conclusion, I respectfully call to the attention of the subcommittee one or two matters which may not be particularly clear in the present draft of the sentencing provisions. For example, turning to the proposed new Chapter 58 establishing the Sentencing Commission, I note the following:

1. In Section 991, subparagraph (a), it is provided that the nine members of the Committee are to be designated by the Judicial Conference of the United States. The disciplines or skills of the persons to be selected by the Judicial <sup>3</sup> Jean Norval Morris, University of Chicago Law School, Testimony, House Judiciary Committee, Subcommittee on Crime, April, Committee Print No. 2, April, 1977.

Conference, however, are not stated. Thus, for example, the present draft could be read to permit or require the Conference to select nine judges to be members of the Commission. Yet I am not convinced that this is clearly the intention of the draftsmen. In short, I suggest that the subcommittee might wish to consider this point and decide if it wishes to propose types or disciplines of persons to be designated by the Judicial Conference, either alone or in concert with other appointing officials or bodies.

2. The present draft of Chapter 58 fails to spell out potentially important details about the staff director and employees of the staff. To illustrate, I note that nothing is said as to the qualifications and pay scale of the staff director; similarly, the draft is silent as to the nature, qualifications and responsibilities of key subordinates of the director. If the Commission is to be as important as obviously intended, I would suggest that some thought might be given to some specific additional language bearing on these matters. In particular, because of the provisions of Section 995 dealing with the powers and obligations of the Commission, the research and development program alone will require people of considerable education and experience. Hence, it may be important to the Congress to make clear initially that there are appropriate positions with necessary pay scales in order to attract persons of reputation and capacity to these positions.

3. Subparagraph (e) of Section 994 now provides that, "a substantial sentence of imprisonment shall be provided in the guidelines for most cases in which . . ." (emphasis added). Although the Congress may wish to indicate to the commission certain priorities, including priorities in terms of gradations of punishment, I would suggest that the language here in subparagraph (e) may be ambiguous. Thus, the phrase "for most cases" is susceptible of several meanings which may provide trouble later on in the implementation of the policy judgment clearly intended in this subparagraph—i.e., that there should be a presumption in favor of incarceration for the categories of offenders here described.

4. Although this point may be implicit in the proposed draft of Chapter 58, I note that there are no express provisions for full public reporting of the guidelines promulgated pursuant to paragraph 994(a). In other words, though the present draft requires reporting to the Congress, it goes into no specifics as to how the commission shall report to the public, and indeed to the courts and the bar. Because of the significance of the guidelines and the desirability of their wide dissemination to not only courts and lawyers but also the public, the Congress may wish to give attention to specific requirements upon the commission for dissemination of guidelines and other information on a regular basis.

Once again, I thank the subcommittee for the invitation to appear here this morning. The importance of these sentencing proposals is considerable; thus, along with many others, I look forward to the progress of this important legislation in the weeks ahead.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness is Hon. Morris E. Lasker, Judge of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Judge Lasker, we are pleased that you would take the time to come here and express your viewpoints concerning this important piece of legislation.

Your reputation, as with the others, has preceded you. We appreciate your being here.

STATEMENT OF HON. MORRIS E. LASKER, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Judge LASKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am glad to have the opportunity to join the other judges who have testified here today, particularly my friend, Harold Tyler, who was a member of our court and whom we miss very much.

Judge Tyler was the chairman of the Second Circuit Sentencing Committee. I am delighted that, since his return to New York, Chief Judge Kaufman of our circuit has been wise enough to reappoint Judge Tyler to that job. I mention that because he and I have worked together in this process. I think a lot of our views are the same.

I still would like to give you my own thoughts about S. 1437. I am limiting what I have to say to the subjects of sentencing and parole, appeal of sentences, and the creation of the commission.

My suggestions as to sentencing and parole are, on the whole, technical but no less important, I hope, for that reason.

What I have to say as to the appeal of sentences and the creation of the commission expresses a philosophy.

As to sentences, it seems to me very important to bear in mind that the major decision to be made in imposing a sentence is whether or not the defendant should go to prison.

S. 1437 specifies no congressional view as to that matter. It seems to me that American experience with incarceration has not been encouraging. While there are many sound reasons for imposing a term of imprisonment, recognition of its destructive effects requires that, before sentencing a man or woman to prison, judges should consider whether a less drastic alternative will not do the job.

I, therefore, recommend that S. 1437 be amended to provide a presumption against incarceration, or the inclusion in section 2003(a) of a requirement that a Judge consider "whether other less restrictive sanctions have been applied to the defendant frequently or recently." That is language contained in S. 181 introduced by Senator Kennedy on behalf of himself, Senator McClellan and 10 other Senators.

Section 2104(d) of S. 1437 authorizes the sentencing court to extend the term of probation at any time prior to the expiration of the term if the original term was less than the authorized term. This provision seems to me unnecessary for the protection of the public and introduces into the probation process for the first time the destructive element of uncertainty so widely believed to have a pernicious effect on prisoner morale.

As probation now stands, a fixed term of probation is established by a judge; and it is not extended unless there is a violation of probation during the period of probation.

That, of course, is a feature which I think is salutary and which I think should be continued.

Moreover, as indicated in my prepared statement, I believe that section 2104(d) as now drafted raises questions of constitutionality which I will discuss later.

As to fines, I want to say that the new level of fines which may be imposed on individuals and corporations and the provision authorizing a court to require a defendant to pay a fine up to twice the gross gain derived or gross loss caused, which ever is greater, provide important new tools for the judiciary which should have a salutary effect even if a term of imprisonment is not imposed.

As to imprisonment and parole, an intelligent review of S. 1437's provisions on that subject must be unitary, not only because the subjects are functionally integrated in general, but because the provisions of S. 1437 themselves tie them together so closely.

I am concerned that, to the extent that 1437 reduces the Parole Commission's activities to merely ministerial duties, at the same time authorizing the sentencing commission to prescribe periods of parole ineligibility up to nine-tenths of the sentence, without significantly diminishing the length of sentences presently authorized, the result will be to lengthen substantially the average period of imprisonment actually served.

I do not think that that is what S. 1437's drafters want to accomplish.

Many judges, I have to say, Mr. Chairman, habitually impose long or fairly long sentences in the expectation that a grant of parole will result in the actual time served being much less than that originally imposed.

There are two ways to eliminate the possibility that long sentences will still be imposed without the possibility of meaningful parole reduction. One is to reduce the scale of allowable sentences as proposed by the Hart-Javits bill, S. 204. The other is to limit the sentencing commission's powers, as specified in Senator Kennedy's bill, S. 181, to setting standards for judicial sentences but not parole decisions.

My preference is for the latter mainly because I think it is more politically feasible at the moment. Otherwise, I would favor reduction of sentences as provided in the Hart-Javits bill. That is, I favor that the radical amendment of the powers of the Parole Commission which 1437 contemplates be deferred for separate comprehensive treatment of the subject of parole, including its possible abolition.

In the meantime, however, S. 1437 and 18 U.S.C. section 4201—which is the Parole Commission Act—should be amended to require that the sentencing and parole commissions coordinate their activities for the purpose of establishing a rational and integrated sentencing parole process.

If, however, the present structure of S. 1437 is to be adopted, I make the following suggestions.

First, while I realize that the provisions of section 2302(a), which authorize the sentencing court to specify a portion of the term of imprisonment as a term of parole ineligibility, is the functional equivalent of a judicially imposed minimum, a feature common to many systems, I oppose its introduction, particularly in its present form in which, for example, nine-tenths of a 25-year term may be specified as a period of parole ineligibility.

Minimum terms write in stone an awesome proposition—that of incarceration—which ought not to be put beyond the power of the community itself to modify or alter. However substantial may be the knowledge available to him at the time of sentencing, no judge can pretend to the omniscience necessary to be sure that his sentence, even guided by the standards of the Commission, may not be mistaken or unjust, or that a change of circumstances may not require its alteration. That, of course, applies particularly to long sentences.

While I oppose minimum sentences, I recognize that there is an impressive body of support for their imposition in appropriate circumstances. Nevertheless, even a system of minimum sentences must maintain a mechanism for relief in exceptional and appropriate cases—at least during the period of experimentation which S. 1437 will inaugurate.

Second, section 3834(d) authorizes the Parole Commission to set the term of parole at the time of the release determination. This provision, it seems to me, aggravates the factor of uncertainty by postponing the decision of parole term length unduly. Parole, though not imprisonment, constitutes a sanction, the terms of which should be set at the earliest possible time in the corrections continuum.

Third, the provisions of section 3834(g) authorizing the Parole Commission to extend the period of parole supervision at any time prior to its expiration, if less than the maximum authorized term was originally imposed, are troublesome. It is certainly clear that authorizing judicial increase of a term of imprisonment up to the statutory authorized maximum at any time prior to the expiration of the original sentence of imprisonment would raise a very serious constitutional question.

The provisions which allow the Parole Commission to extend the term of parole supervision or a judge to extend the term of probation, may be subject to the same infirmity and, in any event, add uncertainty to uncertainty in the life of the prisoner.

A preferable scheme, it seems to me, would be the establishment of an integrated guideline's sentence to include a prison term and a parole term, subject to review by the Parole Commission, so long as it continues to exist, for possible reduction in exceptional and appropriate cases during the experimental period to come.

Finally, the provisions of section 3835(i), which permits the Parole Commission on a second or later revocation of parole to imprison a defendant for the term of the original sentence less only the portion of that sentence served in confinement prior to the last parole, but without giving him credit for the period of time served on the last revocation, if I have read it correctly, seems to raise questions of double jeopardy by twice punishing a defendant for the same underlying offense.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the question of appeal of sentences. I am pleased that S. 1437 contains provision for appeal of sentences as did its predecessor, S. 1. It is unsatisfactory, however, that the bill limits the right of appeal of a defendant to the instance of a sentence falling outside the guidelines.

While it is to be expected that if the guidelines ultimately developed are sound and are intelligently applied by the sentencing judge, the result should be reasonable and fair, I nevertheless believe that all sentences should be appealable by a defendant.

Even where guidelines are followed, we cannot be sure that the guidelines—an entirely new venture in criminal justice—will be so obviously just as to preclude the need for modification in individual cases. Nor can we be certain that judges may not mechanically apply the standards themselves with results which may be unjust at least on occasion. We have learned that the act of sentencing is too awesome to be entrusted to one man alone.

There may come a time—and I certainly hope there will—when the body of material developed by the Commission is so foolproof, or nearly foolproof, that a single judge's sentence within the guidelines can be trusted as sound. That time has not yet arrived.

At least until it does, the defendant should have the right to appeal any sentence; but no appeal should be favorably granted unless the court of appeals finds that a sentence outside the guidelines is unreasonable or, within the guidelines, is clearly unreasonable.

It may be argued that granting defendants a right of appeal in all cases will impose an unworkable burden on the courts of appeals. I do not believe this will be so, although it may be easy for a district judge to say that.

First, it is unlikely that sentences within the guidelines will often be appealed. If they are, the appellate courts should be able to decide them summarily in many, if not most, instances.

Second, where the conviction itself is appealed, a determination as to the propriety of the sentence will add only marginally to the burden on the court. Experience in States which permit appellate review of all sentences, suggests that the burden is not heavy.

Senator HATCH. Judge, excuse me.

This is Senator Thurmond, who is going to relieve me at this point. He is our ranking minority member in this subcommittee and in the full committee. He is a man for whom I have a great deal of respect.

I apologize that I have to leave, but I do need to be over on the floor.

Judge LASKER. Senator Hatch, I am grateful that you were here.

Senator HATCH. I am grateful that Senator Thurmond is able to be here.

Senator THURMOND [acting chairman]. We have such a good man here, I hate to replace him.

You may proceed.

Judge LASKER. Senator, I am coming now to the question of the Commission membership.

It seems to me that the major questions relating to the membership of the Commission are whether the membership should be restricted to judges and who should appoint the members.

In my view, the membership of the Commission should not be limited to judges.

The process of sentencing represents the exercise of the community's collective sanction upon destructive behavior. Wide as the experience of judges may be, it cannot encompass the views of the community as a whole. Moreover, the membership of nonjudges on the Commission would give perspective to the judicial approach and enrich the thinking which would otherwise emanate from this specialized group.

Furthermore, the sentencing process inevitably draws not only on the intelligence and experience of judges but on the professional training and expertise of those in the probation and parole service, for example. The value of their contribution is embodied in presentence reports furnished to judges.

An experienced probation officer who has recommended sentences over a period of years and supervised junior officers in the preparation of such reports could be a valuable commission member.

I, therefore, favor the terms of Senator Kennedy's bill, which provides that the Commission membership shall include practicing attorneys, criminologists, prison, and parole authorities. I would add to this list, although I deem the list inclusive only, a specification that the Commission should include a person experienced in probation administration.

Now, who should appoint the members?

S. 1437 provides that members of the commission shall be appointed by the Judicial Conference. With all respect to my honored colleagues who are or may be members of that important body, I question the wisdom or efficacy of the bill in this regard.

I favor the provisions of the Hart-Javits bill, which provide for appointment of the commission members by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Presidential appointment, it seems to me, has very important advantages.

First, in the light of our historic experience, appointments by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate are regarded as positions of distinction. Thus, a Presidential appointment will confer the maximum possible dignity upon the office of member of the commission.

Second, Presidential appointment will confer, as it should, an equality of position between judicial and nonjudicial members of the commission. If the commission is to be made up both of judges and nonjudges, as I believe it should, then appointments should be made by a nonjudicial authority.

Third, whether or not the membership of the commission is restricted to judges, lodging authority for appointment of its members in the Judicial Conference may throw an apple of discord among the members of the judiciary. One cannot say whether membership on the commission will now or in the future be regarded as a form of patronage, whether in terms of psychic or financial income. However, since that possibility exists, the judiciary should not be involved in the process.

The final objection to authorizing the Judicial Conference to appoint the members of the commission is that such a process would be inefficient. The conference, as you know, presently consists of approximately 25 judges chaired by the Chief Justice. Such a large body is particularly unsuited to exercise an appointive power which for good reasons is normally lodged within the authority of an individual, not a large group.

I have earlier recommended that until the phasing out of parole as an institution can be separately and comprehensively studied, or until the scale of sentences set by S. 1437 is substantially lowered, the commission should not be authorized to establish parole ineligibility or release guidelines. I reiterate the point here because such a proposed power is an important feature of S. 1437.

My final point has to do with when the guidelines should become effective.

Section 994(g) provides that the guidelines shall take effect 180 days after they are reported to Congress subject to veto by either house of Congress. I favor this provision over those of the Hart-Javits bill, which requires a two-house veto to disapprove proposed guidelines, or the Kennedy bill which permits the guidelines to take effect within 180 days unless Congress acts as a whole.

Indeed, a good argument may be made that the guidelines should not become effective without affirmative approval by both houses. Such a provision would eliminate any lingering question as to the constitutionality of a one-house veto—a subject recently passed upon by the Court of Claims in a suit brought by the judges against the United States.

A sounder reason, however, for requiring two-house approval of the guidelines is that no subject is more important in the process of government or to the welfare of the people than the fixing of criminal sanctions.

I end my remarks by complimenting the drafters of S. 1437 for authorizing the Commission, in subdivision (a) (13) of section 995 of chapter 58, to collect and disseminate information concerning sentences actually imposed and the relationship of those sentences to the purposes of sentencing set forth in the statute.

Such a program should include research to follow up the behavior of Federal convicts both on probation and at the end of prison terms. Its results should furnish information which would enable the Commission and judges to evaluate their sentencing practices and the Bureau of Prisons to test the validity of its programs. Under present circumstances, no one knows the effect of sentences imposed. The program which the statute authorizes would help us emerge from this wilderness of ignorance.

Mr. Chairman, it is gratifying for me to have the opportunity to give you my views.

If you have any questions to put to me, I would be glad to answer them.

Senator THURMOND. Judge, S. 1437 provides that the Congress have veto power over sentencing guidelines set by the new sentencing commission.

Does this procedure seem reasonable in terms of allowing Congress to set minimum levels of punishment for crimes?

Judge LASKER. I think, Senator, as I have just indicated, that it is a sound provision. I do think that it probably is adequate.

The provision, as I understand it, follows the procedure which is allowed with regard to the Federal rules of criminal procedure and civil procedure and so on. As you know, Congress has found that to be fully effective to enable it to influence the content of those rules, and I assume it will be fully effective to enable Congress to affect the substance of the guidelines when they are finally created.

So, I think the answer to your question is yes.

Senator THURMOND. A number of witnesses have advocated the abolishment of the U.S. Parole Commission. Do you think it should be abolished?

Judge LASKER. I do believe that history is showing that parole as an institution is an idea whose time may be past.

But, as I expressed in my earlier remarks before you arrived, Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about bringing about such a radical change without considering the effect which it ought to have on the sentencing structure. As I explained when Senator Hatch was in the chair, I believe that many judges impose sentences much longer than they would if there were no parole mechanism available.

Therefore, I believe the matter has got to be studied much more carefully before the commission or the institution is abolished.

Senator THURMOND. I want to take this opportunity to express our appreciation to you for your appearance here. I am sure that your testimony will constitute very helpful recommendations to this committee.

Judge LASKER. I will be happy if that is the case.

Senator THURMOND. Thank you very much. I believe I neglected to state that your entire statement will be placed in the record.

Judge LASKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF MORRIS E. LASKER, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE OF THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

S 1437 constitutes an impressive accomplishment: a substantial recodification and revision of Title 18 of the United States Code and the creation of a new imaginative and business-like sentencing structure. The recodification, which eliminates or reconciles previously disparate provisions and which rationalizes the Code as a whole will furnish a more efficient, workable and fairer vehicle for the administration of justice. The new sentencing structure may eliminate and should minimize, insofar as human efforts can, the injustices which have flowed from the rudderless existing system. In doing so, the application of the new procedures should restore the confidence of those who are convicted of crime, as well as the public, that administration of justice in the federal courts and correctional system is fair.

My remarks are limited to the subjects of sentencing and parole, appeal of sentences and the creation of a proposed United States Sentencing Commission. My suggestions as to sentencing and parole are on the whole technical, but not less important for that reason. What I have to say as to appeal of sentences and the creation of the Commission expresses a philosophy.

AS TO SENTENCES

The major decision to be made in imposing a sentence is whether or not the defendant should be sent to prison. S 1437 specifies no Congressional view as to the matter. American experience with incarceration has not been encouraging. While there are many sound reasons for imposing a term of imprisonment, recognition of its destructive effects requires that before sentencing a man or woman to prison Judges should consider whether a less drastic alternative will not do the job. I therefore recommend that S 1437 be amended to provide a presumption against incarceration, or the inclusion in §2003(a) of a requirement that a Judge consider "whether other less restrictive sanctions have been applied to the defendant frequently or recently," language contained in S 181 introduced by Senator Kennedy on behalf of himself, Senator McClellan and ten other Senators.

Section 2104(d) of S 1437 authorizes the sentencing court to extend the term of probation at any time prior to the expiration of the term if the original term was less than the authorized term. This provision seems to me unnecessary for the protection of the public and introduces into the probation process for the first time the destructive element of uncertainty so widely believed to have a pernicious effect on prisoner morale. Moreover, as indicated below, I believe the provision raises questions of constitutionality.

FINES

The new levels of fines which may be imposed on individuals and corporations and the provision authorizing a court to require a defendant to pay a fine up to twice the gross gain derived or gross loss caused, whichever is greater, provide important new tools for the judiciary which should have a salutary effect even if a term of imprisonment is not imposed.

IMPRISONMENT AND PAROLE

An intelligent review of S 1437's provisions as to imprisonment and parole must be unitary, not only because the subjects are functionally integrated in general, but because the provisions of S 1437 itself ties them together so closely. I am concerned that to the extent that S 1437 reduces the Parole Commission's activities to merely ministerial duties, at the same time authorizing the Sentencing Commission to prescribe periods of parole ineligibility up to 9/10 of the sentence, without significantly diminishing the length of sentences presently authorized, the result will be to lengthen substantially the average period of imprisonment actually served. Many Judges habitually impose long or fairly long sentences in the expectation that a grant of parole will result in the actual time served being much less than the sentence originally imposed.

There are two ways to eliminate the possibility that long sentences will still be imposed without the possibility of meaningful parole reduction. One is to reduce the scale of allowable sentences as proposed by the Hart-Javits Bill S 204; the other is to limit the Sentencing Commission's powers as specified in Senator Kennedy's Bill S 181 to setting standards for judicial sentences but not parole decisions. My preference is for the latter: that is, that the radical amendment of the powers of the Parole Commission which S 1437 contemplates be deferred for separate comprehensive treatment of the subject of parole, including its possible abolition. In the meantime, however, S 1437 and 18 U.S.C. §4201 et seq. (Parole Commission Act of 1976) should be amended to require that the Sentencing and Parole Commissions coordinate their activities for the purpose of establishing a rational and integrated sentencing-parole process.

If, however, the present structure of S 1437 is to be adopted, I make the following suggestions.

1. While I realize that the provisions of §2302(a), authorizing the court to specify a portion of the term of imprisonment as a term of parole ineligibility, is the functional equivalent of a judicially imposed minimum term of imprisonment, a feature common to many systems, I oppose its introduction particularly in its present form, in which, for example, 9/10 of a twenty-five year term may be specified as a period of parole ineligibility. Minimum terms write in stone an awesome proposition—that of incarceration—which ought not be put beyond the power of the community to modify or alter. However substantial may be the knowledge available to him at the time of sentencing, no Judge can pretend to the omniscience necessary to be sure that his sentence, even guided by the standards of the Commission, may not be mistaken or unjust, or that a change of circumstances may not require its alteration.

While I oppose mandatory minimum sentences, I recognize that there is an impressive body of support for their imposition in appropriate circumstances. Nevertheless, even a system of minimum sentences must maintain a mechanism for relief in exceptional and appropriate cases—at least during the period of experimentation which S. 1437 will inaugurate.

2. Section 3834(b) authorizes the Parole Commission to set the term of parole at the time of the release determination. This provision aggravates the factor of uncertainty by postponing the decision of parole term length unduly. Parole, though not imprisonment, constitutes a sanction, the terms of which should be set at the earliest possible time in the corrections continuum.

3. The provisions of §3834(g) authorizing the Parole Commission to extend the period of parole supervision at any time prior to its expiration, if less than the maximum authorized term was originally imposed, are troublesome. It is certainly clear that authorizing judicial increase of a term of imprisonment up to the statutory authorized maximum at any time prior to the expiration of the original sentence date would raise a serious constitutional question. The provisions which allow the Parole Commission to extend the term of parole supervision or a Judge to extend the term of probation may be subject to the same infirmity and, in any event, add uncertainty to uncertainty in the life of the prisoner. A preferable scheme would be the establishment of an integrated guideline sentence to include a prison term and a parole term, subject to review by the Parole Commission for possible reduction in exceptional and appropriate cases during the experimental period to come.

4. The provisions of §3835(i) which permit the Parole Commission on a second or later revocation of parole to imprison a defendant for the term of the original sentence less only the portion of the original sentence served in confinement prior to the last parole, but without giving him credit for the period of time served on the last revocation, if I have read it correctly, seems to raise questions of double jeopardy by twice punishing a defendant for the same underlying offense.

APPEAL OF SENTENCES

I am pleased that S. 1437 contains provision for appeal of sentences as did its predecessor S. 1. It is unsatisfactory, however, that the bill limits the right of appeal of a defendant to the instance of a sentence falling outside the guidelines. While it is to be expected that if the guidelines ultimately developed are sound and are intelligently applied by the sentencing Judge, the result should be reasonable and fair, I nevertheless believe that all sentences should be appealable by a defendant. Even where guidelines are followed we cannot be sure that the guidelines—an entirely new venture in criminal justice—will be so obviously just as to preclude the need for modification in individual cases. Nor can we be certain that Judges may not mechanically apply the standards themselves with results which may be unjust at least on occasion. We have learned that the act of sentencing is too awesome to be entrusted to one man alone. There may come a time when the body of material developed by the Commission is so foolproof or nearly foolproof that a single Judge's sentence within the guidelines can be trusted as sound. That time has not yet arrived. At least until it does the defendant should have the right to appeal any sentence but no appeal should be favorably granted unless the Court of Appeals finds that a sentence outside the guidelines is "unreasonable" or within the guidelines, is "clearly unreasonable."

It may be argued that granting defendants a right of appeal in all cases will impose an unworkable burden on the Courts of Appeal. I do not believe this will be so. First, it is unlikely that sentences within the guidelines will often be appealed, and if they are the Appellate Courts should be able to decide them summarily in many instances. Second, where the conviction itself is appealed, a determination as to the propriety of the sentence will add only marginally to the burden of the Court. Experience in states which permit appellate review of all sentences, suggests that the burden is not heavy.

One further small but significant consideration as to appeals of sentences: S. 1 provided that in acting on an appeal the Appellate Court should take into consideration "the opportunity of the district court to observe the defendant." The provision has been eliminated from S. 1437. I believe it should be restored.

COMMISSION MEMBERSHIP

The major questions relating to the membership of the Commission are whether the membership should be restricted to Judges, and who should appoint the members.

In my view, the membership of the Commission should not be limited to Judges. The process of sentencing represents the exercise of the community's collective sanction upon destructive behavior. Wide as the experience of Judges may be it cannot encompass the views of the community as a whole. Moreover, the membership of non-Judges on the Commission would give perspective to the judicial approach and enrich the thinking which would otherwise emanate from this specialized group. Furthermore, the sentencing process inevitably draws not only on the intelligence and experience of Judges but on the professional training and expertise of those in the probation and parole service. The value of their contribution is embodied, for example, in the pre-sentence reports furnished to Judges. An experienced probation officer who has recommended sentences over a period of years and supervised junior officers in the preparation of such reports, could be a valuable Commission member. I, therefore, favor the terms of Senator Kennedy's Bill, S. 181, which provides that the Commission membership shall include practicing attorneys, criminologists, prison and parole authorities. I would add to this list, although I deem the list inclusive only, a specification that the Commission should include a person experienced in probation administration.

WHO SHOULD APPOINT THE MEMBERS

S. 1437 provides that members of the Commission shall be appointed by the Judicial Conference. With all respect to my honored colleagues who are or may be a member of that important body, I question the wisdom or efficacy of the Bill in this regard. I favor the provisions of the Hart-Javits Bill, S. 204, which provides for appointment of Commission members by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Presidential appointment has important advantages.

First, in the light of our historic experience, appointments by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate are regarded as positions of distinction. Thus a Presidential appointment will confer the maximum possible dignity upon the office of member of the Commission.

Second, Presidential appointment will confer, as it should, an equality of position between judicial and non-judicial members of the Commission. If the Commission is to be made up both of Judges and non-Judges, as I believe it should, then appointments should be made by a non-judicial authority.

Third, whether or not the membership of the Commission is restricted to Judges, lodging authority for appointment of its members in the Judicial Conference may throw an apple of discord among the members of the Judiciary. One cannot say whether membership on the Commission will now or in the future be regarded as a form of patronage, whether in terms of psychic or financial income. However, since that possibility exists, the Judiciary should not be involved in the process.

The final objection to authorizing the Judicial Conference to appoint the members of the Commission is that such a process would be inefficient. The Conference, as you know, presently consists of approximately twenty-five Judges chaired by the Chief Justice. Such a large body is particularly unsuited to exercise an appointive power which for good reasons is normally lodged within the authority of an individual, not a large group.

THE POWERS OF THE COMMISSION

I have earlier recommended that until the phasing out of parole as an institution can be separately and comprehensively studied, or until the scale of sentences set by S. 1437 is substantially lowered, the Commission should not be authorized to establish parole ineligibility or release guidelines. I reiterate the point here because such a proposed power is an important feature of S. 1437.

WHEN SHOULD THE GUIDELINES BECOME EFFECTIVE

Section 994(g) provides that the guidelines shall take effect 180 days after they are reported to Congress subject to veto by either House of Congress. I favor this provision over those of the Hart-Javits Bill (S. 204) which requires a two House veto to disapprove proposed guidelines, or the Kennedy Bill (S. 181) which permits the guidelines to take effect within 180 days unless Congress as a whole acts. Indeed, a good argument may be made that the guidelines should not become effective without affirmative approval by both Houses. Such a provision would eliminate any lingering question as to the constitutionality of a one House veto (a subject recently passed upon by the Court of Claims in Atkins, et al. v. United States, (41-76 May 18, 1977)). A sounder reason, however, for requiring two House approval of the guidelines is that no subject is more important in the process of government or to the welfare of the people than the fixing of criminal sanctions.

I end my remarks by complimenting the drafter of S. 1437 for authorizing the Commission, in sub-division (a) (13) of §995 of Chapter 58, to collect and disseminate information concerning sentences actually imposed and the relationship of those sentences to the purposes of sentencing set forth in the statute. Such a program should include research to follow-up the behavior of federal convicts both on probation and at the end of prison terms. Its results should furnish information which would enable the Commission and Judges to evaluate their sentencing practices and the Bureau of Prisons to test the validity of its programs. Under present circumstances, no one knows the effect of sentences imposed. The program which the statute authorizes would help us emerge from this wilderness of ignorance.

STATEMENT OF ANDREW VON HIRSCH, SCHOOL OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY

Mr. VON HIRSCH. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to be here to have the opportunity to testify.

In the interest of time, I will try to summarize some of the main points of my prepared testimony as quickly as I can.

My own involvement in this area comes from a number of projects that I have been working on. I was the principal author of a book entitled "Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments," which advocated a "just-deserts" rationale for sentencing. It contended that sentences should be primarily based on the seriousness of the offense; and that, in the interests of fairness, rehabilitative and predictive considerations should not be taken into account in setting the severity of punishment. The Hart-Javits bill, S. 204, which I helped draft, reflects this rationale.

I am now engaged in an LEAA-funded study on one of the issues which we have been talking about here: the alternative to parole. It deals with the question: if you get away from a rehabilitative model, what should happen to parole?

Let me say, first, that I think that this legislation, S. 1437, marks a great stride towards a sensible sentencing system. The existing situation, where judges have virtually almost unstructured discretion to decide the duration of confinement and whether to confine has never made any sense. As we begin to move away from the idea of rehabilitation as a justification for confinement, and as we move toward the idea that sentencing decisions should be based (at least in important part) on what somebody did—on the seriousness of his crime—it becomes absolutely essential to have standards.

I think that the technique which that the bills uses, which is to create a sentencing commission to set the standards, is the most sensible alternative.

California has tried to set sentencing standards by legislation. The experience in California suggests it is not a good idea. There are two kinds of problems. There is the political problems that arise from the fact that it is always tempting for a legislature advocate long minimum sentences, even when there is doubt that they actually can be imposed. But, beyond the political problem is simply the question of time. This body is engaged in a great deal of very important decision-making. Sentencing standards are very complicated. They have to be constantly revised. I do not think that a legislative body with this much on its agenda as the Congress has the time left over from more important functions to tinker with sentencing standards over time.

So, I do think that the basic thrust of the legislation is very salutary.

Let me, though, raise what I see to be problems in the bill. They revolve mainly around one issue. It is the issue of what should happen with parole.

The legislation, S. 1437, at the present time, leaves the commission to decide the details of the standards—which I think is sensible. It also leaves the commission to decide what the purposes of the standards should be—which is an arguable point. I prefer the approach of the Hart-Javits bill, S. 204, which specifies in some detail what purposes the sentencing commission should follow.

But S. 1437 goes further. Namely, it leaves the commission to decide the basic structural issue of whether parole should exist or not. It does this by providing that the commission may prescribe periods of parole ineligibility of up to nine-tenths of the sentence. If you impose across the board nine-tenths parole ineligibility, the effect is, of course, that parole, for all practical purposes, disappears.

Now, I think that that issue, of what should happen to parole, is a structurally important enough question that it should not be simply passed on to the sentencing commission. It should, I think, be addressed in the legislation. That is the fundamental problem I have.

Let me mention some specific problems—some of them were touched on by Judge Lasker—in the manner in which the bill authorizes the effective elimination of parole.

My own theory of punishment would be a theory which would not leave much room for—

Senator THURMOND. Excuse me. I notice that there is another vote on the floor.

Can you finish in 3 or 4 minutes? Otherwise, I am afraid that we will have to come back another day.

Mr. VON HIRSCH. I could try to finish in 5 minutes.

Senator THURMOND. We are going to insert your full statement into the record. Are you saying things that are not in your statement?

Please take just 3 or 4 minutes to wind up, because I will have to leave.

Mr. VON HIRSCH. To put it very succinctly, Mr. Chairman, I think it is very dangerous to try to abolish parole if you do the two things that the bill now does: namely, preserve the very long authorized sentences of confinement, and—and I think this is the most serious problem—continue to have the judiciary appoint the members of the commission.

Judges are now used to prescribing long purported sentences of confinement. They are not used to the functions a parole board now has of, namely, imposing actual durations of confinement—which have to be shorter.

If you authorize the abolition of parole, continue the long maxima, and have a judge-dominated commission continue to prescribe the terms, I think you could have an enormous jump in the duration of confinement.

I, therefore, suggest the following.

First of all, I agree with Judge Lasker that the ideal solution would be that we defer any major change in the status of parole until we take a look at how well the sentencing commission has been handling its initial job of structuring judges' sentencing standards.

I think if you do that, then I think it would make sense in the interim to change the factors described in section 3831 (c) of the bill, that the parole board is supposed to consider in its parole decisions so that they read similarly to the factors which the bill requires the sentencing commission to consider.

If you do not do this, if you want to act now, then it seems to me that if you give the sentencing commission discretion on the question of parole abolition, that a few things have to be changed.

First, I think you have to change the appointing authority. You have to move toward a presidential appointment or some other method to insure that this is not totally a judge-dominated commission.

I think, also, that you should not allow—

Senator THURMOND [acting chairman]. Have you said this in your statement?

Mr. VON HIRSCH. No; Senator, I have not.

Senator THURMOND. Go ahead.

Mr. VON HIRSCH. If you authorize periods of parole ineligibility in excess of one-third, you should do so only to the extent prescribed by the Commission. At the present time, the way the bill works is that the Commission's guidelines are only guidelines which judges are asked to consider.

Finally, it seems to me that the commission should then be required to hold separate hearings on the question of the proposed phaseout or elimination of parole. I think there should be language expressly inserted in the bill which provides that if there is any phaseout of parole, the commission be required to adjust durations of confinement in such a way as to reflect the fact that parole is now no longer available to reduce times of actual imprisonment.

I take it, because of the absence of time, if that is all right, Senator, I can try to submit a separate letter in which I submit some of these details to the staff.

Senator THURMOND. Without objection, your statement will be inserted in the record. If you wish to make any addendum to your statement for the record, feel free to do that.

Mr. VON HIRSCH. Thank you.

Senator THURMOND. We will keep the record open for that.

Thank you very much for appearing here. We appreciate your presence. I am sure your testimony will be very helpful.

STATEMENT OF ANDREW VON HIRSCH, GRADUATE SCHOOL OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY

The sentencing provisions of S.1437 contain an innovation which I strongly support—the creation of a sentencing commission to formulate standards for criminal sentences. At the same time, I have some concerns about some of the specifics of the legislation, which I shall explain.

My credentials for offering these opinions can briefly be stated. I was principal author of Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments<sup>1</sup>, which was the report on the aims of criminal sentencing of the Committee for the Study of Incarceration, an interdisciplinary study group of scholars funded by the Field Foundation and New World Foundation. The report recommended a "just deserts" rationale, and the creation of sentencing standards in the form of presumptive sentences. The substance of the report's recommendations are embodied in the Hart-Javits bill (S.204), now before this Subcommittee, and I assisted in the drafting of that bill.

I was also a member of the Twentieth Century Fund's Task Force on Criminal Sentencing, whose report, Fair and Certain Punishment,<sup>2</sup> likewise recommends the adoption of presumptive sentences.

Recently, I have been conducting a study on alternatives to parole, funded by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

The Need for Sentencing Standards.—I shall not dwell long on the urgent need for standards in sentencing. Numerous studies and reports have documented that need, as a means for structuring discretion and reducing disparity.<sup>3</sup> My own book, Doing Justice strongly recommends the establishment of such standards.

Those of us who advocate sentencing standards do not claim, I should note, that disparity can be corrected solely by establishing norms for judges' formal sentencing decisions. Equal justice in sentencing will be elusive as long as prosecutors continue to have unlimited and unstructured powers to decide what crime to charge and what guilty plea to accept. We claim merely that sentencing standards are a useful first step: that once some semblance of coherence is given the formal sentencing decision, one can then address the politically and substantively harder question of regulating prosecutorial discretion.<sup>4</sup>

The Advantages of a Sentencing Commission.—Sometimes, it is supposed that the only alternative to wide sentencing discretion is to have the legislature set the sentencing standards. Suggestions to limit judges' discretion evoke arguments about the ills of legislative sentencing—for instance, the tendency of some legislatures to adopt harsh penalties to show "toughness on crime" to the electorate.<sup>5</sup>

I do not believe that the legislature is well suited to write the sentencing standards. Aside from the dangers of escalating the penalties for political reasons, legislatures simply do not have the necessary time. Adequate standards are complicated—and will require experimentation and revision over time. The standard-setting agency should be capable of reviewing and adjusting the standards continually, in the light of accumulating judicial experience with the use of such norms. A Congress that must each year decide a huge national budget and develop major programs in the fields of energy, environment, job-creation and a host of other areas simply does not have time and resources for the task of reviewing and fine-tuning sentencing standards adopted in a previous session.

It is much preferable, I think, to create a special rule-making agency—namely, a sentencing commission—to set the standards, as this Subcommittee's bill (S. 1437) as well as the Kennedy bill (S.181) and the Hart-Javits bill (S.204) propose. A specialized rule-making agency, having the setting of sentencing standards as its primary function, could develop expertise in this task. It could collect empirical data for use in formulating its standards. It could regularly modify and revise its norms on the basis of experience. And as a body that is comparatively insulated from political stresses, it will be under less pressure to adopt harsh symbolic penalties that, in a system having limited resources, cannot feasibly be applied in normal cases.

Who Should Appoint the Commission?—The Subcommittee bill (S.1437) provides that the Commission is to be located in the judicial branch, and that its members are to be appointed by the Judicial Conference.

I do not share the view that sentencing standards are a matter of concern to judges alone. Then sentencing norms adopted by the Commission will have an enormous impact on the decisions of prosecutors and parole officials—who are not members of the judicial branch, but who nevertheless substantially influence what happens to the convicted offender.

Consider the prosecutor. Even in the Federal system, pleas of guilty are not uncommon; and the prosecutor's decision on what plea to accept and what sentence to recommend may largely determine the disposition. Whether the standards succeed or fail may depend on the Commission's ability to anticipate how these norms will affect such prosecutorial decisions. With careful attention given this subject, the standards might help alleviate some present abuses of prosecutorial discretion—by making the penalty that would follow from a given charge more predictable, and by limiting the power to threaten disproportionate punishments against those who insist on their right of trial. But if the impact of the standards on prosecutorial decisions is overlooked, the standards may—as Professor Alschuler has warned in a thoughtful recent paper<sup>6</sup>—accomplish little more than to shift the locus of discretion from judges to plea bargainers. The large impact which the sentencing standards may have on parole decisions is still more obvious.

This suggests that the Commission, although affecting judges most directly, is not a parochial concern of the judicial branch alone. The appointing authority should be one whose interests are broad enough to take into account how the standards would affect and be affected by prosecutorial, parole and correctional decisions—and to appoint individuals to the Commission who can give guidance on these difficult interaction effects.

To my mind, the official best suited to make appointments that thus involve the activities of several branches of government is the President. As Judge Marvin Frankel has aptly noted in his testimony yesterday,

<sup>6</sup> Albert Alschuler, "Impact of Determinate Sentencing Upon Judges, Defense Attorneys and Prosecutors," paper presented before the Special Conference on Determinate Sentencing, Earl Warren Legal Institute, University of California, Berkeley, June 3, 1977.

"It is familiar, of course, to have the President name officials whose positions are judicial, or even legislative in character, as well as those strictly 'executive.' Presidential appointment implies qualities of prestige and consequence not achieved by the provision for Judicial Conference appointments. This Commission ought to be, or we should make vivid the hope that it will become, an illustrious agency, charged with large responsibilities for improvement and innovation. The prospects for success will hinge upon the possibility of attracting as Commissioners people of rich qualifications and high repute. Presidential selection will enhance that possibility."

I would thus have the members of the Commission appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the Hart-Javits bill (S.204) provides.

What Rationale Should the Commission Use?—Sentencing has been plagued with the problem of competing aims. The criminal sanction is said to serve at least four purposes: rehabilitation, incapacitation, deterrence and desert. Yet these can conflict: the best treatment may be a poor deterrent, and the best deterrent may be undeservedly severe.

The Commission's success will depend largely on establishing a consistent rationale for its decisions. If there are to be multiple aims in sentencing, priorities among those aims will have to be set. Otherwise it will be difficult to resist the temptation of leaving, as the Model Penal Code did, the reconciliation of competing purposes to the discretion of the judge in the individual case.<sup>7</sup>

Which body, then, should decide what the rationale for the standards should be?

My preference would be to follow the approach of the Hart-Javits bill (S.204): embody a clear statement of purposes in the legislation. The Hart-Javits bill gives priority to the requirements of desert—the Commission is required, in prescribing presumptive sentences, to ensure that "the severity of each presumptive sentence shall be commensurate with the gravity of the criminal offense to which [it] is assigned." A similar approach will soon be adopted in Oregon.<sup>8</sup> According to legislation passed in the state House of Representatives and likely to pass in the Senate, a Commission on Prison terms is required to recommend, and the parole board to adopt, standards for duration of confinement. The legislation requires that those standards give priority to desert, and consider other aims only if they do not result in disproportionate severity or leniency.

If the legislature cannot agree on a clear statement of purposes, then that should be the responsibility of the Commission. The Commission should explicitly state the rationale for its standards, and then decide the specifics on the basis of that rationale. This approach gives the Commission wider power, but at least assures that the content of the standards will be decided in a principled fashion.

This brings me to a feature that I find troublesome in the Subcommittee's bill (S.1437). The "purposes" section of the bill does not set forth a coherent rationale—but merely lists the four competing aims of rehabilitation, incapacitation, deterrence and desert. Then, the bill lists a miscellany of factors about the offender and offense which the Commission is supposed to consider.

<sup>8</sup> Oregon Legislative Assembly, 1977 Regular Session, A-Engrossed House Bill 2013, as amended by the House of Representatives, May 16, 1977. The bill creates an Advisory Commission on Prison Terms, consisting of the five members of the parole board and five circuit judges. The Commission is required to recommend, and the parole board to adopt standards for duration of confinement. Prisoners must be notified within six months of entering prison of their expected release date. The critical section of the bill, which requires the Commission and the board to rely primarily on "just deserts" in setting duration of confinement, reads as follows:

Section 2. (1) The commission shall propose to the board and the board shall adopt rules establishing ranges of duration of imprisonment to be served for felony offenses prior to release on parole. The range for any offense shall be within the maximum sentence provided for that offense.

(2) The ranges shall be designed to achieve the following objectives:

(a) Punishment which is commensurate with the seriousness of the prisoner's criminal conduct; and

(b) To the extent not inconsistent with paragraph (a) of this subsection:

(A) The deterrence of criminal conduct; and

(B) The protection of the public from further crimes by the defendant.

(3) The ranges, in achieving the purposes set forth in subsection (2) of this section, shall give primary weight to the seriousness of the prisoner's present offense and his criminal history."

Some of these are relevant to the offender's degree of blameworthiness (e.g., the "nature and degree of harm caused by the offense," and "the [defendant's] role in the offense"). Others seem germane only to his supposed future dangerousness or need for treatment (e.g., "previous employment record", "community ties" and "vocational skills"). Yet no one is called upon to address the issues of principle involved in including the latter factors: whether and to what extent a just sentencing system should allow someone to be punished more severely for what he is expected to do in future.<sup>9*</sup>

If Congress does not wish to furnish the Commission with a rationale, then it should be up to the Commission to decide what it should be. In that event, the Commission should decide, on the basis of its assumed aims, what particular factors should be included in the standards. The language of the bill should therefore make it clear it should be within the Commission's discretion to determine whether any particular factors are to be part of the standards. The bill ought not, as it now seems to, require the Commission's standards to include all the listed factors.

What Happens to Parole? The Subcommittee's bill goes far toward relegating the Parole Commission to merely ministerial duties. Standards relating to parole release are to be prescribed by the Sentencing Commission, rather than the parole board. And the bill authorizes the Sentencing Commission to prescribe periods of parole ineligibility of up to nine-tenths of the sentence.

Parole is now coming under attack from many quarters,<sup>10</sup> the most notable being the Attorney General's recent call for its abolition. Much of the current criticism of parole is, in my view, justified. I have no sympathy with parole boards' traditional practice of making standardless decisions about when an inmate was "ready" for release. There must be standards governing the duration of confinement. And on the "just deserts" view I espouse in Doing Justice, there would be no reason to delay notifying the prisoner of when he may be expected to be released. The duration of confinement should depend on the seriousness of the crime; and the latter is as well ascertainable at the moment of sentence as at any later date.

Yet I have been spending the last eighteen months on the LEAA-funded study I mentioned earlier, dealing with the subject of parole abolition and its possible consequences. The one thing that study has convinced me is that we should approach this subject with caution. Parole is now so integral to the whole sentencing system, that its elimination or downgrading could have all kinds of repercussions: unless care is taken, the unintended effects could largely vitiate the usefulness of that reform. Thus:

1. Whatever its other defects, parole does perform one vital function: it reduces the time of confinement to manageable levels. Judges are accustomed to imposing long purported sentences of confinement which (whatever their possible symbolic usefulness may be) could not be carried out given the limitation of prison resources; and which would be disproportionately severe were they carried out. The parole board reduces these purported terms by somewhere between one- and two-thirds—thus producing less harsh penalties, consistent also with the limitation of resources.

If one wishes to phase out parole, therefore, one must create some alternative mechanism to keep durations of confinement within reasonable bounds. The Hart-Javits bill (S.204) does so by setting stringent limits on durations of confinement. Parole is abolished, and judges decide the actual duration of confinement pursuant to rules of the Sentencing Commission. But the legislation expressly requires that the Commission's standards make sparing use of terms in excess of five years of actual confinement.

What troubles me about the Subcommittee's bill is that it authorizes the near-eclipse of the parole board without reducing the permitted duration of * Norval Morris and I have argued that it is unjust to rely on predictions of criminal conduct in deciding the severity of punishment—because of the inherent tendency of such forecasts to overpredict, and because an offender does not deserve additional punishment because of what he is merely expected to do in future.

<sup>10</sup> See, e.g., Citizens' Inquiry on Parole and Criminal Justice, Prison Without Walls: Report on New York Parole, (New York: Praeger Publishers, 1975); David T. Stanley, Prisoners Among Us: The Problem of Parole (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1976); M. Kay Harris, "Disquisition on the Need for a New Model for Criminal Sentencing Systems," 77 West Virginia L. Rev. 263 (1975).

confinement. The Sentencing Commission may set rules that make the offender virtually ineligible for parole, and yet the bill's statutory limits on imprisonment continue to be nearly as high as before. Instead of the modest durational limits called for by the Hart-Javits bill, the Subcommittee bill prescribes such large limits as 25 years, 12 years and 6 years.

This problem is compounded by the bill's choice of appointing authority, of which I spoke earlier. Parole boards, whatever their other defects, are used to thinking in terms of actual durations of confinement. Judges are used to thinking in terms of long symbolic durations which parole boards later shorten. Yet the bill, by having the Judicial Conference choose the Commission, may result in a rule-making body dominated by judges.

2. The U.S. Parole Commission has been the first sentencing or correctional agency in the nation to adopt explicit standards governing its release decisions. Only last year, Congress adopted legislation formalizing its standard-setting powers. I do not completely agree with the Parole Commission's standards, as they depend in part on predictive factors whereas I prefer to rely wholly on the gravity of the offender's criminal conduct. And others have pointed out technical defects in the standards.<sup>11</sup> But the Commission has striven hard to structure its discretion and has continually revised its standards in the light of criticism and new information.*

The Sentencing Commission is a new agency, which is given the novel and difficult mission of establishing standards for judges' sentencing decisions. We all hope that it will succeed in that task—and if experience bears out this hope, Congress can then phase out parole and have the Commission assume the parole board's present rule-making functions governing release from prison. But, we should realistically realize that our hopes could be disappointed. Perhaps, the Sentencing Commission will prescribe "standards" that are too imprecise to give much guidance to sentencing decisions. (This has just happened in California, where the new sentencing legislation—besides prescribing a detailed tariff of prison terms for those sent to prison—requires the state's Judicial Council to set standards governing the judges' decision to grant or deny probation.<sup>12</sup> The Council's recently published standards, many observers feel, are too vague to give much useful guidance to judges.<sup>13</sup> Were that to happen, we could be worse off were the Subcommittee bill's approach taken. Not only will we have failed to structure judges' sentencing discretion; but the new Commission might prove less effective in developing parole release standards, than the Federal Parole Commission is today.

My suggested solution is that, for the moment, we take the approach of the Kennedy bill—simply authorize the Sentencing Commission to prescribe standards governing judicial sentences. Before changing the status of parole and the standard-setting authority of the parole board, full hearings should be held on the specific subject of parole abolition. Those hearings should not only consider the proposals on periods of parole ineligibility contained in the Subcommittee bill, but also more ambitious proposals for complete abolition of parole.<sup>14**</sup>

Mandatory Minima.—I notice that the Subcommittee bill contains two provisions for mandatory minimum sentences. I do not think they are desirable—for my earlier-stated reason that the Commission is preferable to the legislature as the body that decides durations of confinement.

* I am pleased to note that, for example, the Board is now considering a change of policy that would require offenders to be notified early of their expected date of release.

At a recent LEAA-sponsored conference on determinate sentencing, Professor Caleb Foote of the University of California Law School at Berkeley read an excellent paper on the possible collateral consequences of parole abolition.

BIOGRAPHICAL STATEMENT

Andrew von Hirsch is associate professor at the Graduate School of Criminal Justice, Rutgers University, in Newark, New Jersey. He is also Senior Research Associate at the Center for Policy Research in New York City.

He was principal author of Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments, the report on the aims of criminal sentencing of the Committee for the Study of Incarceration, and interdisciplinary study group funded by the Field Foundation and New World Foundation. The report was published by Hill and Wang, New York, New York in 1976.

He is now heading a study on alternatives to parole, funded by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, Washington, D.C. The report is expected to be completed in the fall of 1977.

Mr. von Hirsch was also a member of the Twentieth Century Fund's Task Force on Criminal Sentencing, whose report, Fair and Certain Punishment, was published recently.

He is a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School. He is a member of the New York Bar.

Our last witness is Mr. John Shattuck, who is with Mr. Aryeh Neier.

Mr. Shattuck, we can give you from now until the 5-minute bell rings.

Your statement will be inserted in the record later. If it is not complete and you would like to file any other paper, we will allow you to do that. [See p. 9058.]

You might touch on anything that is not in your statement so we get the benefit of that.

Welcome to the committee.

STATEMENT OF ARYEH NEIER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, AND JOHN H. F. SHATTUCK, WASHINGTON OFFICE DIRECTOR, ACLU

MR. SHATTUCK. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think the most effective way in which we can utilize the short time available is for Mr. Aryeh Neier, who is the executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union and who appears with me today, is to present a general introductory view that we set forth in the beginning of our prepared statement. He will summarize it for you. The details of our testimony on the entire bill are available in the remainder of our prepared statement. We may supplement them at some future time.

SENATOR THURMOND [acting chairman]. Go right ahead.

MR. NEIER. Thank you very much, Senator.

The testimony that we have presented contains a large number of detailed criticism of S. 1437. We make these criticisms of the bill because we approach the entire process of criminal code revision as a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to obtain Federal legislation that adopts a coherent approach to the problem of crime and punishment.

We recognize that this process has been underway for a great many years. A great many compromises have been made. This bill is a vast improvement over its predecessor, S. 1; but we still find a large number of deficiencies in this legislation. We feel obligated to seek the best possible legislation—

SENATOR THURMOND. You have outlined those in your statement?

Mr. NEIER. There are three basic principles which we address in the various detailed criticisms. I just want to take a few moments to describe those basic principles.

One of the basic principles is that the criminal code should be focused on those crimes which injure other persons.

We say this because the Federal Criminal Code is important in and of itself but also because the Federal Criminal Code is a model for the States. The State criminal laws seriously affect——

Senator THURMOND. Excuse me. We will have to close the hearing.

Mr. NEIER. Let me suggest something else, Senator. That is the possibility that we come back on some other occasion and present fuller testimony. I think we would like the opportunity to do that.

Senator THURMOND. That would be all right.

We will hold your statement until your later appearance. If you want to submit any supplementary statement, feel free to do that.

Mr. NEIER. Very good.

Senator THURMOND. We will now recess, subject to the call of the chair.

[Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the meeting was recessed.]

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM ACT OF 1977

MONDAY, JUNE 20, 1977

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:50 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Senator Edward M. Kennedy (acting chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Staff present: Paul C. Summitt, D. Eric Hultman, Paul H. Robinson, Kenneth Feinberg, and Mabel A. Downey of the committee staff.

Senator KENNEDY. The subcommittee will come to order.

We will continue our hearings on S. 1437, legislation introduced by Senator McClellan and myself to recodify the entire Federal criminal code. This has been an ongoing effort for the last 11 years, beginning with the Brown Commission. We have had a concentrated series of hearings in the last 2 weeks in an effort to move this legislation along, recognizing its timeliness.

We will be focusing primarily on the issues of sentencing here today. We will continue tomorrow, and hopefully, that will conclude the hearings on this extremely important effort to recodify the criminal code.

We want to welcome this morning the former ranking minority member of the committee and also an extremely active member of the Brown Commission, Senator Hruska. He has given a great deal of time and effort to this whole area of recodification. This was one of his very important interests.

Beyond all of that, he has been a good friend as well. We have not always looked at matters in the same light, but we have enjoyed our exchanges. The committee was stronger for his service to it as was the Senate.

We are delighted to have Senator Hruska here to testify.

OPENING STATEMENT OF ROMAN L. HRUSKA

Mr. HRUSKA. I thank you for your welcome. It is a pleasure to return to these familiar surroundings, the scene of many parliamentary forays in many fields of endeavor. I recall them with a great deal of pleasure and a little bit of homesickness.

Mr. Chairman, I have a prepared statement here which I would like to have incorporated in the record at the conclusion of my remarks.

My support for the creation and enactment of a criminal code is a matter of record. About 10 years has been devoted to the creation of such a code. My prepared statement refers to the various steps in the development of the measure now before us.

I read with a great deal of interest the statement of former Governor "Pat" Brown before this committee. My association with him on the Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws, which he chaired, was the first time I had the opportunity to work with him. I have formed a very high respect and admiration for his qualities of leadership and his capabilities as an administrator.

We were lucky and fortunate to have had former Justice Tom Clark as chairman of the Advisory Committee. The Members of the Senate on that Commission, as you will recall, were Senator McClellan, Senator Ervin, and myself.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that over the last 10 years the code has retained its essential integrity. A code is not only, as I understand it and as we have frequently been reminded by authorities, a rational, comprehensive and logical arrangement of rules and principles on a given subject. It is an arrangement which comes about at the hands of a competent authority, which in this case would be the Congress and the President, and also—and this is important—it must be achieved and made effective within a relatively brief frame of time. Without that, it partakes of the nature of being a piecemeal effort.

Ten years is not an unduly long time frame. Certainly one criminal code for a Republic which just recently celebrated its 200th year of independence is not an oversurplus of criminal codes. We have had none. This, if it is adopted, will be the first.

Throughout the process, all the way from the final report of the Brown Commission to the several bills which have been introduced in the Congress, there has been a retention of the essential quality and integrity of a code.

Given the broad level of support for the bill in its present form, we do hope for its enactment. However, there are still some potential obstacles. The subject of criminal law and codification always raises sensational issues. You have political winds which change. Coalitions are formed and they diffuse. Time is of the essence. It is hoped—and I certainly support that hope and express it as fervently as I can—that whatever issues that might arise will not suffocate the code.

I believe there is reason to believe that the volumes of hearings and reports and the years of debate and analysis provides an unusually sound basis on which to make a decision as to the merits of each of these issues.

Obviously some of these issues will be the subject of sharp debate on the floor of the Senate, and later in the other body. This is as it should be. After all, that is the essence of the legislative process.

There comes a time, however, when a vote will be taken and at least temporarily the results of that vote will abide and we will go on to the next item.

There may be a temptation, Mr. Chairman, in the months ahead to split up the code into more readily consummable parts. It would be a tragic mistake if that temptation was yielded to.

A code is an integral thing, as I have already pointed out. Its integrated nature provides its greatest advantage. Our laws cannot suffer additional patching up. I will not go into the details of the reasons why it is necessary that this be done—the inconsistencies and the obsolescence and the duplication—that has been well documented.

Senator KENNEDY. I think that is important, however, Senator. I think that will be the attempt that will be made by those, for whatever reasons, who are not sympathetic to the general approach that is being taken in this legislation.

I think you understand the interrelationship between these various provisions and the description of culpability, for example, and the proliferation of different terms that are used in different sections of the code and the interrelationship of these different provisions, both directly in terms of the different definitions of theft and armed robbery, let alone how that relates to the whole common approach with regard to the sentencing provisions.

I think we cannot stress enough the importance of the interrelationships of the various provisions, the definitions, the terms, and the extremely important sentencing provisions in terms of a composite package.

I am wondering whether we could not underline this a bit from your own experience as a member of the Brown Commission. You have seen this interrelationship. I think this will be one of the key points that will be attempted by those who want to frustrate it.

I would appreciate your underlining your own views on that.

Mr. HRUSKA. I quote Sir Francis Bacon in my statement. It was just as true in his time as it is now. "The laws of most kingdoms and states have been like buildings of many pieces, patched up from time to time according to occasions, without frame or model."

Unless it is considered as a unit, the code simply would not be a success. Even the finding of the law is difficult under the present situation because of its being scattered through numerous titles. The bill, as it now exists, makes the law simple and knowable.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to consider various segments at different times without the necessity of the interrelationship to which you have referred in your comment, we will have failed. So, I do believe that, notwithstanding the fact that there are parts of it that anyone of us might severely criticize, it is incumbent upon us, however close or however removed we are from the creation of this legislation in its present form, to set aside points of individual preference, so that the effort to produce a code can succeed. Then, with the reservations that have been made on various specific points, there can be considered these other propositions at a later time.

The new sentencing provisions, Mr. Chairman, as they are before us in this bill, give me no pause in stating that the bill continues to have my full support.

I have some reservations about it. I shall mention one in particular a little bit later. However, if a person is convicted of an offense under the code, he will be sentenced under a system that provides some hope of fair and uniform punishment. Under our present system we do not have uniform punishment for the same types of offense committed by persons of the same status or history. That is too well known to require further documentation now.

The creation of a sentencing commission and the elimination of the indeterminate sentence in favor of more uniform sentences within the bounds set by the Commission will be a great improvement. It is not perfect. It will still remain for a fair trial of that method before we can make a final judgment. But I believe I am safe in saying, Mr. Chairman, that it holds bright promise to be a great improvement over what we have.

Within the bounds of the Commission's guidelines, sentence may be imposed by the sentencing court. If it is within those guidelines, then appeal will not lie. If there is a departure from the bounds of those guidelines, then two things will happen. First of all, the judge will be called upon to give his reasons why he chose to go beyond the guidelines. Second, the convicted person or the one who is sentenced will have an opportunity to appeal.

On the subject of appellate review, my views are well known. For about 10 or 12 years every Congress was favored or disfavored with the presence of a bill proposed by this one-time Senator on the subject of appellate review. I took a little different view of appellate review in those bills than is reflected in this present bill.

Notwithstanding that the method that was proposed in those bills in earlier times was not adopted and no action was taken on them, nevertheless, the literature that was created as a result of the hearings served a purpose. The rejection of those bills served a purpose because it showed us certain ways in which the problem could not be done. That reminds me of the story of Edison when he was told, after making six or seven attempts in laboratory experiments to achieve a given result he was asked if that was not a waste of time. He said, "No, it is not a waste of time. It shows six or seven ways in which that objective may not be reached. That narrows the field."

It was my thought in the bills that I had introduced that there should be appellate review with proper procedural requirements available to anyone who is convicted of a crime. The basis of that—and it is perhaps the most persuasive argument in favor of it—is that America is the only civilized country that I am aware of that does not have some form of appeal of sentence. We are the only country, Mr. Chairman, in which the word of one man is not supervised, is not reviewed, and is totally uncontrollable as it now stands, barring only those wide ranges in which the sentence may be imposed.

SENATOR KENNEDY. You would favor more general appellate review?

MR. HRUSKA. Yes.

SENATOR KENNEDY. I mean, other than in the bill itself. If sentenced within the various guidelines, there would not be any appellate review. But sentences below the guidelines would be appealed by the Government, or above could be appealed by the defendant.

But your position generally would be to permit appeal of sentences under any circumstances. Is that correct?

MR. HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, I express support of the bill in its present form.

SENATOR KENNEDY. Yes.

MR. HRUSKA. Judge Frankel favored the bill also. He said, "If I had my way, I would make more numerous the occasions upon which appeal may be taken from sentence."

I would be a little bit hypocritical if I urged that we not depart too much from this bill with the exception of something in which I have a pet interest.

Senator KENNEDY. That is right.

Mr. HRUSKA. My mentioning that point is not for the purpose of urging upon the committee or upon the Congress that they should not let this bill pass unless it had my pet concern taken care of. That is not my point.

My point is, however, that here are guidelines set by the sentencing commission. If the judge, in sentencing, stays within those guidelines, then there is no opportunity to appeal.

Consider this type of situation. In our country we used to have wheat acreage allotments with guidelines that fill books inches high. And yet, when a decision was made that the acreage allotment would be 212 acres, rather than 300 acres, an appeal would lie. The same thing is true in an Internal Revenue case.

In every other situation that we know of, there lies an appeal except where a man's liberty is taken from him by a judge whose action is not appealable as long as he stays within those guidelines.

Having said that, again let me repeat. The point is not to derogate one whit from my support of the bill as it is. In due time I do believe the concept of appellate review embodied in this bill will be expanded.

Senator KENNEDY. My inclination would be exactly the same as yours. How do you react to Chief Justice Burger's observations about the flooding of appellate courts, and Attorney General Bell's concurrence in that view? I am talking about all cases. That has been their position. They have written about it. The Chief Justice has spoken about it. He has communicated his views to us, on occasion.

I am wondering, as someone who is obviously concerned with the functioning of the courts, whether you think that would be a real problem?

Mr. HRUSKA. There are three observations I would like to make on that. That type of objection was made when we were considering the criminal justice bill some 25 years ago. I was here when that happened, as well as Senator Keating of New York—who was one of the sponsors of the early bills when he was a Member of the other body.

It was said that we could not do that. It would cost too much money and it would cost too much judge power and prosecutor's power and defender's power. Yet, it was a requirement of the Sixth Amendment as construed by the Supreme Court.

Then came the second step. The second step was this: Not only would that be a requirement in the Federal court system, but also in the State courts, even with respect to misdemeanors and juvenile cases. The same cry was raised then. However, the system is working.

The other point is this: Mr. Chairman, since when are we going to say, "Obviously, there is injustice here but we cannot afford to correct that injustice because of the tax on manpower or dollars."

Since when has that been a criterion? It cannot be a criterion because if it were, we would have to yield many of the prerogatives and many of the fundamental rights furnished by the Constitution out of deference to budgetary considerations.

Last, I would note that if we authorize pleas to sentence and deny review in such cases, virtually all of the manpower problems disappear.

I might say that I read with interest the statements of Judge Frankel and Attorney General Bell. My memory goes back to a year or so ago when Judge Tyler, then Deputy Attorney General, came to my home city of Omaha to be a speaker at the "Law Day" ceremonies at Creighton, my alma mater. He chose for a subject the idea of flat-time sentencing as opposed to indeterminate sentencing.

At a later time I inserted the text of his remarks into the Congressional Record to get the idea a little more currency and a little wider dissemination. I believe the approval of people like Judge Bell, Judge Frankel and Judge Tyler should be most helpful.

I am pleased with the bill, Mr. Chairman. I might say in summary that there are provisions with which I would not agree. Yet the democratic process has worked. I find so much that is good in it and so much that is along the right and proper road that I strongly approve of the bill and hope it will pass.

I do believe that the two predecessors of President Carter spoke in favor of a criminal code and the adoption thereof. I do not know whether President Carter has already spoken. But within the bounds of propriety—and we know that the administration does approve of it as Judge Bell indicated—it might be helpful if the President would personally speak on this subject and hopefully in a favorable way.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection your written statement will be inserted in the record at this point.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ROMAN L. HRUSKA

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the kind invitation to appear before the Subcommittee and to express my views on S. 1437.

As you know, I have attempted to be of some assistance in the federal codification effort over the years. I served as a member of the Brown Commission from 1966 through 1971. I was privileged to be a member of this Subcommittee during my service in the Senate and participated in the lengthy and thorough hearings that the Subcommittee held on the various codification proposals. I participated actively in the efforts during the last Congress to achieve a consensus on a codification bill. In short, the codification effort has been a key interest of mine for more than a decade.

S. 1437 is the sixth attempt at a bill that would receive the necessary Congressional support. The first effort was the final report of the Brown Commission issued in 1971 as a working basis for further legislative efforts.

In early 1973 there came the original S. 1, a bill drafted by this Subcommittee. That proposal was followed shortly by S. 1400, a bill drafted by a team of career attorneys in the Department of Justice. Hearings were held on these proposals and strenuous efforts were made to draft a single bill. Early in the 94th Congress that bill was introduced, again carrying the number S. 1.

That proposal, as you know, engendered heated debate. Each provision in it was gone over with a fine tooth comb. In the House a so-called "liberal" alternative, H.R. 12504 was introduced but no hearings were held on its provisions and no action was taken on it in the House.

In the meantime efforts instigated by the Senate leadership to form a compromise proposal were bearing fruit. Representatives of this Subcommittee and representatives of the Department of Justice as well as various interest groups met regularly to develop a position that was acceptable to all. Those efforts continued and the product of these efforts—S. 1437—is before the Subcommittee today.

While earlier efforts at codification were met with extremely hostile reactions, this new effort has received almost uniform praise.

The Washington Post has referred to the bill editorially as ". . . one that deserves to be passed and will be worth all the years of work that went into it."

The New York Times described it as the “. . . product of masterly legislative compromise . . . (I)t merits enactment.” Former Governor Brown, the chairman of the Brown Commission, testified here earlier this month that the bill was “eminently sensible and pragmatic” and represented “a delicate balance between the separate viewpoints of conservatives and liberals.” Attorney General Bell provided his approval by stating that S. 1437 “is as fair and workable a code as has yet been devised” and pledged Administration support before this Subcommittee.

I should note that throughout this process of compromise, the code has retained its essential integrity. The bill before us today has been modified to reflect certain differing views. However, it has not been turned into a hodge podge of internal inconsistencies and conflicts. It is a uniform body of law—a code.

Given the broad level of support that has come forth for the bill it may seem that passage is assured. Yet we know that obstacles to enactment still exist. The subject of criminal law codification always raises sensational issues. Political winds change. Coalitions diffuse. Thus, time is of the essence. You must move promptly on the measure.

I hope that difficult issues will not suffocate the code. I believe that there is no reason why they should. The years of debate and analysis, the volumes of hearings and reports, provide an unusually sound basis on which to make a decision as to the merits of each of these issues. Obviously some of these issues will be the subject of sharp debate on the floor of the Senate. This is as it should be. That this will consume some valuable time is also apparent but S. 1437 is major legislation and the time spent on its passage will be time well spent. The Senate justifiably prides itself on its strength as a deliberative body. Surely it can deliberate the issues involved in a criminal code as well as it can those involved in a tax code or energy legislation.

There may be a temptation in the months ahead to split up the code into more readily consumable parts. I fear that would be a tragic mistake. A code is an integral thing. It is its integrated nature that provides its greatest advantages. Sir Francis Bacon, the Lord Chancellor of England, once proposed to the King that the laws of England be codified. He pointed out what has become so obviously true to those of us who have worked on codification: “The laws of most kingdoms and states have been like buildings of many pieces, and patched up from time to time according to occasions, without frame or model.”

Our laws do not need, nor can they suffer, further patching up. They need a frame or model, a structure that holds the whole of the law together and makes the individual parts more comprehensible. Already significant parts of the code have been set aside for later action. The defenses have been left for the moment to continued judicial construction. The national security offenses, although outmoded in great parts, have been retained word for word from current law. Difficult issues such as the death penalty and gun control have been removed from consideration.

I recognize the necessity of these deferrals but I believe that further deferrals will only weaken the structure of the code until codification itself becomes a patchwork process. The years of thought and effort that have gone into codification would be wasted if such a thing were to come to be. I trust that the Senate and the House will see the necessity of treating the code as one unified item, not a series of separable parts.

Turning from the question of ways of dealing with a code, let me point out to the Subcommittee why I feel a new code is needed and why I believe that this bill is the answer to that need.

It is generally agreed by those familiar with the federal criminal laws that they are seriously in need of revision. Certainly today the nation does not have a federal criminal code in the true sense of the term, but has instead a jumble of piecemeal legislative efforts that have been enacted sporadically over the last two hundred years. While many of the current statutes are very useful, altogether too many are outmoded. Still others are unenforceable, either because of inadequate drafting in the first instance, or court interpretations construing provisions in an unintended fashion. Even those statutes that have utility are, in many respects, overlapping and inconsistent. Moreover, there are serious gaps in the coverage of the federal criminal laws.

Even finding the law is at times a problem. Some areas of law where there appear to be gaps, such as aircraft hijacking and espionage involving atomic weapons, actually are covered in obscure parts of the regulatory provisions of the United States Code. Other provisions are hard to find simply because they do not exist in statutory form; several areas of the law, such as the principle governing the criminal liability of corporations, have been left entirely to development by judges in the course of writing judicial decisions on a case-by-case basis—a process that has made standardization and stabilization almost impossible.

In instances where the penal law does appear in statutory form, widely differing terms are often used to describe a defendant's intent or other state of mind that must be found to coexist with his criminal action.

Finally, the periods of imprisonment and fine levels carried by current offenses seem to bear little relationship to each other and a questionable connection with what would appear to be a fair penalty under all the circumstances; in fact, the whole sentencing process, which today may result in widely disparate sentences for essentially similar conduct, is sadly in need of reform.

S. 1437 makes the law simple and knowable. It takes the volumes of judge-made law and incorporates them into the related sections of the criminal code. The statute itself will be the basic source of law not the dozens, sometimes thousands of interpretive case.

I recall an incident a few years ago where a reporter for a major network who happened to be an attorney solemnly read the section of existing law dealing with misprison of a felony to the television audience. He concluded that, from the face of the statute, it was clear that a public figure had violated the law through inaction. Yet the annotations, if they had been read, made it clear that the courts required some positive action not mere inaction and so his statement was incorrect. I am not faulting the gentleman involved. His error simply points out the problems involved with current law.

S. 1437 introduces literally hundreds of reforms to the specific criminal provisions of federal law. Hundreds of sections are consolidated into a few. Outmoded laws such as those covering offenses against civil rights and sex offenses are revised and modernized. Recent innovations in crime such as pyramid sales schemes are treated in a forthright fashion.

Uniform definitions and common terms are introduced. Sentences are graded according to seriousness of offense rather than the fashion or whim of the enacting Congress. These innovations will save our courts and attorneys countless hours by settling the side issues and letting them concentrate their efforts on the search for truth.

The new sentencing provisions in the code before us give me no pause in stating that the bill continues to have my full support. If a person is convicted of an offense under the code he will be sentenced under a system that provides some hope of fair and uniform punishment. The sentence will be determined according to applicable standards. Persons committing similar offenses and sharing similar basic characteristics will receive similar sentences. If the defendant or the government believes that the sentence ignored this desired uniformity, appellate review of the sentence would be available.

This is the only civilized nation that I am aware of that does not provide for appellate review of the sentence imposed. That step has been a long time in coming but S. 1437 provides an opportunity to achieve it. While my own views on appellate review may be a bit more bullish than those of the members of this Subcommittee, I believe the approach taken in this area represents a worthwhile advancement.

I am pleased with this bill. There are provisions I would disagree with. Yet the democratic process has worked its will on the legislation and I find so much that I strongly approve of that my disagreements are substantially outweighed.

It is now time to move on to the business of enacting S. 1437. While the Administration is on record in support of the measure, I urge the leadership of this Subcommittee to call upon President Carter to lend his personal support and efforts to the early adoption of the measure. Fainthearted attempts will not suffice. We need a code and we need it now. Bold action is in order.

Senator KENNEDY. Your expression about some reservations with the legislation is echoed. I expect, by just about every member of this committee. I suppose if any of us were completely satisfied with it, we would find members who were completely dissatisfied with it.

I want to thank you very much. I think your support for this approach will be very helpful. I think it will be helpful to members of this committee because they know how much time and effort you have spent in this area of public policy. Having your support for this approach will, I think, be extremely important to the members of both this committee and the Senate.

Mr. HRUSKA. Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman. I hope that progress will be made. Time is of the essence. Times change and views change and personalities change. The time is ripe for action. I do hope within a short period of time the full committee can act and get the bill on the floor where consideration will be given at an early date.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much.

Our next witness is Ronald Gainer, who is the Acting Assistant Attorney General for Improvement in Criminal Justice, in the Department of Justice.

He has worked closely with this committee and with me on a number of different issues.

We are delighted to have you with us here this morning. We look forward to your testimony.

STATEMENT OF RONALD L. GAINER, ACTING DEPUTY ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IMPROVEMENTS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE; ACCOMPANIED BY KAREN SKRIVSETH, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. GAINER. Mr. Chairman, as you know, the Attorney General has spoken on behalf of the Department as to the need for a new Federal criminal code generally. I have been asked to address some remarks this morning to the sentencing provisions, in particular, in current law and in the proposed new code.

I have a prepared statement on the subject. It is close to 50 pages in length, and in the interest of time and in the interest of our common sanity, I would like simply to paraphrase some of the thoughts that are contained therein.

Senator KENNEDY. We will include it in its entirety as if read.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF RONALD L. GAINER, ACTING DEPUTY ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, OFFICE FOR IMPROVEMENTS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mr. Chairman: The surprising thing about the current federal system of sentencing criminal offenders is that it often wends its way to generally satisfactory results in individual cases. As a system, though, it is an anachronism. Its successes represent sporadic triumphs over legislative neglect.

I. The current law in general

The sentencing process lies at the chronological culmination of an elaborately structured series of processes designed to assure a scrupulously fair determination of a defendant's guilt or innocence. It should represent the apex of rationality and fairness—fairness to the defendant and to the public alike. It does not.

The sentencing of criminal offenders is left to the discretion of federal judges—persons who are well trained in the nuances of arcane torts and the rule against perpetuities but who have no more formal training than the rest of us in divining societal values and in understanding the various grounds for the occurrence and persistence of criminal conduct. Some judges feel comfortable in the assigned role. Others find the lack of legislative guidance to be frustrating; as Judge Learned Hand once noted "Here I am an old man in a long nightgown making muffled noises at people who may be no worse than I am," thereby sealing their fate for years to come. The judges are free to follow any philosophical rationale they find appropriate in imposing a sentence, and are not required to divulge to anyone the reasons that prompted the selection of a particular sentence in an individual case.

The only real legislative guidance as to an appropriate penalty is provided by the maximum sentence specified for the particular offense involved, but under current federal law similar offenses may carry widely differing maximum penalties, less serious offenses may carry penalties which are longer than those of more serious offenses, and one federal offense of relatively moderate seriousness carries no upper limit at all on the penalty that may be assessed. Other than the stated maximum penalties, about the only congressional guidance afforded sentencing judges are the helpful admonitions at the beginning of Chapter 227 that a judge should not impose a sentence that would "work corruption of blood" or a sentence that would require the defendant to stand in the local pillory.

The current statutes do, however, recognize the sentencing alternatives of probation, fines, and imprisonment. Yet, although probation is permitted, it is considered a suspension of the imposition or execution of a sentence rather than a sentence itself, and partly for that reason has not been commonly employed on a conditional basis to induce a defendant to engage in such remedial measures as paying reparation to his victims or working in community service. The prescribed fine levels are abysmally low, often frustrating federal judges seeking an effective sanction against white collar offenders; the limited fine levels that may be assessed against a defendant corporation are so low as frequently to constitute little more than the entity's annual expenditure for paper clips. Even when fines are imposed, the existing law provides no effective means of insuring that they can be collected. The imprisonment provisions reflect the philosophy of past decades that criminality is a disease that can be cured through incarceration and that once an offender has been found by parole authorities to be cured he should immediately be released notwithstanding the fact that there may be considerable time remaining on the sentence imposed by the judge and notwithstanding the fact that the judge may actually have had in mind a quite different purpose for the sentence. Within the last few years, however, it has been generally concluded that we do not know how to induce rehabilitation or to recognize it when it occurs. Consequently, the federal Parole Commission now, rather than looking for signs of rehabilitation, releases an offender on the basis of mechanically-applied criteria developed from the same factors that were available to the judge at the time he decided to incarcerate the offender—the whole reason for a variable or indeterminate sentence has virtually disappeared.

As might be assumed, sentences imposed under such conditions vary considerably, with offenders in similar circumstances receiving inexplicably disparate sentences. Such sentences would seem to be prime candidates for review by appellate courts, but no appeal is permitted. While the most tenuous suggestion of technical irregularity in pretrial or trial procedure may be brought by counsel to the attention of an appellate court, the most climactic event in the whole criminal justice process—the sentence—may not be. Even if review were permitted in the current system, it probably would be of dubious value since it is difficult to make an intelligent and useful assessment of the propriety of a lawful exercise of unfettered discretion.

Finally, the sentencing provisions of current law take no cognizance of the need for reparation to the victim. The existing federal criminal title, for example, provides no means of compensating a person who may have been maimed for life by a federal criminal offense; anomalously, however, it does provide redress in one instance—any fine imposed for the offense of seducing a female steamship passenger is directed by 18 U.S.C. 3614 to "be paid for the use of the female seduced."

Such a recitation reads like an outline for a Gilbert and Sullivan production. But it plays like a tragedy. The situation leaves victims frustrated, leaves convicted offenders preoccupied with what they perceive to be gross unfairness, and leaves the public jaded about the efficacy of the whole criminal justice process. It thereby bears a principal responsibility for the stifling of whatever potential deterrence the system might otherwise be capable of producing.

II. The unwarranted disparities in sentencing under current law

The lack of logic in the current federal sentencing system could largely be forgiven if, by happenstance or by extraordinarily careful administrative guidance, it produced results perceived as generally equitable. It fails, however, to achieve such results. Although the average sentences of incarcerated offenders, at least when the calculations reflect the time actually served, may appear to strike a generally reasonable balance, it is apparent that many of the extreme differences between sentences cannot fairly be justified on the basis of differences between offenses or offenders. A balance obtained by the averaging of extremes is no real balance at all.

The legal invitations to disparity under the existing system have already been suggested. Chief among the problems are the following. First, because the federal criminal laws have been enacted on a piecemeal basis rather than as a comprehensive criminal code, persons who commit substantially similar offenses today may be subject to substantially different penalties depending upon the particular statutes under which they are prosecuted. Second, even when defendants are convicted under the same statute, they may be subject to sentences under differing and overlapping sentencing statutes. Third, the current statutes contain no clearly articulated sentencing philosophy to guide sentencing judges in the choice among the sentences that may be available. Fourth, even when a sentence of imprisonment is imposed, the existing statutes have mandated a substantial amount of uncertainty as to the actual length of the imposed sentences. The interrelationship of the above factors has caused considerable confusion and disparity. Although the federal Parole Commission has stepped into the void and has attempted to reduce the extremes of disparity, its efforts cannot help substantially with the problem—nor can the collective efforts that have been made in the past by the federal judges.

A. THE PENALTY LEVELS IN THE PENAL OFFENSES

Current law contains numerous examples of inconsistent grading of criminal offenses. In many such instances, there are material variations in the maximum penalties applicable under different statutes to essentially similar criminal conduct; in other instances, there are little or no variations in the maximum penalties applicable to offenses that may be similar in kind but materially different in gravity. Frequently, the punishment prescribed by a penal statute appears to depend more upon the nature of the federal jurisdictional interest involved than upon the nature of the underlying criminal conduct.

A few examples will suffice. The penalty for embezzlement of more than $100 may vary from a maximum of 2 years' imprisonment to a maximum of 10 years' imprisonment even if the only difference between the offenses is the identity of the entity from which the money is embezzled. See 18 U.S.C. 641, 656, and 665(a). The penalty for lying to the Department of Housing and Urban Development for the purpose of obtaining a mortgage loan is 3 years' imprisonment if the prosecution is brought under one statute and 5 years' imprisonment if the prosecution is brought under another. See 18 U.S.C. 1001 and 1010. The penalty for robbery of a bank is 20 years, for robbery on a federal enclave is 15 years, and for robbery of government property is either 15 or 10 years depending upon the statute under which the charge is brought. See 18 U.S.C. 2111 through 2114. The penalty for an attempt to commit murder on federal land is 20 years under one statute and 3 years under another. See 18 U.S.C. 113 and 1113.

The maximum fine levels carried by the penal offenses vary as greatly and as inexplicably as the maximum terms of imprisonment. The principal difference is that almost all the maximum fine levels are much too low to be considered a realistic monetary approximation of the gravity of the offense.

B. THE VARYING SENTENCING STATUTES

Once a defendant has been convicted of an offense under federal law, the sentencing judge is faced with a variety of statutory options. Under current federal law, even in the most simple criminal case the sentencing judge is presented with at least five alternative kinds of sentences, with no statutory guidance as to the manner in which an appropriate selection should be made among them. An ordinary adult offender may be sentenced to a term of probation, to pay a fine, to a term of imprisonment with immediate eligibility for parole, to a term of imprisonment with eligibility for parole after serving such period of time as is specified by the sentencing judge within the first one-third of the term of imprisonment, or to a term of imprisonment with eligibility for parole by operation of law after serving one-third of the term imposed. 18 U.S.C. 4205(a), (b) (1), and (b) (2).

If a convicted defendant is a drug addict or is under 26 years of age, the sentencing options become even more complex. If the judge reaches the conclusion that the defendant is an addict and is "likely to be rehabilitated through treatment," the defendant may be committed for an indeterminate period of time of up to 10 years' duration, as long as the sentence imposed does not exceed the maximum that otherwise would be permitted for the offense. On the other hand, if the judge believes that the defendant is a drug user but not an addict, or is an addict who is not likely to be rehabilitated through treatment, another statute must be used in imposing sentence. Any person who is sentenced under these statutes automatically becomes eligible for parole after the first 6 months of his incarceration. 18 U.S.C. 4253 and 4254.

If a convicted defendant is under 26 years of age at the time of his conviction, the Federal Youth Corrections Act provides still additional sentencing options. If the defendant is under 22 years of age at the time of his conviction, the sentencing judge is required to consider sentencing him under the Youth Corrections Act, but may still sentence him as an adult if he believes "that the youth offender will not derive benefit from treatment" under the Youth Corrections Act. 18 U.S.C. 5010(d); see Dorszynski v. United States, 418 U.S. 437 at 441 (1974). If the defendant, at the time of his conviction, is between the ages of 22 and 26, he may be considered a "young adult offender." As to such an offender, the sentencing judge need not consider imposing sentence under the Youth Corrections Act, although he may do so if he "finds that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the defendant will benefit from the treatment provided under the Federal Youth Corrections Act." 18 U.S.C. 4216.

If the sentencing judge in his discretion decides to sentence a young defendant—either one under 22 years of age or one between the ages of 22 and 26—pursuant to the provisions of the Youth Corrections Act, he still has three sentencing options under that Act. He may sentence the defendant to probation; he may sentence him to an indeterminate sentence of 6 years' duration, with immediate eligibility for parole and with no more than 4 of the 6 years to be spent in prison; or, if the judge finds that the defendant "may not be able to derive maximum benefit from treatment by the (Parole) Commission prior to the expiration of 6 years," he may sentence him to any period of incarceration as long as it does not exceed the maximum otherwise authorized for the offense. 18 U.S.C. 5010 and 5017.

C. THE LACK OF STATUTORY GUIDANCE TO SENTENCING JUDGES

The current federal statutes provide no specific guidance to sentencing judges as to the purposes sought to be achieved by the sentencing process. For the most part, no sentencing philosophy is outlined, and no direction is afforded as to the factors pertaining to the offense and the offender that warrant consideration in the imposition of an appropriate penalty. No instruction is set forth to govern the selection of the type of penalty to be imposed or of the severity of the penalty selected.

Because there exist no legislative standards—or, for that matter, judicial standards—governing the proper imposition of sentences in particular kinds of cases, judicially imposed sentences vary considerably.

Sentences vary according to the sentencing statute employed by the judge, despite similarities in the characteristics of the offense and of the offender. For example, the sentences imposed on male bank robbers who were discharged from the Bureau of Prisons in 1974 and 1975 ranged from 72 months under the indeterminate sentencing provision of the Youth Corrections Act in 18 U.S.C. 5010(b)—the maximum sentence available under that statute—to 141 months under the ordinary sentencing statutes when the judge specified a maximum sentence but did not specify a date of parole eligibility. Offenders who were sentenced under the Youth Corrections Act to a specified term under the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 5010(c) were also sentenced to an average of 141 months. In between those terms were the indeterminate sentences imposed under the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act (105 months), the sentences imposed on ordinary offenders under 18 U.S.C. 4208(a)(1) with early parole eligibility specified by the judge (119 months), and the sentences imposed on ordinary offenders with immediate eligibility for parole specified by the judge under 18 U.S.C. 4208(a)(2) (139 months).

Sentences imposed upon defendants who are similarly situated also appear to vary substantially from case to case and from district to district. For example, Bureau of Prisons reports for 1974 and 1975 show that approximately two-thirds of a group of 17 male bank robbers with similar backgrounds in terms of age, education, marital status, employment record, and criminal history, were sentenced to prison for terms varying from 75 to 195 months. The remainder of these offenders received sentences either above or below this range. Nationally, the average sentence imposed for bank robbery was 130, but in nine judicial districts the average sentence was less than 85 months, and in eight judicial districts the average was over 200 months.

Some recent studies have suggested that sentencing philosophy varies from one federal court to another, although this is a difficult matter to ascertain with any certainty since there exists no requirement that judges specify reasons for their sentences and judges in fact rarely do so. While federal sentences usually exhibit a direct correlation between the type and length of a sentence on the one hand and the offense and criminal history of the offender on the other hand, a number of other factors may be construed as playing a role in determining the sentence imposed even though those factors may not appear pertinent in many cases. Among the factors that seem to be related to sentence length for particular offenses in particular districts are the age, sex, and race of the defendant; whether the defendant had pleaded guilty or had proceeded to trial, and whether the defendant was tried before a jury or before a judge sitting without a jury. Although there may be valid reasons for such relationships under certain circumstances, and although the samples may suggest more differences than actually exist, the lack of sentencing standards makes any perceived unfairness harder to dismiss.

In addition to sentences for similar offenders varying without clear reason, sentences for dissimilar offenders appear to vary less than logic would suggest. One anomaly under current law is that, contrary to what one would expect, there is not always a high correlation between the sentence imposed for a particular offense and the incarceration history of the defendant. For example, Bureau of Prisons statistics indicate that among the prisoners confined in federal institutions in 1975 on assault convictions, those with three or more prior commitments to prison were serving an average sentence of 97.7 months while those with only two prior commitments were serving an average sentence of 103.4 months. Similarly, for the offense of fraud, defendants sentenced to prison for the first time actually received longer terms of confinement than did defendants who had previously been committed; in 1975, of federal prisoners serving sentences to imprisonment for fraud, those who had not previously been committed to prison were serving average terms of 52.8 months, while those with one, two, or even three or more prior commitments were all serving average terms of at least 4 months less than offenders who were committed for the first time.

D. THE UNCERTAINTY REMAINING IN IMPOSED SENTENCES TO IMPRISONMENT

Disparity does not end, of course, with the imposition of sentences. Defendants sentenced to identical terms of imprisonment may find themselves released from confinement after serving differing proportions of their imposed terms. As to each prisoner sentenced to a term of imprisonment in excess of 1 year, two methods are employed simultaneously to determine his potential release date even though only one of the two methods will actually determine his time of release. The Bureau of Prisons determines the potential release date according to the term of imprisonment imposed by the judge less any accumulated "good time" afforded for complying with prison rules, for participation in industrial programs, or for exceptional institutional service. 18 U.S.C. 4161 through 4163. At the same time, the Parole Commission must determine whether a prisoner who is eligible for parole should be released on parole and, if so, the date upon which his parole should begin. 18 U.S.C. 4206. The availability of "work-release" programs, which free a prisoner from confinement without affecting his formal release date, complicates the matter still further. 18 U.S.C. 4082(c).

Although the original purpose of the indeterminate sentence subject to review by parole authorities was to provide for a prisoner's release when it was found through review of his prison conduct that he had become rehabilitated, the Parole Commission today does not predicate its release determination upon a prisoner's institutional conduct but rather has adopted a mechanistic approach to release determinations based upon offender and offense characteristics known at the time of sentencing. The Parole Commission's self-developed guidelines for prisoner release are followed in approximately 85 percent of parole determinations, thereby introducing more certainty into the computation of an eligible prisoner's expected release date than previously had existed.

E. THE INTERRELATIONSHIP OF THE ABOVE FACTORS

The interrelationship between the operation of the maximum penalty provisions of the penal statutes, the sentencing statutes, the statutory provisions concerning parole eligibility and "good time," and the parole guidelines, compounds the uncertainties in the existing law. This may be illustrated by the example of three 23-year-old defendants with identical backgrounds who are convicted of armed bank robbery in which a weapon is not fired and no one is injured. To begin with, each defendant faces a statutory maximum sentence of 20 years in prison, a $5,000 fine, or both imprisonment and a fine. However, if the first defendant is sentenced under the ordinary sentencing statutes to 15 years in prison with no specification by the judge as to early parole eligibility, the second is sentenced under the indeterminate sentencing provisions of the Youth Corrections Act (which permit incarceration for no more than 4 years), and the third is sentenced under the Youth Corrections Act to 15 years in prison, they will serve different lengths of time in confinement even though there is no difference in their cases other than the statute under which they are sentenced. The defendant sentenced under the ordinary sentencing provisions would be released on parole at the time of his statutory eligibility for parole—after serving 5 years in prison (if he had been eligible for parole at an earlier time he might be released under the current parole guidelines in 36 to 48 months). Under the parole guidelines for persons sentenced under the Youth Corrections Act, both defendants sentenced under that Act will be paroled after serving between 27 and 34 months in prison. Thus, the defendant sentenced under the more common sentencing provisions will serve between 26 and 33 months more time in prison because the length of the sentence imposed precluded his eligibility for parole at the time recommended in the current guidelines. Even if the judge in his case had imposed a lower sentence or had specified an earlier parole eligibility, the defendant sentenced under the usual provisions would still have to spend 10 to 15 months longer in prison than his contemporaries sentenced under the Youth Corrections Act.

F. THE ATTEMPT TO REDUCE DISPARITY THROUGH THE PAROLE COMMISSION GUIDELINES

The Parole Commission, in a role somewhat altered from the original design, has over the past few years undertaken to moderate the effects of disparate sentences to the extent that it has the power to do so. It has succeeded, through its guidelines, in bringing a measure of uniformity and predictability to the final part of the penal and correctional process. But while the Commission's guidelines represent a remedial attempt to bring about equal treatment for prisoners who are similarly situated, it is apparent that this is an inadequate mechanism for eliminating all unwarranted disparities. First, the Commission obviously can do nothing about the inadequacy of a judicially imposed sentence to probation when a sentence to a term of imprisonment might be more appropriate under all the circumstances. Second, the Commission cannot correct the inconsistencies in judges' selections among alternative sentencing statutes. Third, the Commission can do nothing about a sentence that is so long that a prisoner is not eligible for parole at the time recommended in the guidelines. Fourth, the Commission cannot extend a prison sentence that is shorter than the period that would be appropriate for the prisoner under the Commission's guidelines. Thus, all that the Parole Commission can do to alleviate sentencing disparity is to apply its guidelines to the approximately 50 percent of the defendants sentenced to imprisonment who are eligible for parole at the time recommended in the guidelines; it cannot affect the sentences of the other 50 percent of the defendants sentenced to incarceration, and cannot, of course, reach those defendants whose sentences do not include a prison term.

The Parole Commission has undertaken a progressive and unique step to meet some of the existing sentencing problems. It deserves credit for its effort, but its impact is limited.

6. THE ATTEMPT TO REDUCE DISPARITY THROUGH JUDICIAL INITIATIVES

The judicial branch of the federal government has undertaken a number of efforts designed to alleviate sentencing disparity.

The circuit courts have undertaken, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 344, to hold sentencing institutes for the purpose of bringing together judges, prosecutors, and penal and correctional specialists for discussions of sentencing problems and training on sentencing issues. Although the sentencing institutes have served a useful educational purpose, they cannot be said to have achieved much more than an enhanced awareness of available sentencing options and of some of the problems in current sentencing law.

Some district courts have experimented with three-judge sentencing councils, consisting of the sentencing judge in a particular case and two colleagues. Each of the judges receives a copy of the presentence report in the case, and the judges then meet to exchange recommendations concerning an appropriate sentence. Such councils may be helpful to the sentencing judge, but they cannot achieve the goal of eliminating unwarranted sentencing disparity for a number of reasons. First, the panels are merely advisory, and the sentencing judge may impose a sentence quite different from the sentence recommended by his colleagues without stating his reasons for doing so. Second, the panels operate on a case-by-case basis within a single district, and do not have the benefit of detailed judicial points of view reflecting nation-wide or even circuit-wide practices. Third, the panels necessarily operate within the existing statutory law, which itself fosters a great deal of the current disparity. An additional problem with the use of such councils, not related to the problem of disparity, is that they require the time of three judge to make a single sentencing decision.

In sum, the efforts of the judiciary, too, have proved largely unavailing because of the nature and magnitude of the underlying problems.

III. The sentencing reform proposal in S. 1437

It is clear that a major reform of federal sentencing law is required.

A dramatic proposal for reform of the entire sentencing process is now pending before this Subcommittee in S. 1437, the bill to revise the entire Federal Criminal Code. While the Subcommittee has under consideration a number of other bills that would restructure the sentencing process, only the one appearing in S. 1437 is sufficiently comprehensive to permit the degree of sentencing reform that is needed. Since the disparity in the existing system arises from a variety of causes, only a proposal that undertakes to deal with all of those causes holds real promise. Sentencing proposals addressing only the problem caused by unstructured judicial discretion cannot effectively reach the disparity arising from the inconsistent grading of offenses, the failure of the statutes to define the purposes of sentencing, and the welter of sentencing and prison release provisions.

The Administration strongly supports S. 1437's sweeping reforms of current sentencing law in the context of the revision of the Federal Criminal Code. By addressing all aspects of the law affecting criminal sentences, S. 1437 will introduce a rationality and fairness that has not previously appeared in the federal system. It is, moreover, highly practical in its approach.

A. THE GRADING OF OFFENSES

The new Code contained in S. 1437 completely restructures and rewrites the current federal penal laws to make them more understandable, to clarify their interrelationships, and to grade them consistently with their relative seriousness. It draws logical penalty distinctions where none have existed before and introduces lesser-included offenses where felonies have previously stood alone. For example, the penalty for the offense of theft is made to vary with the kind and value of the property stolen; large-scale thefts and frauds carry penalties significantly higher than those in current law, theft of items of little value are reduced to a misdemeanor level, and a youth's temporarily taking a motor vehicle without authority and then abandoning it is reduced from the current five-year penalty to a maximum of six months' confinement. The Code also introduces uniform culpability standards, thereby permitting the grading of offenses, when appropriate, according to the state of mind with which the defendant committed the offense. Moreover, the Code also introduces uniform culpability standards, thereby permitting the grading of offenses, when appropriate, according to the state of mind with which the defendant committed the offense. Moreover, the Code provides a convenient, shorthand method of referring to the penalties and other sentencing considerations that are pertinent to the offense by using common grading categories—five grades of felonies, three grades of misdemeanors, and one grade of infraction. In a separate subsection of each offense the appropriate grade for the offense is set forth. In doing so, care is taken to grade the offense according to the underlying criminal misconduct rather than the federal jurisdictional interest involved. Moreover, if the seriousness of the offense varies according to specific circumstances, the grading subsection specifies the circumstances in which a different grade applies to the offense. This approach facilitates the establishment of a penalty structure assuring consistent penalties for conduct of a similar nature or similar degree of seriousness.

B. THE PURPOSES OF SENTENCING

The new Code sets forth for the first time the four generally recognized purposes of sentencing—deterrence, protection of the public, assurance of just punishment, and rehabilitation. They appear at the beginning of the Code in Section 101, and are set forth again at the beginning of the sentencing provisions in Section 2001. The Code does not direct the setting of priorities among those purposes, recognizing that for a particular offense committed by a particular offender, one of the purposes or a combination of purposes may be of overriding importance. The Code recognizes in the provisions governing the imposition of sentences to probation, fines, and imprisonment that not all the specified purposes would be appropriate or even relevant in individual cases. For example, a young first offender who commits a nonviolent offense might appropriately be sentenced to probation primarily or solely for rehabilitative purposes; a repeat violent offender might be sentenced to imprisonment primarily for incapacitative purposes; and a perpetrator of a large-scale fraud might be sentenced to imprisonment primarily for deterrent purposes. Other purposes suggesting other penalties either may be inapposite in such cases, or may be of such reduced importance as to be dismissed in the course of seeking to achieve the principal goal.

C. THE PROBATION PROVISIONS

The new Code makes a number of useful changes in the probation laws.

First, a sentence to probation is specified as a sentence in itself, and not simply the suspension of the imposition or execution of a sentence to imprisonment. In combination with other provisions, this should help to encourage the use of more innovative requirements that a defendant should be expected to fulfill as a condition of his probation.

Second, the Code sets forth an extensive list of possible conditions of probation that might be appropriate in particular cases. Under Section 2103(a), it is a mandatory condition of probation that the defendant not commit another crime during the term of his probation. This is the only mandatory condition. Section 2103(b) permits the sentencing judge to exercise his discretion whether to impose one or more of the 18 suggested conditions that might be suitable in particular situations, or whether to impose other conditions that he might wish to tailor to the offender or the offense. The simple listing of such provisions on the face of the statute should help assure that courts will give more cognizance to the possibility of predicating release upon compliance with conditions appropriate to the case. In addition to such discretionary conditions as the payment of a fine imposed as a part of the sentence and the making of direct restitution to a victim of the offense, the section includes a condition that the defendant engage in some form of community service—a condition that might more effectively serve the underlying purposes of a sentencing in particular cases than the more traditional criminal sentences.

Third, Section 2101 specifies different maximum terms of probation for different offense severity levels. Under current law the maximum term of probation is any period up to five years, without regard to the seriousness of the offense. Under the Code, the maximum probation terms would be five years for a felony, two years for a misdemeanor, and one year for an infraction.

D. THE FINE PROVISIONS

Chapter 22 of the Code sets forth the maximum fines applicable to each grade of offense. The specified fine levels are substantially higher than those appearing in current law which, for most offenses, are now so low as to be meaningless, particularly as they apply to corporate violators. For too long fines have been at such low levels that they tend to be considered by white collar offenders simply as minor, potential costs of doing business.

Under Section 2201(b) of the Code, an individual defendant is, for a felony, subject to a maximum fine of up to $100,000; for a misdemeanor, a maximum fine of up to $10,000; and for an infraction, a maximum fine of up to $1,000. The fines for organizations are even higher: for a felony, up to $500,000; for a misdemeanor, up to $100,000; and for an infraction, up to $10,000. In addition, the Code permits an alternative fine of double the pecuniary gain which accrued to the defendant or double the loss caused to the victim, whatever is greater—a provision that could be a particularly useful sanction against white collar offenders who conduct fraudulent businesses. It should be noted that as to all the fine levels under the Code, however, the imposition of a fine is specifically conditioned upon a defendant's ability to pay, thereby assuring that an individual or an organization with a few assets will not be fined an absurdly high amount.

Subchapter B of Chapter 38 of the Code, relating to the implementation of the fine provisions, introduces a change in the law of similar importance. It incorporates a series of provisions permitting recourse to the Internal Revenue Service statutes so as to allow the levying of a lien upon a defendant's property if he has attempted to circumvent a court's order to pay a fine as directed. Under current law, criminal fines are collected from contumacious defendants primarily by executing judgment against real or personal property, or by the often cumbersome method of garnisheeing wages. The effectiveness of a garnishment varies from state to state since state law controls the manner in which the procedure operates in the federal district involved. The Code's introduction of a procedure akin to a tax lien should substantially improve the ability of the government to collect unpaid criminal fines, and, by providing a uniform set of procedures, should simplify the collection process. The result should be a more effective penalty and a substantial increase in revenues.

E. THE IMPRISONMENT PROVISIONS

The terms of imprisonment permitted by the Code are generally somewhat reduced from those in current law, with the major changes applying to the Code's counterparts to those existing statutes that carry penalties substantially higher or substantially lower than most similar offenses. The sentencing judge, however, is enabled for the first time to specify in appropriate cases that the sentence imposed shall not be subject to parole except for a stated period at the end of the imposed term—as short a period as the last ten percent of the term. This provision is included in recognition of the fact that sentences for punitive or deterrent purposes afford no basis at all for an indeterminate sentence, and that there is no legitimate reason for continuing the existing requirement that, if a judge wishes to assure, for example, that a white collar defendant will spend one year in prison for purposes of deterrence, he must go through the disingenuous process of imposing an illusory three-year term with parole after service of the first one-third. This change alone will help to make the sentencing system more forthright.

The complicated, special sentencing provisions of current law that are designed for particularly dangerous offenders, youth offenders, and narcotics offenders, are eliminated as unnecessary. Mandatory sentences to imprisonment are permitted for only two offenses—trafficking in heroin and using a weapon in the course of a federal crime; in those instances, the mandatory penalty is a moderate two-year term, and a judge is not required to impose the mandatory penalty if the defendant was less than eighteen, was of impaired mental capacity, was under unusual and substantial duress, or was only a minor accomplice in an offense committed primarily by another person. Finally, provisions are added to the law to make it clear that penalties for individual offenses cannot be strung together so as to create a total sentence that is unreasonably long; the maximum limit is roughly double the penalty for the most serious offense committed.

F. THE COLLATERAL PENALTY PROVISIONS

A variety of specific changes are introduced by the Code to augment the penalties traditionally applicable.

Under Section 2005 of the Code, a court is empowered, in addition to imposing any other sentence, to require that an individual defendant who has been found guilty of an offense involving fraud or other deceptive practice, or an organization that has been found guilty of any offense, provide notice and an explanation of the conviction to the class of persons or the sector of the public affected by the conviction or financially interested in the subject matter of the offense. The provision is designed to inform the public of "white collar" offenses that may affect their financial interests, in order to facilitate civil actions for recoveries of losses.

In Section 2006 of the Code the court is empowered to impose, in addition to any other sentence, a requirement that a defendant found guilty of an offense causing bodily injury, property damage, or other loss, make direct restitution to the victim of the offense. Today restitution is an under-utilized remedy. Although it may be required as a condition of probation, there is no statutory encouragement to its use and, in any event, if imprisonment is otherwise appropriate for the defendant there is no means by which an additional requirement of restitution may effectively be enforced. This provision of the Code should prove to be of particular utility in cases where a defendant can well afford to pay, immediately or in installments, for the damage he has inflicted.

The Code also contains two new provisions which, although not sentencing provisions, bear mention in a discussion of the Code's sentencing consequences.

First, Subchapter A of Chapter 41, in addition to carrying forward the provisions of current law permitting an individual in a civil action to obtain redress from a racketeering offender or an eavesdropping offender, includes a provision that will permit a civil action against an offender who has been convicted of a crime invoking fraud. A person who has been financially injured as a result of the fraud is permitted to bring a civil action in a federal court to recover three times the damages sustained plus a reasonable attorney's fee and other litigation costs.

Second, Subchapter B of Chapter 41 creates a victim compensation system to provide recompense for personal injury or death to victims or their survivors, of violent federal crimes. This provision demonstrates the recognition that the criminal justice system for too long has concentrated solely on the investigation and prosecution of criminal offenses, paying little attention to the plight of the individual victims of those offenses. In effect, the system has tended to consider crimes as affronts to society as a whole and has left the individual victims to bear by themselves the real costs of those affronts. The new subchapter will not only relieve the hardship of the victims; it will provide a means of ensuring that, to the extent practicable, the criminal offenders ultimately will be liable for costs incurred by the compensation program.

G. THE GUIDELINE SENTENCING SYSTEM

Although the new provisions noted above are important, they are overshadowed by the structural and procedural changes in the sentencing process. Those changes are designed to achieve a rationality, uniformity, and fairness that simply has not existed before.

The Code creates a Sentencing Commission within the judicial branch of the federal government for the purpose of establishing sentencing guidelines to govern the imposition of sentences for all federal offenses. In drafting the guidelines, the Commission is directed to take into consideration factors relating to the purposes of sentencing, the characteristics of offenders, and the aggravating and mitigating circumstances under which specific offenses may be committed. For each federal offense, the guidelines will be expected to specify a variety of appropriate sentencing ranges, depending upon the particular history and characteristics of the defendant in the case and the particular circumstances under which the offense is committed. The judge will be expected to sentence a defendant within the range specified in the guideline covering the specific situation in the case before him, although, if he considers the guideline range inappropriate because of factors not adequately taken into consideration by the Sentencing Commission, he is free to sentence the defendant above or below the guideline range as long as he explains his reasons for doing so. If an offender is sentenced above the range specified in the guidelines he may obtain a review of his sentence by the federal court of appeals for the circuit; if he is sentenced below the range specified in the guidelines the government, with the Attorney General's concurrence, may obtain a review of the sentence.

The guideline sentencing system is designed to promote general uniformity and fairness while retaining necessary flexibility. It is as dramatic and innovative a series of provisions as appear anywhere in the new Code.

1. The sentencing commission

The Code will establish in the judicial branch of the federal government an independent United States Sentencing Commission with responsibility for developing and issuing guidance to federal judges with regard to appropriate sentences for convicted defendants. The Commission members will be designated by the Judicial Conference of the United States for six-year terms. The Code is silent as to the makeup of the Commission's membership, leaving its composition to the Judicial Conference. It is expected that, as is the case with the advisory committees on federal rules that have been appointed by the Judicial Conference, it probably will be found appropriate to include members who are not judges. In any event, under the Code the Commission will be accorded a staff composed of experts in various fields relating to sentencing, probation, penal, and correctional matters, and the Commission will be able also to draw upon the knowledge and experience of persons outside the Commission.

It seems appropriate, since the sentencing function that the Commission will be guiding is historically a judicial function, to repose ultimate responsibility for the guidelines in the judicial branch. If guidelines were to be promulgated by an agency outside the judicial branch, it might be viewed as an encroachment on a judicial function and engender a circumspection on the part of sentencing judges that could impede the effective operation of the guidelines.

The Commission will be a permanent agency, reflecting recognition that the guidance it develops and publishes is guidance based upon an expanding area of knowledge, and that to presume that the Commission's initial efforts could not be improved upon would be an unfortunate impediment to the goal of producing a Federal Criminal Code that can readily adapt to future advances in knowledge. Permanence will enable the Sentencing Commission to conduct a continuing review of the operation of the sentencing guidelines, permitting necessary refinements as more is learned about the effectiveness of different sentencing practices and as case law is developed regarding the operation of the guidelines.

2. The sentencing guidelines

The principal function of the Sentencing Commission is to promulgate guidelines and policy statements for use by federal judges in imposing sentences in individual cases. The guidelines will span a sufficiently broad reach of offender and offense characteristics that they will obviate the existing variety of narrow statutes designed to take into account particular factors, such as age or drug addiction, that might be relevant to determining an appropriate sentence in a particular case. The policy statements, as noted by the Code, will provide direction concerning the proper application of the guidelines and provide standard policies on sentencing issues not covered by the guidelines. The policy statements might be used, for example, to list aggravating and mitigating factors that might not occur sufficiently frequently to warrant incorporation in the sentencing guidelines but that might appropriately affect the type and quality of particular sentences; they might indicate offense or offender characteristics that should not affect the sentence; they might afford guidance as to the use of the authorized orders of notice to victims or of restitution under Sections 2005 and 2006; and they might suggest standards for the imposition of consecutive rather than concurrent sentences to incarceration. In addition, the Code specifically provides that the policy statements of the Commission are to guide the Bureau of Prisons in determining an appropriate prison facility for an offender and in determining the appropriateness of work release programs in individual cases.

In promulgating the guidelines, the Sentencing Commission is required to take into account the stated purposes of sentencing and the grades of individual offenses. In establishing sentencing categories for offenders and offenses for purposes of guideline application, the Commission will be expected to consider such offender and offense characteristics as are suggested by the Congress in the proposed 28 U.S.C. 994. It should be noted that the Commission may, in addition, consider any unlisted factors that it determines to be pertinent, and that the Commission may well conclude that certain listed factors may be inappropriate or irrelevant in establishing guideline categories for certain sentencing purposes.

It may be expected that the initial sentencing guidelines will bear some similarities to the existing parole guidelines, but that the considerations on which they are based will differ appreciably from the considerations underlying the latter guidelines. For one thing, the current parole guidelines are designed in large measure to perpetuate its past policy decisions without the occurrence of disparity. The Sentencing Commission, however, is faced with a much broader task—de novo consideration of appropriate sentences for particular purposes—a task that has never previously been undertaken. Moreover, the parole guidelines are formulated on the basis of empirical data concerning the relationship between factors pertaining to the defendant and his offense and factors pertaining to the probability that a person with those characteristics will violate parole within a two-year period after release. The sentencing guidelines, on the other hand, will not be predicated primarily upon considerations relating to the possible future criminality of the defendant. Rather, they will be based on considerations relating to the four purposes of sentencing cited in Section 101 of the Code, and on identifiable offense and offender characteristics determined to be pertinent to those purposes.

In one area, the bill will provide legislative guidance as to the type and length of sentence that would be appropriate under the guidelines. Proposed 28 U.S.C. 994(e) would require that the sentencing guidelines provide "a substantial sentence of imprisonment" for a defendant with a history of several convictions, a defendant whose criminal activity was part of a pattern of criminal conduct from which he derived a substantial portion of his income, and a defendant whose offense was committed in furtherance of a pattern of activity by a group of persons engaged in racketeering. This provision is, of course, an abbreviated reflection of the considerations underlying the special dangerous offender provisions of current law. The Department of Justice concurs in this approach: rather than employing special sentencing provisions in Part III of the Code, it is reasonable to provide a means of ensuring that these considerations will be incorporated instead in the general guidelines developed by the Sentencing Commission. This is exactly the sort of special consideration that can be assured through the guidelines process, without requiring complex statutory coverage.

In light of the Code's treatment of the special offender sentencing provisions of current law, the Subcommittee might wish to consider whether the Sentencing Commission should be given similar legislative guidance with respect to the promulgation of guidelines for other types of offenders or offenses. For examples, the Subcommittee might wish to give consideration to providing, in the bill itself or in the legislative history, an example of the kinds of situations that ordinarily would be considered to justify probation rather than imprisonment. The Subcommittee might also wish to consider whether it should suggest the appropriateness of an incremental penalty for each offense when a defendant is convicted at one time for several offenses committed at different times. In addition, the Subcommittee might wish to consider whether the two mandatory penalties now set forth in Sections 1811 and 1823 of the new Code might be superseded by a legislative direction that the Sentencing Commission guidelines assure the imposition of an appropriate sentence to imprisonment under the instances covered by these sections. Since the whole purpose of sentencing guidelines is to achieve consistency in sentencing by taking into account the particular aggravating or mitigating circumstances found to warrant special treatment, well drafted guidelines should be able to accommodate the views of both those who have called for a presumption of probation in certain instances, and those who have called for a presumption of incarceration in other situations. It appears to be preferable to permit the Sentencing Commission to establish through the guidelines themselves, on the basis of aggravating and mitigating factors, the kinds of cases warranting a particular type and severity of sentence.

3. The imposition of sentence under the guidelines

Under Section 2001 of the Code, an individual found guilty of a federal offense may be sentenced to a term of probation, a fine, or a term of imprisonment. The sentence to pay a fine may be imposed in combination with either a term of probation or a term of imprisonment. An organization may be sentenced to a term of probation, a fine, or both.

In determining the type and severity of sentence to be imposed, the sentencing judge will be required to consider the nature and circumstances of the offense, the history and characteristics of the defendant, the four purposes for which sentence may be imposed, the sentencing range recommended in the guidelines promulgated by the Sentencing Commission for the applicable category of offense and applicable category of defendant, and any pertinent policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission. The guidelines will recommend an appropriate sentence for a person of the defendant's background and characteristics who has committed the specified offense under the particular aggravating and mitigating circumstances found to exist. The judge ordinarily will be expected to sentence within the range recommended by the guidelines; although it would be impossible for the guidelines to account for every conceivable combination of circumstances, it seems unlikely that departures from the guidelines will be more common than the departures from the present parole guidelines which occur in no more than 10 to 15 percent of the cases to which the guidelines are applied. If, however, the judge finds that there are particularly aggravating or mitigating circumstances of a nature not adequately reflected in the Sentencing Commission guidelines, he will be free to impose a sentence outside the guideline range. In doing so, however, he will be required to state specific reasons for the sentence imposed, and the sentence will be subject to appellate review.

The sentencing guideline approach should help considerably in maintaining consistent adherence to a standard sentencing philosophy and in structuring the exercise of judicial discretion to the degree that sentences do not carry irrationally between similarly situated defendants. At the same time, it will preserve flexibility for use when it is most needed.

4. The sentence appeal provisions.

Section 3725 of the Code permits for the first time an appeal from sentences imposed by federal judges. By incorporating the appeal procedures into the general structure of a guideline sentencing system, the Code assures that the extremes of sentencing that most deserve review may be called to the attention of an appellate court, without overburdening the court with a flood of challenges to sentences well within the bounds of what would generally be considered reasonable under all the circumstances. A defendant will be free to appeal a fine, a term of imprisonment, or a term of parole ineligibility falling above the range specified in the guidelines. The government will be able to appeal a sentence falling below the recommended range of the guidelines, if in such a case the Attorney General approves the filing of an appeal. If, in light of all the factors to be considered in imposing a sentence and in light of the sentence rationale expressed by the district court judge, the court of appeals finds the sentence to be clearly unreasonable, it may remand the case for imposition of a new sentence or for further sentencing proceedings, or it may revise the sentence itself. Appellate review under this proposal should result in the development of a body of case law concerning the circumstances under which a sentence outside the guideline range is appropriate, and should encourage continuing refinement of the guidelines by the Sentencing Commission.

It should be noted that under Rule 35 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure a mechanism exists for correction of a sentence in a case in which the guidelines have been incorrectly applied.

5. The determination of imprisonment release dates

Under the Code, the "good time" provisions of current law are abolished and the parole system is retained as the sole mechanism for determining the release date of an incarcerated prisoner. Under Section 2302(c), at the time the judge imposes a sentence to a term of imprisonment he will also designate the portion of the sentence, if any, during which the prisoner will be ineligible for release on parole. The decision whether to impose such a term of parole ineligibility, and, if it is to be imposed, the decision as to its length, is governed by the sentencing guidelines and by other factors the judge is required to consider in imposing sentence. If, under the Sentencing Commission guidelines, a judge determines that a particular category of white collar offender should spend some time in prison for purposes of deterrence and just punishment, he might conclude that, because such purposes would not support an indeterminate sentence, the maximum term of parole ineligibility—90 percent—should be imposed. On the other hand, if the judge determines under Sentencing Commission guidelines that a particular offender warrants incarceration solely for purposes of incapacitation, he might conclude that, assuming the offense is one for which correlating factors for recidivism have then been developed, he may wish to employ a more substantial variable in the prison term. In any event, a prisoner's release date will be set according to parole guidelines developed by the Sentencing Commission to dovetail with the sentencing guidelines applicable in each particular case.

In combination, these factors will substantially increase the certainty of the effect of a particular sentence on a particular defendant. Such certainty should help enhance the credibility of the criminal justice system, permitting both the defendant and the general public to know the true import of a particular sentence. Moreover, it should benefit the defendant by permitting him to know in advance the actual length of his sentence, and may help concentrate his attention on planning more effectively for his future after release.

IV. Consideration of the need for retaining indeterminate sentences subject to parole in the context of a guideline sentencing system

As the Attorney General previously has suggested to this Subcommittee, it is appropriate that the Congress give consideration to abolishing the existing parole system in the context of the guideline sentencing system provided in the new Code. It is an action that would follow logically from the creation of a guideline sentencing system and that could result in additional benefits to the federal criminal justice system.

The existing federal sentencing system as it pertains to sentences to imprisonment is, of course, essentially a two-step process, with the judge imposing a sentence somewhere within the maximum range specified by Congress for the offense and the Parole Commission determining what portion of the original sentence should be the actual amount of time to be served by the offender. The new Code contained in S. 1437—except for permitting the sentencing judge to impose a substantial period of parole ineligibility, and except for assigning the drafting of parole release guidelines to the Sentencing Commission to assure that they dovetail with the sentencing guidelines in every case—continues this aspect of current law.

In the last several years, a growing number of persons of all political views have called for reform of sentencing and parole practices, partly because of recognition that the present system produces unwarranted disparities in sentencing, and partly because of a belated recognition that the theory of rehabilitation, which is the primary basis for indeterminate sentencing, has proven unsatisfactory in practice. The first problem, that of unwarranted disparity in sentencing, of course is addressed in the provisions of S. 1437 that clearly define the appropriate purposes of sentencing, establish a guideline sentencing system, and provide for appellate review of sentences falling outside the guidelines. The second problem is not addressed directly by the bill.

The parole system is made necessary by the indeterminate sentence approach under which a judge imposes only the maximum period of imprisonment that the defendant should be expected to serve. The theory underlying the indeterminate sentence is predicated on the rehabilitative ideal. It focuses on sentencing for rehabilitation, not sentencing for punishment, deterrence, or incapacitation. Simply stated, the theory assumes that by definition an offender is socially "ill," that he should be confined to prison for purposes of "treatment," and that he should be released just as soon as it is determined by parole authorities that he is "cured." The difficulty with the rehabilitative ideal, which has permeated our sentencing legislation for decades, is that it is unrealistic. Recent studies by Dr. Martinson and others have demonstrated that our behavioral scientists do not yet know of any reliable means of inducing rehabilitation of prisoners, nor can they provide a means of identifying an individual who has become rehabilitated. If there is no accurate way to determine when a person has become rehabilitated, there is no reason in the first instance for sentencing him to an indefinite term of imprisonment which is to be terminated only upon such a determination, as opposed to a definite term. Consequently, a rational sentencing system seemingly should provide that the sentence announced by the judge, pursuant to sentencing guidelines, should be the sentence actually to be served. Under such a system, the maximum penalties of the new Code could be further reduced, and the Sentencing Commission could be required to take into account the fact that the sentence imposed would be the sentence actually served, and, consequently, would be expected to recommend shorter sentences than those imposed today. In those rare cases where extraordinary circumstances such as terminal illness or drastic changes in family circumstances would justify early release, the authority provided by the new Code's Section 2302(c)(1) for the Bureau of Prisons to ask the court to reduce the sentence would provide an appropriate means of altering the release date.

The benefits currently provided by the parole system would be lost under such a structure. Today the federal parole system is thought to serve four basic purposes. First, it attempts to mitigate unfair disparity by releasing similar offenders after similar periods of time regardless of the sentence imposed by the court. Second, it seeks to monitor a prisoner's progress toward rehabilitation so that he may be released when he is ready to return to society. Third, it offers a hope of early release that serves as an incentive to good behavior in prison. Finally, it creates a post-release period during which the Probation Service can provide assistance to former prisoners and supervise their behavior to ensure against recidivism.

The first purpose—helping to eliminate unfairness—will be much better served by the sentencing guidelines system. The second purpose—monitoring rehabilitative progress—has fallen into such general disrepute that today the Parole Commission generally bases its release determination, as noted previously, only upon factors known at the time of sentencing rather than upon a prisoner's behavior while confined. The third purpose—encouraging good behavior—is felt to be unnecessary by the Bureau of Prisons; the granting or withholding of various privileges has been found to be a more effective means of encouraging compliance with prison regulations, and, in any event, the substitution of a modest "good time" proposal (perhaps ten percent of the prison term) for the Code's parole variable could provide any additional incentive that might be needed. The final purpose—prevention of recidivism—is now attempted through post-release assistance and supervision. That aspect of the parole system designed to assist prisoners in making the transition back to society could be replaced by requiring prisoners to spend a short period of time in a halfway house or other similar facility and by giving them post-release access to the assistance of the Probation Service. The supervisory role of the parole system would be eliminated, since it has not been found effective in preventing recidivism and since it would be fairer to use the criminal trial process to deal with the more serious misconduct of recently released prisoners as is done in the case of other members of society.

It appears, therefore, that the purposes of the parole system would be served at least as well by such a modification of the Code's guideline sentencing system. In addition, determinate sentences resulting from the abolition of parole would offer two clear advantages over indeterminate sentences.

One advantage is that, by eliminating all remaining uncertainty concerning a prisoner's release date, a major cause of prisoner complaints would be removed. The increased fairness, and the increased appearance of fairness, could help further to reduce a major reason for prisoner bitterness—a bitterness that hampers preparation for reentry into society since real or imagined injustices focus a prisoner's attention upon relitigating the propriety of his incarceration rather than upon his future after release. Participation in educational and training programs would no longer be designed simply to try to secure more favorable treatment from parole authorities; participation would become truly voluntary, and hence potentially more effective.

Another advantage is that a determinate sentencing system would enhance the credibility of sentences handed down by courts. Most persons recognize that even the small percentage of criminals who reach the end of the criminal justice process today will not be required to serve anything close to the periods prescribed in the sentences imposed upon them. This lack of credibility in sentencing makes a measurable contribution to the current disrespect for the criminal justice system and decreases any deterrent impact the system may be capable of. While there is substantial potential for increased credibility in the current version of the Code contained in S. 1437, the elimination of the remaining opportunity for indeterminate sentences could have a much greater impact.

V. Conclusion

The deficiencies of the existing sentencing laws will be dramatically rectified by the adoption of the proposed new Federal Criminal Code contained in S. 1437. The Department of Justice urges its prompt passage. Whether or not the Congress determines to make any further changes to eliminate the vestiges of indeterminate sentencing still contained in the new Code, the Code's sentencing provisions will contribute significantly to the realization of a rational and fair criminal justice system.

Mr. GAINER. I would like also to be permitted to introduce for the subcommittee's consideration a paper prepared by Miss Skrivseth on what would happen if the sole vestiges of indeterminacy were eliminated from the code. It is a lengthy paper, and the typing should be completed in another day or two.

Senator KENNEDY. We will look forward to that.

[Material appears on pp. 9200-9228.]

Mr. GAINER. The current Federal sentencing statutes, Mr. Chairman, are not particularly helpful. The first section that appears in the current sentencing chapter informs Federal judges that they should not impose a sentence that would "work corruption of the blood." The second section that appears in the sentencing chapter informs Federal judges that they should not impose a sentence that would require a defendant to stand in the local pillory. This is not an auspicious introduction to the Federal criminal sentencing statutes, and in fact, in many respects they go downhill from that point.

The statutes provide very little guidance to sentencing judges. As a matter of fact, they leave the sentence to be imposed in a particular case—to the unfettered discretion of the judge. Federal judges, for the most part, are highly competent individuals, but they have no more formal training than the rest of us in penology, criminology, psychology, and defining the societal values that should affect the sentencing process. This does not bother some judges. Some judges feel that in sentencing they are at the apex of their proper judicial authority and that they are as well prepared as anyone in society to exercise that authority. It does bother other judges. Judge Frankel has quoted Judge Learned Hand as saying, in essence, that he often felt like an old man in a black nightgown muttering under his breath and thereby sealing the doom of some poor individual who might be no worse than he is.

There is little in the way of stated purposes of sentencing in the existing statutes. There is no legislative guidance whether sentences should appropriately be imposed for deterrent purposes or incapacitation purposes or purposes of just punishment. The only directions that appear are in a couple of peripheral statutes dealing with the purpose of rehabilitation.

The penalty limits supplied by existing criminal offenses vary irrationally. The maximum terms of imprisonment that may be imposed are the only guidance in the existing law, really, that govern the imposition of terms by Federal judges.

Yet, there are considerable differences in the available sentences for like offenses. Robbery, for example, under one Federal statute, carries 10 years' imprisonment; under another Federal statute, it carries 20 years'. Embezzlement under one Federal statute carries 10 years' imprisonment; under another Federal statute, embezzlement of the same amount of money carries 5 years' imprisonment; and under another Federal statute, embezzlement of the same amount of money carries 2 years' imprisonment. The fine available for the 5-year offense inidentally, is $5,000, while the fine available for the 2-year offense is $10,000.

The penalty for perjury, intentional lying in an official proceeding after being sworn to tell the truth—carries 5 years and $5,000, but the penalty for false statements—intentionally lying to any Federal employee, not in an official proceeding, and not after having sworn to tell the truth—carries a like penalty of 5 years, but a greater fine of $10,000.

The dangerous special offender provisions of current law permit a penalty of up to 25 years for any offense—regardless of the offense penalty otherwise applicable—for certain kinds of offenders.

The penalty limits on contempt are nonexistent. A judge, in theory, can impose any penalty he wishes for contempt, two or three lifetimes or two or three fortunes.

Probation is not considered a sentence under current law. It is considered a suspension of the imposition or execution of the sentence. That is one of the reasons why it has not been used particularly innovatively.

The maximum fines under current law are abysmally low. They amount, usually, to no more than a potential slap on the wrist. They certainly have not been keeping pace with inflation. They are not, by any stretch of the imagination, serious alternatives to incarceration. Even when fines are imposed, there is no statutory means provided to assure that they can be collected.

Imprisonment maxima, under current law, are relatively lengthy, and the imprisonment is indeterminate in nature. Generally, it is a two-step process under current law. The judge imposes the maximum penalty that he believes the individual should serve and then the Parole Commission comes along and imposes the release date within that maximum penalty. The theoretical underpinning for this indeterminate sentencing approach is, of course, the rehabilitative ideal. This has been an ideal that has permeated our sentencing philosophy, and certainly our legislative philosophy, for some decades. It is based upon the assumption that crime is a social disease—the persons who commit crimes are, by definition, socially ill, and therefore we will place them in penitentiaries where they may become “penitent,” reflect upon their wrongdoings, engage in rehabilitative programs, and, at some juncture, reach a point where they are rehabilitated.

At this magical moment, the parole authorities are to recognize that a prisoner is rehabilitated and release him, no matter what the sentence imposed by the judge. They are to release him regardless of the fact that the sentence imposed by the judge may have been imposed for purposes entirely different from the purpose of rehabilitation. It may have been imposed for just punishment. It may have been imposed for deterrence. Nevertheless, under the current sentencing philosophy, predicated upon the rehabilitative ideal, the individual is to be released as soon as rehabilitated.

In the last few years the whole underpinning of the rehabilitative ideal has been somewhat shattered by the findings of Dr. Martinson and others when they conducted reviews of all rehabilitative efforts that had been tried over a 22-year period and found that nothing works. Nothing at all works. It does not matter what was tried to induce rehabilitation—work release programs, conjugal visits, group therapy, and what not—the recidivism rate of the test group was invariably approximately that of the control group. The only thing Dr. Martinson found that worked was castration, something tried by Denmark in regard to sex offenders, and even then the rate was reduced from about 30 percent to 3 percent and not to zero.

With the recognition that we do not know how to induce rehabilitation and with the increasingly broad recognition that we cannot identify rehabilitation when it actually takes place, if it takes place, there is no real reason to have the parole authorities second-guessing the judge as to the time an individual should spend in prison. They are no longer looking to those factors pertaining to the individual's rehabilitative progress in the institutional setting.

The Federal Parole Commission, with admirable candor, has given up trying to base its release determination upon the individual's institutional behavior. The Commissioners have developed, to their credit, a set of guidelines, to be somewhat mechanistically applied, which indicate when an individual probably should be released regardless of the maximum sentence imposed upon him. The factors that underlie the guidelines are not factors pertaining to the individual's development while in the institutional setting, but instead are factors that were known to the judge at the time of sentencing.

If those factors are known to the judge at the time of sentencing, why cannot the judge himself say: "This is the term the individual should actually serve," instead of imposing a greater term and leaving it to the Parole Commission to look at the same factors and say: "This is the limit of the term the individual should actually serve." The Parole Commission is not looking at new information.

The result of the interrelationship of these peculiar features of our current laws is a great deal of unwarranted disparity in sentences imposed. We used to feel that our Federal system was somewhat sacrosanct and that while disparity occurred, of course, in the State systems, it did not occur in the Federal system. Well, it does.

We have had the benefit in the last several years of the second circuit sentencing study, among others, wherein hypothetical situations listing all sorts of factors concerning a particular offender, and the manner in which he committed the offense, were passed out to 40-some judges in the second circuit who were asked: "What do you think an appropriate sentence would be in this particular case? What sentence would you impose?" The judges, as an example, in the hypothetical situation involving a loan-sharking offender, ranged from 3 years' imprisonment to 20 years' imprisonment. These are judges within one limited part of the country. More significantly, the judges varied considerably on the issue whether any imprisonment was appropriate in over three-fourths of the hypothetical situations submitted to them.

Such disparities do not exist solely in theory. They exist in practice. The Bureau of Prisons has recently undertaken some studies of individuals incarcerated in 1974 and 1975. The researchers were looking for individuals similarly situated with similar backgrounds who committed similar offenses, and looking at the sentences actually imposed in those cases. They found, for example, that with regard to bank robbers of similar backgrounds, the average sentences varied considerably. At one extreme the average sentence in nine judicial districts was 85 months. At the other extreme the average sentence in eight judicial districts was over 200 months.

The balance achieved by the averaging of extremes is no real balance at all. That is all we have today. In many instances we may as well be using what was given me some time ago as a suggested "judge's sentencing selector"—given to me by an individual who purported to have received it from a sentencing judge. It is one page of directions in the form of a dart board. All it requires in addition to the page is a dart. It lists "2 to 10 years," "3 to 5 years," "the first two digits of your street address minus the last two digits of your phone number," and so forth. The sad thing is that this attempt at caustic humor by the author is very close to what might be achieved through the system we have today.

The attempts to rectify the current situation that have been undertaken by the Judicial Conference, and undertaken by the Parole Commission, have been largely ineffective because the heart of the problem is the legislation that exists today in the sentencing area. They cannot reach that through sentencing councils, through sentencing practice institutes, or through Parole Commission guidelines that let out an individual at a set time, no matter what the maximum sentence that the judge imposed. Beyond that, the Parole Commission, of course, even in trying to eliminate disparity in sentences that are imposed today, can reach only the 50 percent of sentenced offenders in prison who come within their jurisdiction as a result of the periods of parole eligibility and the operation of the "good time" provisions. Of course, they can do nothing about the other 50 percent of those in prison. Of course, they can do nothing about the other 60 percent or so of offenders who are not sentenced to imprisonment at all. And, of course, they can do nothing about raising a sentence that is inadequate.

The entire Federal sentencing structure is drastically in need of a major overhaul.

The bill before this committee, S. 1437, contains, in the context of providing a major reform of all the Federal criminal laws, a dramatic and innovative proposal in the sentencing area.

Under the proposed new code, there would be rational grading for the first time, with offenses of similar severity carrying similar penalties and offenses of dissimilar severity carrying appropriately dissimilar penalties.

Purposes of sentencing would be recognized for the first time by the legislature. The judicially recognized purposes of deterrence, and incapacitation, and just punishment, and rehabilitation are set forth specifically in the first section of the entire code, and are set forth again in the first section of the sentencing provisions. They are not all applicable, of course in all instances. They are not all applicable to all forms of sentencing that might be imposed. Accordingly, this bill, at the beginning of the chapter on imprisonment, at the beginning of the chapter on fines, and at the beginning of the chapter on probation, provides that the judge, in assessing a sentence, shall consider, among other things, the purposes of sentencing set forth in the code "to the extent that they are applicable" to that kind of sentence. The assumption is, of course, that if the purpose required in a particular case is incapacitation, probation probably could not be supported by that purpose. The assumption is also that, under our current state of knowledge, if the purpose of sentencing is rehabilitation, incarceration probably, in most instances, would not be an appropriate means of executing that particular sentencing philosophy.

The special, collateral penalties and provisions included in the code provide some innovative options that simply have not existed prior to this time. The judge is permitted, in any case, to impose, in addition to whatever sentence he comes up with, an order that a fraudulent offender or a corporate offender notify the victims of the offense in order to facilitate civil actions for damages. Indeed, the code contains a civil action for damages that may be brought in a Federal district court.

There is another special provision that provides for the first time in Federal law that a judge may direct, in addition to any other sentence, that the individual provide reparation to the victim of his offense.

There is also contained in the code an important provision that would provide compensation, through the Federal Government, to victims of all violent Federal offenses. Today, there are no provisions in current Federal title 18 that provide compensation for victims of offense, save one. The one instance where victim compensation is provided is not for murder, not for maiming, but for the offense of seduction of a female steamship passenger. In that instance, the fine is to be paid "for the use of the female seduced."

For too long in our society we have considered, or tended to consider, crimes to be affronts to society itself. We talk in terms of individuals paying their debt to society. It is the victims of those offenses who are the ones who really end up paying those debts, as the current law is constituted. For the first time, in this code, there would be an effective program of compensating the victims of those violent offenses.

Probation is set forth in the new code, not as a suspension of imposition of sentence or a suspension of execution of sentence, but as a sentence itself. A series of conditions are suggested that might be appropriate in particular instances, such as a sentence to probation on condition that the individual perform community service. Many of these conditions have not been specified before.

The maximum fines are greatly higher than those in current law. The fine for an individual committing any felony is $100,000. The fine for an organization committing any felony which today is often no more than the entity's annual cost of paper clips, is raised to half a million dollars. There is an alternative fine provision that provides a fine in appropriate cases, of double the loss occasioned to the victim of the offense, or double the gain accrued by the defendant in committing the offense. Importantly, the fines are made more collectable, too, in a separate subchapter. The code permits the utilization of the Internal Revenue Service lien procedures, so that when fines are imposed there is some real hope that they can be collected. In order to prevent an enormous fine from being imposed upon a person who has no means of paying it, however, all fines under the code are conditioned upon the individual's or the organization's ability to pay.

Imprisonment terms are generally somewhat lower than current law, and lesser included offenses appear where none have appeared previously. For instance, while thefts today generally carry about 5 years, under the new code serious thefts would carry more, average thefts would carry about that time, and minor thefts would carry less. The petty offense of "joy riding," which today is treated like any other theft as a 5-year offense, is dropped to a maximum penalty of 6 months.

The sentences to imprisonment, in addition, may be imposed without eligibility or parole, eliminating in large measure, in appropriate cases, the indeterminate aspects of sentencing under existing law. A period of parole ineligibility may be imposed for close to the maximum term of imprisonment, or it may not be imposed at all, depending upon what appears appropriate in an individual case.

All of these specific provisions pale, however, in light of the general structure used to guide the judges in the imposition of sentences. The bill creates a guidelines sentencing system under which a Sentencing Commission is established in the judicial branch of the Federal Government. That Commission is directed to issue specific guidelines as to appropriate sentences for particular offenses committed by particular offenders under particular aggravating and mitigating circumstances. The guidelines might take the form of a grid system. When a judge had before him a particular offender he could look to see the offender characteristics involved, the aggravating circumstances involved in the offense, the mitigating circumstances of the offense, and determine what the Commission recommended in such a situation—probation on certain conditions, a fine of a certain amount, or imprisonment in a certain amount, whatever was the recommendation in that particular area. The sentencing range would be narrow—in imprisonment, for example, maybe a year and a half to a year and three-quarters; 5 years to 5½ years. It would be a fairly tight range.

The judge would be expected ordinarily to sentence within that range, but he would be free, if he came across particular circumstances in the case that led him to conclude that important factors were not adequately considered by the Sentencing Commission, to impose a sentence above the guidelines or below the guidelines. If he did sentence outside the guideline range, he would have to state his reasons for the sentence—no reasons are required today—and that sentence would be subject, as Senator Hruska has noted, to appellate review where there is no appellate review today.

Senator KENNEDY. He would like to give it to everyone.

Mr. GAINER. He would. The original proposal that Senator Hruska was working on, of course, was a proposal that would look to appellate review in the context of the current system where the disparities are rampant. Under the sentencing system that is designed in the code, there should be a tremendous amount of uniformity in Federal sentencing where it simply has not existed before.

Senator KENNEDY. We hope that is the case, but what about his point? We are moving ahead with over 100 new judges. Should we not consider the opportunity for appellate review for all sentences?

Mr. GAINER. The way to meet a problem is to meet it head on and not to try to graft on some remedial measure to correct a bad situation that exists at the beginning of the process. That is what this bill does. It corrects a bad situation that today exists at the beginning of the sentencing process. It introduces rationality and uniformity at the first stage. It should provide a means so that disparity will occur relatively rarely, and, when extremes do occur, those instances will be subject to appellate review.

In the instances found by the sentencing judge to be appropriately within the Commission's guidelines, where the Commission had found its guidelines to be appropriate, and where this Congress in review of those guidelines had found the range to be appropriate, there would be no general need, as exists today, for appellate review of those sentences.

This is a major step forward to reach the extremes of sentencing. It should be adequate for those purposes. If it is not, after several years of experience, it can be looked at again. It would seem that by meeting the problem head on, at the beginning of the process, it is a far more rational way to approach the difficulty than attempting the use of remedial device, or relying in large measure on such a remedial device.

The proposals of the code, in combination, would provide a dramatic change in the Federal law concerning sentencing. They provide a change that is very badly needed. They are probably, in combination, the most innovative set of proposals in the proposed new code.

These proposals have the strong support of the Department of Justice and they have the strong support of this administration. We urge early passage of the bill containing them.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me touch upon two areas with you. One is the need for the continuation of parole release for prisoners who are already in prison, that is, prior to the enactment of the sentencing procedures included in this legislation. What are we going to do in the transitional period?

Mr. GAINER. Of course, as the bill now stands, it would continue the Parole Commission. The Commission in appropriate cases would have a function similar to that which it had when originally designed, and would be imposing release dates based upon guidelines developed by the Sentencing Commission in order to dovetail with the Sentencing Commission's original purposes in its sentencing guidelines.

Since the Parole Commission would continue under the present draft, it is only if this committee decides that it might abolish the remaining vestiges of indeterminate sentences, and, accordingly, the parole authority as it now exists, that consideration would have to be given to this factor. If the committee should choose to do that, there would still be a delay of 3½ years, assuming 1½ years before enactment and 2 years before the effective date, during which the Parole Commission would have to remain in existence. Even then, probably the Parole Commission would have to remain in existence for a further period in order to handle the offenders who had been sentenced under the previous laws.

Senator KENNEDY. How long?

Mr. GAINER. Well, it might range between 5 and 10 years. The number of cases coming before the Commission would decrease over time, of course.

The committee might wish to consider another alternative which would be to abolish the Commission—if this is the tack it chooses to take—at the time of enactment. It could give all the persons in prison at the time that this code comes into existence the benefit of the doubt, releasing them automatically at the release date that would have been afforded under the current Parole Commission guidelines, or giving them the maximum sentence that would be impossible under the new code's guidelines, whichever is less.

Senator KENNEDY. Maybe we could take a look at that proposal.

Mr. GAINER. Again, that would come into play only if this committee wanted to eliminate early release on parole.

Senator KENNEDY. That ought to be before the committee.

Let me hear your views about rehabilitation. You have made reference in your statement about the importance of sentencing for purposes of deterrence and just punishment.

What is your view of rehabilitation, just generally, and what should we be thinking about in that area?

Mr. GAINER. Senator, rehabilitation is really the primary purpose for most sentences to probation. Therefore, it has to be a purpose of sentencing in the code.

The question usually arises as whether or not rehabilitation continues to be a valid purpose for incarceration. When Martinson completed his study, he seemed somewhat edgy about the public reception of his results. He was afraid they would be interpreted to mean that we should not even try rehabilitation anymore. Of course, we should try for two reasons. The first is simply a humanitarian reason; that is, persons who are in prison should be given the benefit of whatever rehabilitation programs we can design. Second, who knows but that we might find something that works.

A couple of weeks ago, there was a report that some researchers had found that criminality in particular individuals could be reduced by feeding them chocolate. I am not sure that we will come to such a neat solution in many cases, but whatever remedial attempts we can take certainly should be left open for experimentation.

But beyond that, it would clearly be a shame to cut off the possibility of any sentence in the future for rehabilitative purposes. Even today, there may be some sorts of situations in which incarceration may appropriately be imposed for limited times for essentially rehabilitative purposes, such, as perhaps, a defendant requiring a withdrawal period during drug addiction treatment. The issue probably could be handled adequately in the legislative history of the bill, indicating that, under the current state of knowledge, it would generally seem inappropriate to use rehabilitation as the sole purpose—not as a collateral purpose but as the sole purpose—for incarceration. Under the bill's approach, the propriety of the purpose would be left to the Sentencing Commission, based upon the information coming to it in the course of its keeping current with penological and certain sociological thinking as to what would be appropriate under all the circumstances.

I think it would be a mistake to delete rehabilitation as a purpose of sentencing simply on the basis of the most recent findings and the current conventional wisdom.

Senator KENNEDY. I think that we have to try to find ways of expanding rehabilitative programs. I agree with everything you said in terms of confused attitudes and the injustices which have resulted from the failure to understand the distinction between incarceration and rehabilitation.

But it seems to me that the only way that these sentencing provisions are going to make sense over a long period of time is with a strong emphasis on rehabilitation. That, I think, has to be recognized and has to be advanced.

MR. GAINER. I think, Senator, the bill that you and others have produced does take cognizance of that need, particularly in the training area by providing the opportunity for engaging in industries in which prison personnel may sell in the competitive market. This will provide training in job skills where there is a market for job skills, and training that may eventually help in rehabilitation under the broad understanding of the term.

SENATOR KENNEDY. I want to thank you very much and we want to thank Karen Skrivseth. She has been very helpful to the Committee. We look forward to working with you. Thank you very much.

Our next witness is Curtis Crawford, Acting Chairman of the U.S. Parole Commission, accompanied by Commissioner Dorothy Parker, Dorothy Parker is a former employee of the committee.

MS. PARKER. Senator, it might be better if I did not join the Chairman. I do not agree with the philosophy of the majority of the Commission in the handling of this. The Chairman will state the opinion of the majority.

SENATOR KENNEDY. Fine.

You have views and if you would like to submit them, we would welcome them as well.

MS. PARKER. I would be glad to.

SENATOR KENNEDY. We will hear from the Chairman, but if you have other views and would like to submit them, we would include them in the record.

STATEMENT OF CURTIS C. CRAWFORD, ACTING CHAIRMAN, U.S. PAROLE COMMISSION; ACCOMPANIED BY PETER HOFFMAN, DIRECTOR OF RESEARCH, U.S. PAROLE COMMISSION

MR. CRAWFORD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to say that I have with me this morning Dr. Peter Hoffman, who directs the research for the U.S. Parole Commission.

I have a brief statement that I would like to read into this record and also I would like to state that my comments here this morning—I am not speaking for either the Department of Justice or the administration.

SENATOR KENNEDY. What does that mean?

MR. CRAWFORD. Briefly, what I am saying is that the Department under Attorney General Bell has taken a position. I do not want anybody to misconstrue my thoughts here and perhaps adopt these thoughts as being the thoughts of the Department of Justice or the administration. I want it clear in this record that these are the comments of a majority of the members of the Parole Commission.

On behalf of the U.S. Parole Commission, I welcome this opportunity to appear here today to present for your consideration the views of the majority of the members of the Parole Commission on certain provisions of S. 1437 relating to parole and sentencing.

As I indicated, I am not speaking for either the Department of Justice or the administration.

The foundation of modern parole is founding in the progression from strict imprisonment to gradual freedom within limited areas, to liberation with conditions of parole and supervision in the community.

Parole in America has played a continuing, vital, and distinguished role over the past 100 years in the administration of criminal justice:

Two national attorney general's conferences on parole have been called by the Attorney General and President to evaluate the progress of the parole system in America. The first national conference was in April 1939 by Attorney General Frank Murphy with the very active participation of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The conference was attended by nearly 800 delegates representing 46 States of the Union. Objectives of the conference as stated by General Murphy was to: (1) Present the facts about parole to the American people; (2) to reach agreement as to desirable standards in administration; and (3) to point the way to closer cooperation between the Federal Government and that of the several State paroling authorities.

In opening this historical National Parole Conference, President Roosevelt stated that he "considered parole the most enlightened and promising method of terminating a prison sentence."

President Roosevelt, in the keynote address, pointed out that public criticism has been based upon inadequate information, particularly about the ratio of parole success. The President continued:

It is especially important that people should not be deceived by violent attacks on properly run parole administrations if one parolee goes wrong and commits another crime. The fact clearly show that while a properly run parole system gives no guarantee of perfection, the percentages of parolees who go straight for the rest of their lives are infinitely higher than where there is no parole system at all. Well administered parole is an instrument of tested values in the control of crime. Its proper use in all jurisdictions will promote our national security.

The second National Conference on Parole was called by U.S. Attorney General Herbert Brownell, Jr., in April 1956 in the Nation's Capital.

Chief Justice Earl Warren, in his keynote address, stated:

It has been my opportunity in life to see parole from different vantage points. First, of course, as a citizen; second, as a prosecutor; third, as a legal adviser of a parole system; fourth, as Governor of my State charged with the administration of a parole system; and recently from the bench. I say to you frankly that it presents a different picture from each of these vantage points because each of these experiences has strengthened my belief in the parole system and my expectation for its accelerated progress in the future.

Now, let me say that the members of the Parole Commission support the general thrust of this bill to reform the Federal criminal laws and particularly the efforts to set forth a system to reduce judicial sentencing disparity. Problems of excessive and unwarranted variations in criminal justice sentences are all too readily apparent in the way the system presently operates.

It is believed that a guideline system promulgated by a sentencing commission can provide a significant step in regard to improving judicial sentencing. We do, however, have certain suggestions to offer concerning the role of a parole authority and its relation to the sentencing commission, which we think will prove this measure.

As you may know from the previous testimony of Bureau of Prisons Director Norman Carlson, Dean Don M. Gottfredson, and former Deputy Attorney General Harold Tyler, the U.S. Parole Board—now the Parole Commission—was the first operating criminal justice agency to implement a guideline model for the determination of time to be served in prison before release—within the limits set by statute and sentencing judge.

Decisions outside the guidelines are permitted, but only for good cause and upon the provision of specific written reasons. Based upon the work of a team of distinguished researchers, including Dean Gottfredson, who has testified before this committee in relation to his work with guidelines for sentencing, guidelines for parole release decisions first went into effect in October 1972, nearly 5 years ago.

Expanded to all Federal parole release decisions by October 1974, this guideline model was incorporated into statute in the Parole Commission Reorganization Act of 1976, a major reform of the Federal parole practices resulting from over 3 years of study.

In content and application, this guideline model is quite similar to what S. 1437 appears to contemplate would be promulgated by the Sentencing Commission. For example, one might compare the criteria of proposed 1437 with the present 18 U.S.C. 4206 and the detailed text of the accompanying conference report.

Since the first pilot project nearly 5 years ago, parole release guidelines have been applied to nearly 40,000 sentenced Federal prisoners. Thus, the Parole Commission feels that it has considerable experience with the guideline concept in practice and can attest to both its strength and its limitations.

That brings me to consideration of the role of the Parole Commission under proposed S. 1437. Given the concept of Federal judges imposing sentences under a guideline framework, the question has been raised as to what, if any, function would be served by a parole authority.

In fact, several witnesses testifying before this committee have concluded that under this act the Parole Commission would merely be duplicative and should be eliminated. We feel that such conclusions are based upon certain erroneous assumptions and that there is a clear and viable role for a parole authority working in conjunction with the Sentencing Commission and judiciary in determining fair and consistent prison terms.

It is our reasoned belief that while implementation of a Sentencing Commission is likely to enhance equity in certain areas, such as the primary decision as to who is committed to prison and who is placed on probation.

Without the retention of the Parole Commission, equity in other areas, specifically in the determination of the actual length of prison terms, is likely to be reduced.

Even Mr. O'Donnell, who argued before this committee that parole should be abolished, points out in his text, "Towards a Just and Effective Sentencing System," the fact that a strong limitation of the Parole Commission's present use of guidelines is that the Parole Board does not have adequate control over sentencing practices to sufficiently reduce judicial sentencing disparity.

Thus, it might appear that a liability under the present system is not too much authority for the Parole Commission, but rather too little.

Simply stated, it is our belief from considerable experience within a guideline system, that sentencing guidelines alone, applied by 398 or more, as I have heard, Federal judges, sitting individually will, even with appellate review, not produce the fairness and equity in the setting of actual time to be spent in prison that is the underlying intent of this legislation.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask you this. That is the whole point that we are attempting to reach; that is, that the prisoner will know at the time by his initial sentence exactly how much time he is going to spend.

Why shouldn't he know at the outset that he is going to spend x number of years in prison, subject to good behavior? If he does not misbehave, on x date he will be released. Not only will he know, but society will know as well.

It seems to me that those are the two elements that we are trying to achieve. Why is not that your concern about the disparity between different judges and all the other factors? Why is not that the best way to deal with it?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I could say at this particular time, Senator, that the Commission has only recently done this. It is currently running in the Federal Register. The fact that we are seeking to give prisoners within 120 days, or within 4 months of their incarceration the specifics as to how long they will be there.

Senator KENNEDY. Why not have that done in the courtroom? Why not have the judge do that? Why should you do that?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think that has to do solely with the number of individuals involved. I think from our experience, using a very similar guideline concept, that we have learned that while the guidelines are very, very valuable, that they will not alone be sufficient to serve their intended tasks; that is, while guidelines can reduce disparity, it is doubtful that the guidelines alone, applied by 400 to 500 separate individuals, can substantially reduce that to accomplish the aims at fair and consistent present terms.

Senator KENNEDY. We have heard the proposals. Senator Hart has said that rather than have a 1- or 2-year flexibility period he would provide the exact number of years.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Would you favor that?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. I think the liability with that approach is the liability of the mandatory sentence provision. It is simply that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for anybody to, in advance, articulate all of the possible permutations and combinations of circumstances that may arise. That is why flat sentencing, or mandatory sentencing, has run into the situation where a law will pass and a proposal will come that sale of drugs to juveniles will receive a very stiff penalty. Then it turns out, for example, in the State system, that the age of criminal responsibility is 16, and the age of majority is 18. So, distribution by a 16-year-old to a 17-year-old friend, comes under the heading of sale of marihuana to a minor which was obviously not the intent.

It is simply a matter that while guidelines can substantially structure the discretion, it is doubtful, at least in our view, that they can be written comprehensively enough so that they can be applied by 500 separate individuals and achieve the consistency you desire without making them too rigid. This is why it is suggested that there should be a two-stage process. There would be the initial determination using guidelines and that would be made by the Federal judge.

But for the much more limited number of individuals who receive Federal prison terms, there would be a collegial body which would be a smaller number of individuals and they would sentence full time. They would use guidelines dovetailed into the Sentencing Commission guidelines, and they would apply the actual determination as to the length of time served.

It is argued that the advantage and the production of equity by having a full-time group, which specializes in this task, to do it. We do not care what they are called, but they will be a group which could produce a result which will much more than make up for the alleged duplicativeness of this system.

While the average Federal judge, with 400 Federal judges now, and you run approximately 12,000 prison terms, which is approximately 30 prison terms per year per judge, then sentencing is a part-time function.

If it is true that the guidelines themselves cannot be written that specifically, then it is argued that you are better off with a small full-time body implementing the actual prison term.

Senator KENNEDY. I have not heard among those who have testified that they feel that they could not address those variables.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Dean Gottfredson and Andrew von Hirsch did address that subject. I believe that even Judge Tyler recommended that the Parole Commission be kept in place for a while specifically for a similar purpose.

We simply do not know whether guidelines can be written that tightly. There is the experience with 4 years and 40,000 cases with the Parole Commission, and that seems to indicate, to me at least, that both a small number of full-time decisionmakers and guidelines are required rather than one or the other.

I believe this is the position of Dean Gottfredson who, as you know, worked for the Parole Commission, but who more recently has been working with the sentencing guidelines, in a feasibility of State courts fields.

Senator KENNEDY. But I do not know what information you are going to have 2 or 3 or 4 months hence after sentencing.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No, sir, it is not a question of having additional information. It is simply a question of this. If it is true that the guidelines can articulate the underlying principles and can articulate certain fact situations, but if it is true that it is supplied by 500 individuals, and if it is true that they sit separately and individually, then you will not achieve the consistency that you desire. Then the function of the Parole Commission or whatever agency you would want to call it, would be that they would not have additional information within 4 months. It would be that with the limited task of setting a prison term you would have a small full-time body who communicates with each other and works in panels rather than individuals.

So, you have the concept of guidelines going for you. In addition, you have the concept of a small body who are working full time. They would have sentencing panels which have been advocated in the Federal system for so long, but rarely tried. All of these work together to reduce the disparity rather than only using it one way.

Senator KENNEDY. Under your proposal, then, they would have the authority to reduce the sentence imposed by a judge; is that correct?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Under this type of proposal, which has been recently passed by both houses of the Oregon legislation, you would have a judge who would fix a maximum term. In Oregon, a judge may fix a maximum up to one-half of the maximum. Then, within 6 months in Oregon, although administratively the parole board in Oregon does it within 90 days, the parole board would affix the actual release date. As a matter of fact, the Oregon proposal has this. The parole board has an override so that if four of the five members concur, they may fix a release date notwithstanding the minimum sentence.

What you have is this. You have the original decision as to who to incarcerate, which is a broad decision that would be made in this system under the guidelines by the Federal judge, and then very, very quickly you would have a smaller body fix the actual time to be served.

The advantage is simply the smaller full-time body. There is no new information necessarily.

If the guidelines could be written so specifically and if they could take into account all the permutations and accommodations which would be required, then this would be duplicative.

But the liability of mandatory sentences, which we have had in the past, and which have not worked very effectively, have been that they have tried to take into account all of the combination and permutations. They have not been successful.

Our experience with the parole guidelines, in applying them and implementing them, is simply that they can be a variable tool. They can be a dramatic tool, but in themselves, there is simply the question as to whether they are the end-all and whether they can be totally sufficient in themselves.

Senator KENNEDY. We will get a chance to look at the Oregon legislation. It seems to me it is an improvement over the present system, but I think you still face indecisiveness from the point of view of the prisoner him or herself, as well as society.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Sir, I agree. The question is simply this. Would you trade several months of indecisiveness, or of not knowing, for the increased equity which this system can provide? I agree with you completely that you have to have one or the other.

If the underlying intent is to produce fair and consistent prison terms, then it is simply recommended that this may do the job better.

Senator KENNEDY. That assumes it will be fair and more equitable.
Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. That case still has to be made, does it not?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes, sir. That certainly is true. But it is simply the question. I think the witnesses who have testified previously might be asked specifically on the point as to whether a very, very large number of decisionmakers, that is, whether the interpretation of these guidelines will be sufficiently consistent so that this will be unnecessary.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Senator, also in conjunction with the question, it seems to me that I should say this. We know these facts. We do know that many sentences are controlled by community pressure. We know that a judge sitting there is responding many times in his sentence to the pressures of a given community.

So, even though facts that are similar are used by the Parole Board in making its determination after he has been incarcerated, it is made under circumstances that are far different and far more calm than it would be normally at the time of the sentence made by the sentencing judge.

That was just one other factor relating to the question as to whether or not the judge could perform that same function that the Parole Commission could perform 4 or 5 months after the incarceration.

I wish to be clear that this is not meant as a reflection on the ability of the Federal judiciary, but, rather, as I shall discuss shortly, simply a limitation imposed by the very large number of individuals involved.

Nevertheless, it is our belief that working together, the Sentencing Commission, judiciary, and Parole Commission can enhance equity and fairness, particularly in the time actually to be served by similarly situated offenders. That is, we will attempt to show that a Sentencing Commission model and a Parole Authority are complementary, rather than competitive concepts, and that the increased consistency, effectiveness and checks and balances of this complementary model far outweighs any claims of duplicativeness.

To discuss these issues, I must first highlight the functions that the Parole Commission actually serves and those that it does not serve.

A primary function of the Parole Commission under present statutes is to set fair and equitable prison terms within the limits set by the sentencing judge. Thus, at present the Parole Commission is the only body that has any responsibility at the Federal level for reducing disparity in sentences.

This has repeatedly been recognized by Congress specifically in the legislative history of 18 U.S.C. 4208 in 1958, and again in the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act of 1976 which states:

In the first instance, parole has the practical effect of balancing differences in sentencing policies and practices between judges and courts in a system that is as wide and diverse as the Federal criminal justice system.

Nevertheless, this is certainly not a widely known role. It is a role explicitly stated by only a few other parole systems—for example, Minnesota and Oregon; and it is most emphatically not the image of the Parole Commission that is generally created and reported by the mass media.

You have heard, in previous testimony, an argument that coercive rehabilitation programs are not effective, and that consequently the Parole Commission should be abolished. As applied to present Federal parole practice, this criticism is simply inaccurate.

As noted above, the primary purpose of the Parole Commission is the provision of fair and consistent prison terms, not coerced rehabilitation. Rehabilitation—rather than being a function of the parole board—lies primarily within the province of the Bureau of Prisons.

Another criticism has been related to indeterminacy and to the uncertainty under which prisoners are kept regarding their release date. Although this has been the traditional practice of paroling agencies, since the development of the guideline model in 1972, the U.S. Parole Commission has been moving in the direction of increased certainty in the determination of parole release dates.

Not only do the guidelines provide an estimate for prisoners as to the time they will actually serve, but the Parole Commission has actively been experimenting with a procedure for reducing unnecessary uncertainty.

In May of last year, an experimental project was begun in the western region of the country by the Parole Commission which involved informing a prisoner early in his term of a prospective parole date—contingent upon good conduct. A similar joint effort with the Bureau of Prisons was also begun last year at the Butner facility in North Carolina.

The tentative feedback obtained to date, although based upon an extremely limited sample, is very encouraging. Partially as a result of this experiment, the Parole Commission has recently set forth proposed regulations under which most prisoners would be informed of a presumptive release date, contingent upon good behavior, within 4 months of their arrival at the Federal prison.

While this method may still technically be classified as an indeterminate sentence, it certainly does not contain the uncertainty or coercive rehabilitation pressure that certain critics decry. Upon receipt and consideration of public comment as provided by the Administrative Procedure Act, it is the Commission's intention to move forward promptly in this area.

Another criticism that you have heard in testimony is that the Parole Commission does not operate under clearly drawn legislative standards. I submit that this is incorrect. It is our belief that the standards drawn by the Parole Commission Act of 1976 in 18 U.S.C. 4206 are extremely clear, particularly when read in light of the conference committee report. It is noted that these standards are quite similar to those enunciated in S. 1437, except that rehabilitation is not mentioned in the Parole Commission Reorganization Act.

Let me turn to the guidelines themselves. From experience with our system, we know that the guidelines are a valuable tool; we also know that even with a small staff of 36 hearing examiners supervised by five regional commissioners and a three-member National Appeals Board, there can be considerable differences in guideline interpretations; and if training and review is not constant and ongoing, considerable disparity even with guidelines can occur.

Moreover, Parole Commission staff devotes full-time effort to the setting of prison terms, and decisionmaking is by two-member panel. Sentencing, and particularly the imposition of prison terms, is but a minute portion of the Federal judge's role. Last year, there were roughly 12,000 prison terms imposed by 398 judges, an average of 30 per judge in the entire year.

It is our belief that even with the most sophisticated guidelines, there remains considerable potential for disparity in relation to actual prison terms in their application by 400 Federal judges—and I am told that an increase to over 500 judges with the new legislation may be forthcoming.

Moreover, we do not believe that appellate review by 11 circuit courts, divided into numerous panels and already overworked, would be the best vehicle for insuring the consistency required. That is why even with valuable sentencing guidelines, it is our view, the role of a smaller full-time body—whose primary duty is to fix prison terms—needs to be maintained.

I believe this was explicitly stated by Dean Gottfredson and Professor von Hirsch in their testimony before this committee and alluded to by other committee witnesses who have testified that abolition of the Parole Commission at this stage would not be wise.

This role has also been recognized in recent legislation passed in Oregon, which creates a Joint Parole—Sentencing Commission on Prison Terms. Under this Oregon legislation, judges and parole board members will combine to provide guidelines for prison terms.

The judiciary will decide whether or not to impose a prison sentence and if so, its maximum length. The parole board, a small full-time body, which like the Federal Parole Commission, is already using guidelines, will set the actual prison term.

Moreover, to provide determinacy and reduce uncertainty, the Oregon Parole Board will be required by law—as it already does by administrative rule—to tell the prisoner within 6 months of commitment of his presumptive release date—contingent upon good conduct.

The second primary function of the Parole Commission under present statutes relates to the sanctioning of institutional disciplinary infractions and thus, to the maintenance of institutional order.

In 1976 the Congress stated:

It is the intent of the Conferees that the Parole Commission reach a judgment on the institutional behavior of each prospective parolee. It is the view of the Conferees that understanding by the prisoner of the importance of his institutional behavior is crucial to the maintenance of safe and orderly prisons.

It would appear that this function would become even more critical with the proposed elimination of good time in S. 1437. Although it has been suggested by Mr. Carlson that restriction of internal privileges, combined with good time loss of 10 percent of the total sentence would be insufficient to maintain institutional order, this has not been empirically tested.

Moreover, it must be recognized that elimination of the Parole Commission from this task would simply transfer the power from a limited number of specialized decisionmakers to numerous disciplinary committees in 38 Federal institutions, plus numerous additional community treatment centers and State contract facilities.

The U.S. Parole Commission's experience in observing Bureau of Prison disciplinary actions and good time allocation in the course of parole hearings, unfortunately, has pointed up considerable disparities from institution to institution. The type of institution and philosophy of the warden heading it seems to be a significant factor in determining whether a certain action is disciplined or good time lost.

Even if all prisoners within an institution are treated similarly, the difference between institutions is too great to permit a return to the pre-Parole Board days when the Bureau and its wardens totally determined who was paroled and when. It is to be remembered that disparity is not related solely to the matter of sentence length, but if left unchecked can affect any criminal justice decision.

Moreover, it might be recalled that in 1930, all parole decisionmaking, which had previously been under institutional control, was removed to a small full-time decisionmaking body, such as the Parole Board, partially to correct such problems and to reduce the possibility that prior release, by whatever method it is called, parole or good time, would be tied too closely to institutional considerations or institutional needs.

Under any system, from time to time, powers which may be placed under the general heading of clemency need to be exercised. For example, serious medical problems such as terminal cancer or heart disease; exceptional meritorious acts within the institution; or even changes of public perception of offenses may require such action—reduced perception of the seriousness of marijuana offenses.

Again, the Parole Commission provides an efficient vehicle for the required exercise of this discretion. For example, when the Congress repealed the mandatory sentencing provisions of the Harrison Narcotics Act, the approximately 600 cases were efficiently processed. Cost of transportation alone for resentencing would have been extremely high, not to mention judicial time involved.

In the other situations mentioned, the remedy of pardon as a practical matter would often be overly cumbersome or time consuming.

As with disciplinary infractions, merely turning the function over to individual institutional officials would not likely result in uniform and consistent policy as provided by a more specialized body.

S. 1437 provides in the proposed 18 U.S.C. 2303 that a sentence of a term of imprisonment, in the case of a felony or a class A misdemeanor carries an automatic post-sentence parole term. These terms of post-sentence parole are fixed under the proposed 18 U.S.C. 3834(b) and I assume are to follow the expiration of the service of the regular sentence imposed.

Obviously, somebody must undertake this function. If the Parole Board was abolished and the court fixed the post-parole term, who would supervise the parolee? Who is to make the determination if a condition of parole is violated? Who is to make the decision of what to do with the parolee if it is found that the parole has been violated?

The U.S. Parole Commission, in the period from October 1975 to September 1976, conducted 1,560 institutional parole revocation hearings and 256 local revocation hearings, as well as made equal numbers of decisions relating to warrant issuance and findings of probable cause.

Absent a parole commission, this would simply be much more work for overburdened district courts and courts of appeal judges.

In summary, we believe that retention of the parole board—a small collegial body of decisionmakers which votes in panels—such as the sentencing panels which have for so long been advocated but rarely implemented, and devotes full time to these specialized tasks is essential to accomplish the primary aim of this legislative reform: That of providing equitable and just prison terms.

Specifically, we believe that:

1. The Parole Commission should be specifically authorized by statute to tell the prisoner early in his term of a presumptive release date, contingent upon good conduct:

2. That the period of permissible parole ineligibility—of up to 90 percent—specified in S. 1437 should be substantially reduced. Judge Lasker in his testimony has suggested retaining the present 33.3 percent—one-third;

3. That until substantial experience with the Sentencing Commission is developed, the Parole Commission should retain the power to establish its own regulations and guidelines, but as Judge Lasker suggested, the legislation should specify that the Parole and Sentencing Commissions should coordinate their activities; and

4. Now is the appropriate time for the President, Attorney General, and the Congress to call for a Third National Conference on Parole.

I might add that we have a number of additional suggestions of a more technical nature and I would ask that we be granted permission to submit them separately subsequent to this meeting.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection, that will be inserted in the record.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This concludes my formal statement. On behalf of the Commissioners on the U.S. Parole Commission, I wish to thank you for this opportunity to appear before the subcommittee and present the Commission's views.

I should be happy to answer any questions you might have.

Senator KENNEDY. I think that has been helpful. We will get a chance to examine your statement in detail. I think you have made interesting points here which we will have to examine and review. We will hear other comments but it is useful and helpful testimony. We are very grateful.

We thank you very much.

[The following letter from Commissioner Dorothy Parker was subsequently received:]

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
U.S. PAROLE COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C. June 20, 1977.

HON. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C., June 20, 1977.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: As suggested by you at today's hearings on the sentencing provisions of S. 1437, before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, which you chaired, I am submitting my personal views on the subject. These are solely my views and are not to be deemed those of my fellow-Commissioners on the U.S. Parole Commission nor of anyone else.

Nonetheless, based on my over 25 years of experience in the private practice of the law plus my five years with the Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; my six and one-half years of work on the Hill with the Senate Judiciary Committee and my eight months of experience serving as the only member of the U.S. Parole Commission confirmed under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act (P.L. 94-233), I appreciate this opportunity to voice certain suggestions for consideration by this Subcommittee in connection with one of the most important, if not the most important, aspect of the criminal justice process—the imposition of sentence and the method of selection of the type of sentence to be imposed, by whom and upon what conditions and based on what considerations.

The basic philosophical different I voiced today which made it impossible for me to support the views of the majority of the Commissioners on the U.S. Parole Commission is based on the difference in concept of the basis for determining incarcerated time to be served—i.e.: is it a judicial or executive function which the U.S. Parole Commission performs? My colleagues contend the function is executive in nature; I contend it is judicial.

Based upon the historical concept of parole, my colleagues, George Reed and William Amos<sup>1</sup> in an article in Federal Probation, 1972, pp. 16–18 entitled: "Improved Parole Decision-Making" supported the interpretation that "parole is a matter of 'grace' and not of 'right'" and that parole decision-making is "to the end that (a) the (Parole) Board will release from prison inmates who have arrived at the psychologically right period of maturation to be able to make a satisfactory community adjustment under parole supervision and that (b) the Board will better protect society by continuing to provide institutionalized treatment for the inmate who is not yet ready even under supervision to provide self-direction in an open society." (at p. 17).

The presentation for this Subcommittee argues the "history" of parole and that the U.S. Parole Commission's function under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act is executive in nature. That conclusion is only possible if the time of incarceration is determined upon the basis of the executive-sovereign's determination that the person involved is "rehabilitated" and therefore that as a matter of the sovereign's "grace" he should be released.

It is my contention that in fact under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act which became effective May 14, 1976, the Congress converted the U.S. Parole Commission into an agency mandated to fix the time of incarceration to be served by federal prisoners based upon the "nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the prisoner" (as enunciated in 18 U.S.C. 4206(a)). This, I suggest, is part of the judicial sentence fixing function and rightly is a judicial function. Hence, the U.S. Parole Commission belongs in the Judicial branch of the government, not the Executive.

In my opinion, neither I nor anyone under the present state of the art has the prescience to determine when a prisoner is "rehabilitated" so as to be released to the community. In recognition of this fact, nowhere in the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act is there mention of this concept of rehabilitation as a basis for prisoner release. To introduce the concept, I contend, flies in the face of the Congressional mandate expressed in the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act, P.L. 94-233, and the Congressional intention expressed in the Act and throughout its legislative history. See Conference Report, S. Report No. 94-648, wherein it is stated, at p. 26: "The parole-decision makers must weigh the concepts of general and special deterrence, retribution and punishment"—They talk of "fairness" and "just punishment," not of rehabilitation of the offender.

Eligibility for "parole" under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act is based on "the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the prisoner" and is granted solely when "release would not depreciate the seriousness of the offense or promote disrespect for law"; and when "release would not jeopardize the public welfare"; (18 U.S.C. 4206(a) (1) and (2)—and, nowhere is there mention of when the prisoner is "rehabilitated." As pointed out in 84 Yale Law Journal, 810, 814: "Although parole release decisions have been regarded as virtually autonomous from sentencing per se, parole is an integral part of the sentencing and correctional process." (Footnote omitted).

Accordingly, I suggest that the U.S. Parole Commission, as a sentencing body, should be renamed, taken out of the Department of Justice, and made a part of the Judicial Branch of the United States Government in recognition of the fact that it no longer performs an executive or at best quasi-judicial functions, but is and should be an integral part of the judicial sentencing process.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Reed is nearing his 20th year as a member of the Parole Board and as a Commissioner on the U.S. Parole Commission. Dr. Amos is serving his second term as a member of the Parole Board and as a Commissioner on the U.S. Parole Commission.

A. SUGGESTED GUIDELINE SYSTEM FOR S. 1437

For reasons which will be presently shown, the United States Sentencing Commission to be set up under Sec. 241 of S. 1437 to add Chapter 58, 28 U.S.C. 991, et seq., should, with the assistance of expert staff and consultants who have varied disciplines, develop guidelines for U.S. District Court Judges to apply in determining what penalty shall follow conviction of a federal offense.

Broadly viewed guidelines for use by Federal Judges should be developed by the Sentencing Commission. These guidelines should set forth according to specific standards whether in a particular type of case and for a particular kind of offender the punishment most likely to be effective is to be a fine and, if so, how much; a term of probation and, if so, for how long and subject to what conditions; an order of restitution and, if so, on what notice, in what amount and to whom payable; imprisonment and, if so, the reasons therefor and if the Judge so desires the suggested time he deems appropriate for the defendant to serve in incarceration; or any combination thereof.

It cannot be denied that one thing that is radically wrong with the present sentence fixing adjustments by the U.S. Parole Commission is that there is not adequate control over the sentencing process before it reaches the Commission.

As Mr. Pieree O'Donnell pointed out in his testimony before this Subcommittee on June 8, 1977:

"The most conspicuous and disconcerting disparity, Mr. Chairman, occurs when one person receives a prison sentence and another person committing the same crime and who we would consider to be similar in virtually all respects is placed on probation." (Testimony Transcript, June 8, 1977, at p. 44).

The guideline system envisioned for determination of the type of sentence to be imposed would radically reduce if not eliminate this type of dissimilarity in sentence. Then, if such broadly viewed guidelines outlined above when applied by the U.S. District Court Judges result in a judgment that imprisonment would be the fairest punishment, the Judge would fix the statutory sentence. Thereafter, the U.S. Parole Commission, under whatever name it is to be given, could apply its even-handedness predicated upon the expertise developed over the past five years by applying its different, supplemental and specific guidelines to determine, within the first 120 days or preferably within 60-90 days after incarceration, the presumptive term that would have to be served in a particular case and the reasons therefor, whether within the guidelines or above or below the guidelines. Of course, the rights of appeal now available under the Parole Commission regulations to the Regional Commissioner for reconsideration and to the National Appeals Board would and should remain available under such system.

Obviously, both the Judicial Sentencing Commission and the Parole Sentence-Fixing Commission or Commission on Federal Incarceration, as I prefer to call it, should work very closely in coordinating guidelines. Both guidelines, I am earnestly convinced, should be subject to the Administrative Procedures Act in their promulgation and further subject to the Congressional review contemplated under the proposed Sec. 994 (g) amendment to Chapter 58, Title 28, U.S. Code.

B. ADVANTAGES OF USE OF SMALL COLLEGIAL BODY VERSUS U.S. DISTRICT COURT JUDGES IN FIXING TIME OF INCARCERATION

The U.S. Parole Commission, as you are well aware, was the first agency to implement a guideline system for the determination of the range of time to be served for a particular offense behavior based on the characteristics of the offender. Deviations from the guidelines both above and below the range, of course, occur for good cause, with written reasons given in general terms for decisions within the guidelines and should be given with specificity if the decision is to go over or below the guideline range.

The guidelines were developed by a team of researchers in the field of criminology and related areas and were first tried on an experimental basis in 1972. The concept of a guideline model as thus developed was incorporated into P.L. 94-233 in 18 U.S.C. 4203(a) (1) wherein the Commission was expressly authorized to "promulgate rules and regulations establishing guidelines for the powers enumerated . . . and such other rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out a national parole policy and the purposes of this chapter. . . ." And, the enumerated powers of the Commission include the power to—

“(1) grant or deny an application or recommendation to parole any eligible prisoner ;

“(2) impose reasonable conditions on an order granting parole ;

“(3) modify or revoke an order paroling any eligible prisoner ; and

“(4) request probation officers and other individuals, organizations, and public or private agencies to perform such duties with respect to any parolee as the Commission deems necessary for maintaining proper supervision of and assistance to such parolees ;” * * * (18 U.S.C. 4203 (b) ).

Since the first pilot project nearly five years ago, parole release guidelines have been applied to nearly 40,000 Federal prisoners by the Commission's 36 Hearing Examiners and Commissioners, as well as previous Parole Board Members. Rehearings are mandated after 18 months and 24 months under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act depending on whether the sentence is less than or more than 7 years and also rehearings occur more frequently if release is likely in the interim.

1. Criteria for guidelines

The guideline considerations used by the Parole Commission and its precursor, the Parole Board, are quite similar to those set forth in Section 241 of S. 1437 as an amendment to 28 U.S. Code, Chapter 58, Sec. 994. Similar guideline considerations would be the basis upon which the proposed Sentencing Commission would formulate guidelines for probation, fine, imprisonment and parole ineligibility and for general policy statements regarding application of the guidelines or any other aspect of sentencing that would further the purposes set forth in 18 U.S.C. 101 (b). These purposes as set forth in S. 1437 are :

“(b) Prescribing appropriate sanctions for engaging in such conduct that will :

“(1) Deter such conduct ;

“(2) Protect the public from persons who engage in such conduct ;

“(3) Assure just punishment for such conduct ;

“(4) Promote the correction and rehabilitation of persons who engage in such conduct, * * *”

The U.S. Parole Commission based on its considerable practical experience with such guideline concept can attest to both its strengths and limitations. Sec. 994 (c) and (d) considerations should be the basis for determination of time to be served. More generalized guidelines should determine imposition of a prison term. The implementation as well as the formulations of the guidelines requires constant oversight in order to make the guidelines function properly and achieves the ends for which they were designed.

For example: (1) S. 1437 and the U.S. Parole Commission guidelines agree that “family ties and responsibilities” have great predictive value as a factor in predicting success on release. However, the Commissioners working with the guidelines soon discovered that meretricious relationships were springing up in almost every case. Family ties were predictive, but too subject to manipulation to be reliable, so this factor was eliminated from the salient factor score of the guidelines.

(2) S. 1437 and the U.S. Parole Commission guidelines agree that the defendant's “education” is a valid predictive factor in successful releases. Numerous complaints came from low income minority prisoners that it was discriminatory to deny them a point on their salient factor score because they had had to go to work at an early age and had no high school or college education. This appearance of unfairness was deemed by the Commissioners to be detrimental and this item was deleted, although it was a valid predictive factor for success on parole.

The statute should not freeze in items for inclusion in guidelines—and even more importantly, only a closely knit body such as the Commissioners on the Incarceration Commission could become aware of needed changes in guidelines, regardless of the predictive value of a particular item on the guideline's statutory laundry list.

Almost 400 U.S. District Court Judges working with guidelines when they try a criminal case and imposing an average of 30 prison terms a year will not be in a position to catch these “flaws” in the guidelines, let alone call them to the attention of a Sentencing Commission rapidly enough to make timely changes, which then have to be dispersed to all 398 or more U.S. District Court Judges and the new guidelines then uniformly implemented by this large body of U.S. District Court Judges.

2. Application of guidelines and discrepancy in punishment

The U.S. Parole Commission experience in having 36 Hearing Examiners and 8 Commissioners (there has never been a full complement of Commissioners) applying the guidelines has clearly shown that, in order to get uniformity in application, constant training and retraining and consistent supervision are absolutely indispensable.

It must be obvious that unless the Sentencing Commission in discharging its obligations under S. 1437 goes to a determinate sentence for each degree of each criminal offense, with specific add-ons for specific multiple offenses an impossible criminal offense, with specific add-ons for specific multiple offenses—an impossible combination and permutation—much must be left to the discretion of the person applying the guidelines.

Judges' time and training are too valuable to be diverted to any mechanical computation of guidelines to fix specific individual sentences. Absent such specificity in guidelines, 398 U.S. District Court Judges cannot be so trained and supervised as can less than 40 Hearing Examiners, whose recommendations are subject to review by the Regional Administrative Hearing Examiner and the Regional Commissioner and further subject to reconsideration by the Regional Commissioner and to review on appeal by the prisoner by the Commissioners constituting the three-member National Appeals Boards. It is only such closely knit, constantly supervised and consistently applied guidelines by the newly named Commission on Federal Incarcerations which will result in greater uniformity in decisions.

Discrepancy in sentence and fairness in sentencing will not and cannot, in my opinion, be solved by realistic guidelines applied by approximately 400 independent U.S. District Court Judges, each appointed for life, even with a statement of the reasons for the sentence and with an Appellate Court review under the proposed amendment of S. 1437 to 18 U.S.C. 3725 or the proposed amendment to Rule 35A of the Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Of course, the price of proper application of the guidelines by a small body, which I call the Commission on Federal Incarceration rather than the Parole Commission, to be sure of compliance with Congressional intent is constant and close oversight of such Commission. With such oversight it would be possible not only to assure the proper implementation of the statute but since the appointment of Commissioners is subject to Senate advice and consent, and they are limited by statute to a maximum of two six-year terms, it would be possible for the Senate to assure itself that each Commissioner is carrying out his function fully and in accordance with the statutory intent. Such control over judges appointed for life is not possible and might be, in my opinion, unwarranted in the exercise of their other judicial functions.

3. Recognized need for fixing of prison terms by small body on full-time basis

Judge Tyler, Judge Webster, Judge Lasker, Judge Frankel, Dean Gottfredson, Professor Schwartz and Professor Von Hirsh all have testified that abolition of the Parole Commission at this time would not be wise.

Recent Oregon legislation, following the model set by the U.S. Parole Commission, specifically provides for the setting of parole guidelines by a Council on Prison Terms consisting of 5 members of the Parole Board, 5 Circuit Court Judges and Legal Counsel to the Governor. Within six months of incarceration, the State Board of Parole is to set the date for release on parole, based on the guidelines and considering aggravating and mitigating circumstances and other factors. This date can be within or without the guidelines for good cause provided the reasons therefor are stated in writing. A final interview is had prior to release to review the release plan, the psychiatric report, if any, and the record during confinement, with a 3 month postponement if the parole plan is not adequate.

So, despite the present trend to downgrade or eliminate rehabilitation as a goal of imprisonment, many states, many criminal justice experts, including some who heretofore urged abolition of the Parole Commission, now recognize the need for sentence-term fixing by a small, collegial body, based on guidelines—the prototype of which is and has always been the U.S. Parole Commission.

4. Commission as buffer providing justice and flexibility

Public opinion, most legislatures and many criminologists call for long statutory terms of imprisonment for purposes of punishment and deterrence as well as a means of satisfying the community need for a "get-tough" policy on criminals. Yet, almost all, if not all, experts feel that certainty of punishment rather than length of period of incarceration would serve as a better deterrent to crime and thus afford greater protection to the public. Furthermore, it is frequently argued that rehabilitation of the criminal might better be achieved outside the prison system. Thus, justice can best be achieved by long statutory prison terms being set, long maximum terms being set by a judge when his guidelines call for incarceration and the Commission on Federal Incarceration (now the U.S. Parole Commission), based on guidelines and taking into consideration the offender and his background, the offense behavior and aggravating or mitigating circumstances, determining the time to be served which is fair under all the circumstances, with the type of uniformity in time to be served achievable only by a small body of full-time "experts" in sentencing.

Furthermore, present law recognizes that sentences imposed by a judge, who lives in the community, immediately after the heat of a trial are not necessarily the optimum sentences, affected as they are by community and emotional pressures. 18 U.S.C. 4205(b) (2) sentences now permit a judge to impose a long sentence—for public mollification—with the U.S. Parole Commission, away from the glare of the press and the emotions of the community being empowered to more even-handedly assess the offender, his offense behavior and the circumstances and, applying the sentencing guidelines now set forth in 28 C.F.R. 2.20, to fix the time to be served. As this could be done within the first 60–90 days of incarceration, certainty in sentence and greater fairness to all parties could be achieved.

S. 1437 has no provision for any such "cooling off" period. Immediately after trial, sentence would follow, according to guidelines, with a parole ineligibility of up to 90% a possibility. Emotion rather than reason could well be the basis of sentence, with fairness to the defendant and the calmer and better judgment of the community after a cooling-off period being ignored.

All too frequently, after a trial for a crime such as bank fraud, the community clamors for long term imprisonment of "the culprit." Within a few months and usually by the time the prisoner is scheduled for his initial (b) (2) parole hearing, the community has reverted to its old-time appraisal of the individual, who up until the time of the crime had been a pillar of society and the church but who yielded to certain pressures, and the Parole Commission files I have noted are filled with letters and petitions urging his early, if not immediate, release as by then the community has cooled down and, realizing he is never going to commit another offense, ceases to call for its pound of flesh.

Under the dictates of S. 1437 nothing could be done to effectuate the new community sense of justice. The Commission on Federal Incarceration on the other hand, as does the U.S. Parole Commission, could fix the prison term based on its guidelines, absent emotion.

Another situation arises when an offense behavior is no longer considered by the community to be as severe as it was at the time of sentencing. For example, when Congress repealed the mandatory sentencing provisions of the Harrison Narcotic Act, the 600 or so persons serving such mandatory terms were given hearings and efficiently processed by the U.S. Parole Commission.

Similarly, under the S. 1437 proposal to decriminalize for Federal purposes the possession of under 10 grams of marihuana, an offender serving a long term for such offense could have his sentence reduced at his next parole hearing, under new guidelines. However, even if Section 1813(a) of S. 1437 were to be enacted, no such flexibility would exist absent a Commission on Federal Incarceration.

While Section 2302(c) (1) does provide for court modification of a term of imprisonment upon motion of the Director of the Bureau of Prisons for "extraordinary and compelling reasons," that is not an-as-easily available remedy and at best would further burden over-burdened courts with more cases.

Nor is a pardon the answer to either changes in law or in circumstances. This remedy is too long drawn out. The average case takes well over a year for consideration by the Pardon Attorney and requires Presidential action—a much too cumbersome procedure to remedy emergency situations or where the concept of the severity of a crime has changed.

Neither alternate remedy to Commission action is a better answer to the need for flexibility in sentence should an emergency situation, such as the prisoner's health warranting release, etc., require humanitarian action.

Only a Commission on Federal Incarceration in its application of its frequently reviewed, reconsidered and revised guidelines could meet these needs for fairness and justice in time served by an individual.

5. Commission on Federal incarceration vs. Bureau of Prisons good time

S. 1437 rightly does not provide for good time. The U.S. Parole Commission's experience in reviewing Bureau of Prison disciplinary actions and good time allocation in the course of parole hearings, unfortunately, has pointed up wide discrepancies in the Bureau's revocation of good time and in disciplinary proceedings available in each institution. The type of institution and philosophy of the warden heading each institution seem to be the governing factors in determining whether a certain action is disciplined and good time lost or even if extra good time is awarded. Even if all prisoners within an institution are treated similarly, the difference between institutions is too great to permit a return to the pre-Parole Board days when the Bureau of Prisons and its wardens determined who was released on parole and when.

Giving the Bureau of Prisons indirect control of release time by re-introducing good time, above and beyond the 90% parole ineligibility term, would be a giant step backwards—and might even be a great temptation to unwarranted, early release of prisoners by the Bureau so as to make "beds" available especially in view of the overcrowded conditions in Federal prisons. It would be a horrible situation if such improper early release were to result from the need for facilities—a consideration which does not enter into parole consideration and could not enter into a Commission on Federal Incarceration consideration of whether or not a prisoner should be released.

Director Carlson of the Bureau of Prisons in his testimony before this Subcommittee supported the elimination of good time, but only if the parole provisions of Subchapter D of Chapter 38 of S. 1437 were retained. If not, he advocated the scaling down of the maximum penalties and the retention of good time, at least for long term offenders, since offenders must have "some 'light' at the end of the tunnel." If such "light" is necessary, its control should not be transferred from the U.S. Parole Commission successor agency, the Commission on Federal Incarceration, back to the Bureau of Prisons where it reposed prior to the 1930's when a Parole Board was set up to get away from Bureau of Prison's control of such "light."

6. Plea-bargained cases

There is one more area in which I should like to suggest to this Subcommittee that there is an absolute need for Parole Commission or Commission on Federal Incarceration action. In cases in which there is plea-bargaining and a sentence is agreed to or not objected to by the attorney for the Government, 18 U.S.C. 3725(a) (2) and (3) of S. 1437 deny the right of appeal to either the defendant or the Government. Similarly, Rule 11(e) (3) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure provides for the embodiment in the judgment and sentence of the disposition provided for in the plea agreement.

Concededly, the U.S. Attorney must have the right to determine for what crime he will seek an indictment and for what crime he will accept a plea and agree to fix a sentence. However, experience shows that in some areas and with some U.S. District Court Judges and some U.S. Attorneys, sentences are inordinately long or too short for the actual total offense behavior and offender. While the U.S. Parole Commission can do nothing with a sentence below its guidelines even when in the Commission's judgment there are no reasons for going below the guidelines, the Commission can and does, independently, determine how much of a "too long" sentence is actually to be served, all or only a part thereof depending on the circumstances and guidelines. This procedure, while imperfect because of too many, too short plea-bargained sentences, does bring some uniformity and some fairness into an otherwise impossible to oversee plea-bargained situation. And, with all due respect to the ability of the legal profession, all too frequently lawyers appointed by the Court pursuant to the provisions of the Sixth Amendment, often inexperienced in criminal procedures, tend, even in their plea-bargaining, not to be able to achieve for their client all that an experienced criminal lawyer can negotiate in the way of a sentence. The U.S. Parole Commission is a great leveler in this respect as would be its successor, the Commission on Federal Incarcerations, by whatever name it is called.

7. Post sentence parole and parole revocation proceedings

S. 1437 provides in the proposed 18 U.S.C. 2303 that a sentence of a term of imprisonment in the case of a felony or a Class A misdemeanor carries an automatic post-sentence parole term. These terms of post-sentence parole are fixed under the proposed 18 U.S.C. 3834(b) and I assume are to follow the expiration of the service of the regular sentence imposed pursuant to Sec. 2301(b) and the parole ineligibility period of Sec. 2301(e). Obviously, the U.S. Parole Commission or an agency taking over its functions is needed and must be in existence to parole an inmate under Sec. 3834(a) and to impose a parole term.

But more importantly, even if the Court in the initial sentence fixed the post-parole term, who would supervise the parolee? Who is to make the determination if a condition of parole has been violated? Who is to make the decision of what to do with the parolee if it is found that parole has been violated?

The U.S. Parole Commission in the period from October, 1975 to September, 1976 conducted 1560 institutional parole revocation hearings and 256 local revocation hearings, all held after an interview and determination that probable cause existed to hold a parolee for the parole revocation hearing. It was then determined by the Commission whether to revoke parole or not; if it was revoked, whether or not to allow street time and whether to reparole or incarcerate the individual. If the decision was to incarcerate, the time to be served had to be computed according to the U.S. Parole Commission guidelines. All action, of course, is subject to the review procedure of the Commission.

Absent a U.S. Parole Commission or its successor, this would be that much more work for overburdened U.S. District Court and U.S. Courts of Appeals Judges.

8. Operation of U.S. Parole Commission, misconceptions and suggested changes in modus operandi

The U.S. Parole Commission performs its sentence-fixing function through five regional offices, each headed by a Regional Commissioner, with Central Office support. Hearing Examiners, in pairs, many of whom have a Master's Degree in Criminology or the Social Sciences, go into Federal and State prisons and conduct parole hearings of Federal prisoners incarcerated therein. The Hearing Summary and Recommendations are then reviewed by the Regional Administrative Hearing Officer and the Regional Commissioner. If the inmate is dissatisfied with the decision, he has a right to appeal to the Regional Commissioner for reconsideration and then, he has a further right of appeal to the three-member National Appeals Board in Washington. All parole proceedings are conducted in accordance with the regulations and guidelines promulgated by the U.S. Parole Commission and published in the Federal Register pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Act.

The Parole Commission has been experimenting for the past year with two projects wherein release dates were fixed early in the sentence. One project was in the Western Region and one in the Federal institution at Butner, North Carolina. It was determined by the Commissioners that the detriment, if any, to the prison system discipline resulting from the early fixing of the release dates was so small that it was far outweighed by the benefits to prisoners obtained from their knowledge with certainty as to what is their release date early into their terms of incarceration (subject to change only if institutional behavior or other unusual circumstances so warranted). Hence, at the last Commission meeting in May, 1977, it was determined, subject to public comment, to initiate a system of fixing presumptive parole dates of inmates at the initial hearing, within 120 days of reception of the inmate at a Federal institution. This proposed procedural change was published as a Proposed Rule in 42 Federal Register, No. 112, at page 29934, on June 10, 1977, as required by the Administrative Procedure Act.

Were a Commission on Federal Incarceration to take over the sentence-fixing and revocation functions of the U.S. Parole Commission, I would suggest the elimination of all regional offices. It is my opinion that Commissioners based in Washington, able to constantly communicate with each other, would be better able to formulate policy than is presently the case with a Commission whose Commissioners are scattered throughout the country. One Commissioner is located in Atlanta, another in Philadelphia, another in Dallas, another in Kansas City and a fifth in Burlingame, California respectively, and 3 Commissioners and the Chairman are in Washington, D.C.

A pool of 36 Hearing Examiners and supporting pre- and post-release analysts all located in Washington, D.C. would be much more effective in making decisions in constantly changing panels of two examiners than 6, 7 or 8 hearing examiners located in 5 regions. Combinations of these examiners should be shuffled and reshuffled to assure independent decision-making and to prevent building up of any buddy system within the examiner corps or with institutions.

I strongly urge that the Commission on Federal Incarceration hearings, in the interest of fairness and openness, should be open to the public and exempt from the Privacy Act, except for the limitations imposed under Rule 32(c) (3) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure. Most serious consideration should be given to having the attorney who represented the defendant at trial also appear for the inmate at the Commission hearings, especially the initial hearing at which the time to be served is to be fixed. And, in going to such type of hearing, consideration should be given to the use of Administrative Law Judges to conduct institutional hearings, with the decisions as to time to be served made by the present Hearing Examiners, Regional Commissioners and with a National Appeals Board review.

In passing, it should be noted that throughout these hearings, I have heard much which may indicate a failure, deliberately or unwittingly, to understand the effect of S. 1437 on sentencing and parole generally.

For example: The Manson case was mentioned: a case in which imposition of a 1433-year sentence by a Texas jury was mentioned as means of getting a prisoner to serve a longer sentence. Both are State cases and would obviously be unaffected by any change in Federal sentencing-parole procedures.

While the Federal system has and will continue to influence, and hopefully, lead the States in better implementation of the criminal justice system, Federal law is no sinecure for the states' actions. Each state will have to evolve its own method of sentence imposition and determination of time of actual incarceration—and, if any should turn out to be an improvement over the Federal method, hopefully, that would be adopted by the Commission on Federal Incarceration or whatever the successor to the U.S. Parole Commission is called.

C. RECOMMENDATIONS

With this background and based upon the considerations outlined above, to wit: the attainment of greater uniformity throughout the United States in sentences served by Federal offenders taking into account the particular offender and the offense behavior; the need for close and constant watch over the guideline use-development so as readily to make necessary revisions therein; the need for even-handed, dispassionate sentencing and flexibility in adjusting sentence time to reflect individual changes in circumstances (including hopefully, the "rehabilitated offender") and in law; the need for keeping human hope alive in the breast of the human being incarcerated in Federal prisons; the need for evening-out of plea-bargained sentences and post-sentence parole fixing and parole revocation and based on the experience obtained from implementation of sentence-fixing guidelines, I urge the Subcommittee consider:

1. The setting up of a Sentencing Commission by the Judicial Conference which, with the assistance of any and all expert staff and consultants, will develop guidelines for Federal Judges for use in determining whether to impose a sanction after conviction of a particular crime and under what circumstances and whether the sanction be (1) fine and if so, how much; (2) probation and if so, for how long and under what conditions; (3) imprisonment and if so, the reasons therefor; (4) restitution and if so, how much and to whom; or (5) any combination thereof.

2. The renaming of the present U.S. Parole Commission to reflect its sentence-fixing function and its transfer to the Judicial Branch of the Government so as to make its location within the Government structure coincide with its actual functions. For example: I have used the nomenclature: Commission on Federal Incarceration.

3. The guidelines and regulations promulgated by both Commissions should be coordinated with each other, promulgated under the Administrative Procedures Act and subject to being reported to the Congress. They should become effective 180 days after each Commission reports them, unless within that time one House of Congress votes to disapprove them.

4. The location of the Commission on Federal Incarceration, or whatever the successor to the U.S. Parole Commission is called, should be a Washington-based operation, with all hearings open to the public and exempted from the Privacy Act, except for the limitations imposed under Rule 32(c)(3) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure. A prisoner should be represented by his trial attorney at the initial hearing, and thereafter if he so desires but in that case at the expense of the prisoner, unless the Commission determines that in the interest of justice such representation is required. Hearings should be conducted by Administrative Law Judges, though not necessarily subject to the Administrative Procedure Act practice, with the determination of time to be served or whether or not a prisoner is to be reincarcerated for a violation of parole and if so for how long being made by Commission Hearing Examiners who have training and a developed expertise in making such determinations, subject to the review by a Regional Commissioner and also subject to appeal by the prisoner to the National Appeals Board, whose decision is final.

I appreciate your affording me this opportunity to again work with and submit my views to a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee.

Respectfully yours,

DOROTHY PARKER,
Commissioner.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
U.S. PAROLE COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., June 21, 1977.

HON. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: Pursuant to your invitation yesterday to Curtis Crawford, Acting Chairman of the United States Parole Commission, when you granted his request to have further documents presented for the record, I am forwarding you and the other members of the subcommittee, now conducting hearings on Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977, Senate Bill 1437, a copy of a speech titled "Probation and Parole Better Protect Society" which I gave at the Houghton College's Community Forum on Prison Reform on March 16, 1977.

I was appointed by President Dwight David Eisenhower in 1953 and have had the honor of serving as Chairman or Vice Chairman of the United States Parole Commission (formerly United States Board of Parole) for 16 of the past 24 years. I have served under both the Republican and Democratic Party administrations including the honor of serving under your brother, the late Robert F. Kennedy when he was Attorney General of the United States.

I believe that the enclosed speech should be made a part of the record of your subcommittee and carefully read to understand the tremendous contribution which some three years of research and operating under the new guidelines for nearly four years has been made by the United States Parole Commission in improving the administration of criminal justice at the federal level.

I have read and have carefully studied Senate Bill 1437 which you and Senator McClellan introduced into the United States Senate, May 2, 1977, before the First Session of the 95th Congress, under Title I, Codification, Revision and Reform of Title 18 U.S. Penal Code. During the past twenty-five years no one has decried the disparity in sentencing as practiced by the federal courts of this Nation more than I. I applaud the efforts of Senator McClellan and you in attempting to reduce disparity in sentencing through Senate Bill 1437. However, I must admit in all candor that I believe in our efforts to reduce disparity in sentencing under the proposed act we may be diminishing other areas of the Federal Criminal Justice System which could result in the setting back the criminal justice system unless some modifications are made in the Bill as it is constituted. I fully support the concept of a sentencing commission using the enormous experience which the United States Parole Commission has had in developing highly predictive salient factor scores as well as guidelines in sentencing. However, unless the United States Parole Commission is permitted to continue its seven years of research and programing under this program, great harm can be done to convicted felons under the federal system in determining what shall happen to the inmate once he is convicted by the sentencing court. Thus, it is an imperative that the United States Parole Commission exercise its highly predictive salient factor scores and guidelines and be carefully attuned to the sentencing guidelines as the Parole Commission continues to administer the sentence including providing a certainty of fairness and equity to the inmate.

The sentencing judge and the proposed sentencing commission would have information only at the time of sentencing and, in view of the fact that 85 percent of all federal offenders are convicted on a plea of guilty and only 15 percent appear before the sentencing judge during trial, the court or the sentencing commission would have very little information upon which to make a proper decision, while the United States Parole Commission has greater after-the-fact knowledge as we apply the highly predictive salient factor scores and the guidelines to those offenders who are responsive to the treatment program within the institution and, despite some academia testimony to the contrary, there are still inmates in federal institutions who are being rehabilitated in 1977.

The harsh determinate sentences equally punish the situational offender, youth offender, and the immature offender who emotionally matures during his incarceration with the "hard-nosed, aggressive and dangerous offender." The latter will continue to be a threat to society for a long period of time and for the best protection of the public should be incarcerated for a vastly longer period of time than the situational, youth or immature offender who could safely be released at a relatively earlier period after diagnosis and treatment within the institutional setting and will benefit by a period of parole supervision in the community.

As the conclusion of my speech indicates empirical research shows that studies completed by the United States Parole Commission possesses the assistance of an implicit policy that has been made explicit through an analysis of individual case decisions. Judgments on offense severity, parole risks, predictive power of the salient factor scores, and individual performance were found to account for most of the variants in parole decisions (Peter Hoffman—1972). Accordingly, "guidelines" were developed to combine the dimensions as a statement of operational policy.

The United States Parole Commission's statistical research highlights covering October 1974–September 1976, a statistical review of how the Commission is functioning after three years of research and now four years operating under the guidelines and highly predictive salient factor scores are most encouraging in improved parole decision-making of the United States Parole Commission. The study includes as follows:

"(A) Total numbers of parole or re-parole grants (all sentence types) show that the Federal Parole Commission granted 57.1 percent of all inmates eligible for parole during this time frame.

"(B) Recidivism—(1) Adult Offenders under supervision at beginning of time frame, violation warrants with a two year follow-up of paroles granted in 1970 show that 79.9 percent succeeded. Paroles granted in 1972 with two year follow-up showed a success rate of 86.1 percent. (2) Youth offenders released in 1970 show a success rate of 65.1 percent while youths released with two-year follow-up show a 70.1 percent success. (3) Mandatory Releases—(not granted parole) after a two year follow-up show a success rate of only 68.8 percent for those released in 1970.

"CONCLUSION

"I. Parole as administered by the United States Parole Commission better protects society by releasing more inmates from prison, 57.1 percent, while because of empirical research which has been operational for the three past years, it shows that in 1972, 86.1 percent of all adult prisoners granted parole succeeded under adequate parole supervision in the community, while prisoners released without parole in 1970 only 68.8 percent succeeded over the two year follow-up period. Thus, prisoners granted parole in 1972 had a 20 percent better success rate than prisoners released in 1970 under mandatory release.

"II. With crime in increasing at a frightening rate of 15 percent last year and threatening the safety and security of every American citizen, including the private enterprise system and an orderly society, it is imperative that we improve our criminal justice system. While we build more and more prisons to house the dangerous offenders, an improved parole system better protects the community, the tax dollar, the citizen, and our beloved America."

I believe that our three years of empirical research under the auspices of the best researchers in this Nation resulted in the Congress only last year passing Public Law 94-223, Parole Commission and Reorganization Act, establishing vastly improved procedures for implementing the improved parole decision-making process.

The United States Parole Commission is continuing a re-evaluation of the Commission's empirical research which developed the salient factor scores and guidelines and a "blue ribbon" panel composed of the following will supervise the re-evaluation study. Distinguished members of this panel are: Hon. A. Leon Higginbotham, District Court Judge in Philadelphia; Judge Cornelia Kennedy, Northern District of Illinois; and, representing the academic community, Dr. Herbert Solomon, Director of Industrial Research, Stanford University, and Dr. Marvin E. Wolfgang, Director of Criminology, University of Pennsylvania, and Dr. Charles Wellford of the Attorney General's research and development staff, Department of Justice, as well as Parole Commissioner Joseph A. Nardoza and myself.

If I can be of any further assistance to you, your subcommittee, or your staff in coordinating the above listed suggestions, please be assured of my willingness to do so.

Very sincerely yours,

GEORGE J. REED,
Chairman, National Appeals Board.

PROBATION AND PAROLE BETTER PROTECT SOCIETY

By George J. Reed, Vice Chairman, United States Parole Commission, presented at Houghton College's Community Forum on Prison Reform, Houghton, N.Y., March 16, 1977

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, it is indeed a real personal privilege to be back on a college campus that is not only quiet, but which has thoughtful students, sincerely and scholarly preparing themselves to make a contribution to our homes, communities and our beloved America.

It is most appropriate that Houghton College, located so near to the Attica State Prison where the tragedy of "The Attica Uprising" occurred a few years ago, should be promoting a "Community Forum on Prison Reform." I am honored to share this program with the Warden of the Attica State Prison and appreciate his earlier remarks on "Prison as an Alternative."

Before discussing "Alternatives to Prison" I feel compelled to take a brief look at some of the causative Factors that are contributing to the "lawless society" in which we live in America today. Last week, the Nation's Capital was almost paralyzed when some four dozen Hanafi Muslim black gunmen took 125 citizens hostage in three downtown locations, representing what was called by the News media a "Holy War", between warring factions of Black Muslim militant groups and other religious and cultural groups. One man was killed, a City Councilman shot and seriously injured and reportedly some two dozen innocent unsuspecting citizens were beaten and mistreated for some 39 hours by their captors. Taking hostages by disturbed individuals and revolutionary groups appears to be rapidly increasing in this country and around the world.

When some of our national leaders, including "Watergate" defendants, State Governors, States Attorney's Generals, Mayors, Judges, and Members of Congress are being sent to prison for violating the laws of the land, it is little wonder that concerned citizens are beginning to ask "Why?" When Daniel Elsborg becomes a national hero for turning over "classified material" to the news media to print and distribute for not only United States citizens to read, but made available to our potential enemies, we have somehow confused the right of the individual to know as against the Nation's ability to operate a viable intelligence system to protect this Nation's security.

The foundations of our society, culture and national greatness has, during the history of this Nation, relied upon the integrity of the American monogomistic home. Today 50% of all marriages end in divorce. It's the chic and the growing popular practice for couples to live together, produce children and split when things become difficult or the responsibility of feeding, providing a home and love for the children become too much of a drag. Thus, we are today producing unloved, undisciplined, emotionally rejected children, who cry out for someone to care enough to provide physical and emotional security during infancy, pre-adolescent and adolescent years. When their basic emotional needs are denied them at all socioeconomic levels of society, we produce emotionally blunted children and youth who are turning at an ever increasing rate to alcoholics, drug users and pushers and from there into a life of crime and violence.

The frightening rise of an ever more powerful organized crime, casts a shadow over our land. They buy, pressure or "wipe out" all opposition as the web of their influence weakens our political, business and labor leaders until the fabric of our entire society stands in danger. In some of our large cities you cannot buy, sell or get a job without a payoff to organized crime.

Turning now to the debate over "Prison Reform" in America, it goes without saying that, while prison reform is necessary, a reformed society is a greater need. No sooner had the debate over rehabilitation surfaced and become center stage, than prison populations began to grow and grow and grow. The overcrowding of all our correctional institutions is the one problem that is bearing down hardest on penal administrators at this moment. The Federal prison system and every State system, with the exception of California, experienced a sharp rise in prison populations during 1976. The overall total of inmates in our Nation's penal institutions rose from 249,500 to 255,800 or 11 percent increase during the course of 1975 and continued to rise at a higher rate during 1976. Serious crime increased 17 percent during 1974, another 10 percent during 1975 and continues to grow in 1976 and 1977.

Factors overlooked in predicting prison populations included the failure to note that the peak of the World War II babies would enter the 20-30 age bracket during the 1970's. As you know, this is the age group that accounts for most of the Nation's adult crime.

All community based programs were thought to greatly influence prison populations, but the use of community based programs has its strengths as well as its weaknesses. Such programs as deferred prosecution as used by the federal courts on a very select group of first time offenders has been relatively successful. Well trained and adequately staffed probation departments capable of making full use of community resources have a very good track record. I question seriously whether the public will stand for any expansion at this time. The Federal and State community treatment centers have provided an excellent program for offenders who have been granted a parole but providing for a 6 months period to depressure his prison experience gradually get reacquainted with his family, community, and secure a job compatible with his vocation training in the institution. The drug treatment community centers, including regular urinalysis tests and counseling, have scored well in aiding the drug user to kick the habit.

Federal parole statutes, as interpreted by the federal courts over a period of many years, made it plain that parole was a matter of "grace" and "not of right." Thus, the courts at that time indicated that "Parole is left to the informed discretion of the Parole Board". It soon became apparent that Parole Board decisions, operating under such a broad discretion, became more of a "gut reaction" than an "informed discretion."<sup>1</sup> In 1969 the Federal Courts began looking over the shoulders of prisons, parole and probation administrators, to insure that decision makers in the criminal justice system developed a more scientific procedure to (a) Improved Parole Decision Making (b) Provide for better structured equity, and (c) Improved Prediction Devices, and (d) Appeal Procedures.

THE PROJECT

In 1969 as Chairman of the United States Board of Parole I presented to Attorney General John Mitchell a very comprehensive and costly research design titled "Improved Parole Decision Making." The project and $500,000 were approved for a three-year research project. The project was directed by two of the most distinguished scholars in the field of research in the criminal justice field, Dr. Donald M. Gottfredson, Dean of the School of Criminal Justice, Rutgers University, and learned British scholar, Professor Leslie Wilkins of the University of New York, and an outstanding research staff.

GOALS

Goals included: (1) the definition of paroling decisions, objectives, alternatives, and information needs; (2) the measurement of relationships between offender information and parole objectives; (3) the development and testing of "experience tables"; (4) the development and demonstration of procedures for rapid retrieval of relevant objective information; and (5) the assessment of the utility of the procedures developed.

UNIQUE RESEARCH PROJECT

This project was unique because it provided for the first time the ability through the miracle of modern computers to update the old parole predictions tables data to current sociological factors (salient factors) that are truly predictive of potential success or failure of a federal prisoner, should the United States Parole Commission (formerly United States Board of Parole) grant or deny parole. Another first in this project that no other research program had ever been able to achieve is individual case follow-up over a period of five years after release on parole or mandatory release. No other research project had ever been able to follow up on the individual case because they got lost. The Federal Bureau of Investigation, with the approval of the late F.B.I. Director J. Edgar Hoover, agreed to furnish the United States Parole Commission and the research project a "rap sheet" that has allowed the project and this Commission to know exactly what happens to every parolee or mandatory releasee released from a federal prison for a period of five years after release. Critics of parole have for years been throwing around wild statistics on the success or failure of the parole system with no real research or facts to back up their criticism. This no longer can be tolerated by the United States Parole Commission.

Controversy has recently surfaced over the structure and effectiveness of parole. The suggestion of abolishing parole is complex, and debate on its relative merits has often been devoid of empirical research data pertinent to the uninformed and unrealistic deductions drawn.

The first criticism focuses primarily on concern for Equity. It includes arguments that paroling decisions are arbitrary or capricious, or reflects the exercise of unfettered discretion without established boundaries.<sup>2</sup>

A second popular theme involves the effectiveness of treatment. There appears to be a growing disenchantment with the concept of rehabilitation, a cry for abolishment of the "treatment medical model myth" and a return to a punishment philosophy—renamed as "just desserts". David Fogel of the Illinois Law Enforcement Commission loudly preaches and supports an act to provide determinate sentencing with additional penalties for repeat offenders.<sup>3</sup> Dr. Fogel's "Justice Model for Corrections" would reverse the hands of justice by more than 100 years and would, under the determinate sentence, equally punish the situational offender and the immature offender who emotionally matures during his incarceration with the hard nosed, dangerous offender who is a real threat to society and should be incarcerated for a much longer period of time than the situational or immature offender who could safely be released at a relatively early date.

Research studies completed by the United States Parole Commission show the existence of an implicit policy that could be made explicit through an analysis of individual case decisions. Judgments on offense severity, parole risk, predictive power of the salient factor scores, and individual performance were found to account for most of the variance in paroling decisions (Hoffman, 1972). Accordingly, "Guidelines" were developed to combine the dimensions as a statement of operational policy. The Commission has been operational under the guidelines for some three years and each report vindicates the predictive power of the Federal Parole Commission's guidelines.<sup>4</sup>

Since 1965 Uniform Parole Reports have been collecting data on parolees released in the United States. The project currently has parole performance information on approximately 250,000 males and females with one, two and three year follow-up. The Uniform Parole reports on a national basis and shows that cohorts released each year from 1968 through 1974 with one year follow-up or until parole supervision was terminated. Of the 1974 cohorts 82 percent continued on parole. They had a return to prison rate of 14 percent; technical violations accounted for 9 percent, and new major convictions were 5 percent.

In the United States Parole Commission's Statistical Highlights covering October 1974-September 1976, a statistical review of how the Commission is functioning after three years of research and now three years operating under the Guidelines and salient factor predictive devices in the administration of the federal parole system.

(A) Total numbers of parole or re-parole grants (all sentence types) show that the Federal Parole Commission granted parole to 57.1 percent of all inmates eligible for parole during this time frame.

(B) Recidivism—Adult offenders under supervision at beginning of time frame, violation warrants with a two year follow-up of paroles granted in 1970 show that 79.9 percent succeeded. Paroled granted in 1972 with two year follow-up showed a success rate of 86.1 percent. (2) Youth offenders released in 1970 show a success rate of 65.1 percent while youths released with two year follow-up show a 70.1 percent success. (3) Mandatory releases—(Not granted parole) after a two year follow-up show a success rate of only 68.8 percent for those released in 1970.

Conclusion:

I. Parole as administered by the United States Parole Commission better protects society by releasing more inmates from prison, 57.1 percent, while because of imperical research which has been operational for the three past years, it shows that in 1972—86.1 percent of all adult prisoners granted parole succeeded under adequate parole supervision in the community, while prisoners released without parole in 1970 only 68.8 percent succeeded over the two year follow-up period. Thus, prisoners granted parole in 1972 had a 20 percent better success rate than prisoners released in 1970 under mandatory release.

II. With crime increasing at a frightening rate of 15 percent last year and threatening the safety and security of every American citizen, including the private enterprise system and an orderly society, it is imperative that we improve our criminal justice system. While we build more and more prisons to house the dangerous offenders, an improved parole system better protects the community, the tax dollar, the citizen and our beloved America.

Senator KENNEDY. I will ask Professor Dershowitz if he would be good enough to come next. We will ask Mr. Shattuck of the ACLU to follow Mr. Dershowitz, who has to catch a plane and return to Cambridge.

I want to welcome Professor Dershowitz. He has been extremely helpful to this committee over the years, and particularly over the last year, in helping us to deal with an extremely complex, difficult assignment—the recodification of the criminal code. His suggestions have been of enormous value to us. His guidance in these areas is highly regarded by myself and other members of this committee. We look forward to his testimony on this legislation.

I will ask him after his testimony, or even during the testimony, if he has some reaction to the last proposal about how we might deal with sentencing.

But we welcome you here.

Please proceed.

STATEMENT OF ALAN DERSHOWITZ, HARVARD LAW SCHOOL

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

When S. 1 was originally launched, I was strongly opposed to its enactment, as were many of my colleagues. It was in tone, in spirit, and in substance simply too prosecutorial in its orientation. At a time of contracting constitutional safeguards by the courts, many of us felt that enactment of this kind of legislation by Congress would not achieve an appropriate balance between the legitimate needs of law enforcement and the equally legitimate needs of our society to treat those accused of crime with justice and compassion.

Over the past months, however, as you have indicated, I have had the privilege of working with this committee and suggesting certain changes and responding to the suggested changes of others. I think the process has been an extremely useful and valuable one. We have seen input from a great many sources in an attempt to depoliticize the process and to achieve a code which has both scholarly acceptability and acceptability to the wide spectrum of political views and law-enforcement views and needs reflected in this country. The process is still an ongoing one as evidenced by these hearings and as evidenced by the fact that so many different and interesting views have been brought to the attention of this committee.

At this point, I would now, on balance favor the enactment of the criminal code reform, especially if certain additional changes, each of which I think is entirely reasonable, and none of which I think is earth shaking or tremendously controversial, could be considered and possibly added.

I will speak to some of these possible changes at the end of my testimony, but I did want to devote the substance of my remarks to the sentencing provisions which have been under discussion today.

I have a prepared statement which I would like to have incorporated in the record. I will only briefly summarize the views on sentencing that are reflected therein, and also add to my views in response to some of the statements previously made, particularly relating to the possible abolition of the Parole Commission.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection, your statement will be inserted in the record at this point.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PROFESSOR ALAN DERSHOWITZ

The sentencing provisions of the proposed Federal Criminal Code are, in my view, the most significant aspect of this important bill. Indeed, they may well constitute the most enduring and far reaching criminal law reform of this century.

Judge Marvin E. Frankel, a leading judicial authority on sentencing, has recently observed that "the imposition of sentence is probably the most critical point in our system of administering criminal justice." I need not belabor the obvious significance of the sentencing function: the criminal defendant may at that point be poised between life and death, freedom or confinement, short or long imprisonment. Moreover, sentencing may be the sole instance of judicial decisionmaking in the criminal justice process for many criminal defendants, since the vast majority of criminal cases are disposed of without a trial.

Despite these high stakes, sentencing is in most jurisdictions essentially lawless: judges are furnished few guidelines and are accountable in most circumstances to no higher authority. Defendants charged with identical crimes in virtually identical circumstances may receive stunningly disparate sentences. In one recent study, fifty federal trial judges were given twenty identical files, drawn from actual cases, and asked to indicate the sentence they would impose on each defendant. In a case of possession of barbiturates with intent to distribute, one judge gave the defendant five years in prison, while another put him on probation. A middle-aged union official convicted on several counts of extortionate credit transactions was sentenced by one judge to 20 years in prison and a $65,000 fine, and by another judge to 3 years imprisonment with no fine. Factors such as race, personal appearance, and dress have repeatedly been shown to significantly influence the sentencing process, usually to the detriment of minorities and the poor.

These disparities cannot be explained by reference to relevant differences among criminals. They are—to quote Judge Frankel once again—more often a function “of the wide spectrums of character, bias, neurosis and daily vagary encountered among occupants of the trial bench.” Release decisions made by parole boards also reflect the personal inclinations of the boards’ members.

It is not surprising, then, that recent years have seen a gathering wave of criticism from all sides of the political spectrum against sentencing systems which rely heavily on the idiosyncracies of individual judges or parole officials. The proposed sentencing provisions reflect these criticisms and the virtually unanimous view that the time has come to establish a new and significantly more just sentencing structure. The creation of a system of rational, consistent, and comparable punishments for comparable criminal activities is mandated by our commitment to equal justice, by the necessity of maintaining public respect for the law’s impartiality, and by the hope that increased certainty in punishment will enhance the deterrent impact of the criminal sanction.

A number of proposals for supplanting the present system of wide judicial and parole board discretion with legislatively fixed sentences have gained recent attention. Two of the most prominent of these are the concepts of “flat-time sentencing” and “mandatory minimum sentencing.”

Flat-time sentencing has several variations. In its most extreme form it means that the legislature defines one single sentence for each crime or degree of crime: that term is imposed by the judge in every case and is served in full, with the only possible reduction being for “good time” or by executing commutation in an extraordinary case. Former President Ford added his voice to those supporting this system in his 1975 message to Congress on crime, in which he stated that “it may be time to give serious study to the concept of so-called flat-time sentencing in the Federal law,” as a means for eliminating “wide disparities in sentencing for essentially equivalent offenses.” As an alternative to indeterminate sentencing, this proposal has gathered wide-ranging support. Jessica Mitford, whose book Kind and Unusual Punishment declares that prisons are intrinsically evil and ought eventually to be abolished, prefers flat-time to indeterminate sentencing. Likewise, The Prisoners’ Union, a national organization controlled and staffed by ex-convicts, has made “the abolishment of the indeterminate sentence and all its ramifications” its primary object. The Union is supported in this drive by Evelle Younger, California’s attorney general, and by many other law-enforcement officials dissatisfied with the operation of indeterminate sentencing.

However, it is my view and the view of many others that this kind of flat-time sentencing is simply too extreme a remedy: by eliminating all flexibility and requiring judges to impose the identical sentence on every single defendant convicted under the same statute, flat-time sentencing threatens to create a system so automatic that it will produce major injustices of its own. It is simply impossible to devise a single just sentence for all armed robbers, burglars, or first-degree murderers. Some degree of flexibility, both at the sentencing and parole stage, must remain in order for the system to maintain credibility.

Under another variation of flat-time sentencing, the sentencing judge would retain his discretion to impose any sentence within the legislatively prescribed range, but whatever sentence he selects would be imposed as “flat-time”. This variation eliminates the discretion of the parole board, but retains the discretion of the sentencing judge.

Mandatory minimum sentencing, the half-brother of flat-time sentencing, simply eliminates all discretion to go below a certain sentence which must be served for a given crime, regardless of the circumstances. Massachusetts, for example, has a mandatory one-year sentence for unlicensed possession of a gun; New York has one for certain drug crimes. But there are a number of problems with this approach as well. First of all, it deals with only discretion at the minimum end of the statutory spectrum, and not with discretion at the maximum end. It addresses only the floor—not the house itself, or the ceiling. Further, there is mounting evidence that rigidly fixed sentences do not work: ways are found to circumvent them by prosecutors, judges, and juries. In Massachusetts, for example, judges have contrived reasons for freeing otherwise “law-abiding” citizens who have run afoul of the strict gun-control law. In states with a mandatory death penalty for murder, prosecutors are reducing charges and juries are returning “manslaughter” verdicts in cases where the death penalty is deemed inappropriate. Thus it is clear that discretion finds its way into the law’s operation, whether exercised by prosecutor, judge, or jury.

My personal preference is for a system which I call "presumptive sentencing", a system which was proposed by the Task Force on Criminal Sentencing of the 20th Century Fund for which I was the reporter. To a greater extent than either flat-time or mandatory minimum sentencing, presumptive sentencing seeks to steer a delicate course between the Scylla of glaring disparity and the Charybdis of inflexible equality in sentencing.

Presumptive sentencing entails the specification by the legislature of not only the minimum and maximum sentence for a given crime, but of what the fairly typical first offender convicted under the statute should receive. For example, most armed robberies are committed by unmarried males in their early 20's who never finished high school and have been unemployed for more than a year. The robbery typically consists of an entry into a local store late at night with a loaded pistol. The store clerk and a few customers are frightened but not otherwise injured, and the robber takes several hundred dollars. Taking these factors into consideration, the presumptive sentence for a first offender might be set at, say, two years. The presence of legislatively specified mitigating or aggravating circumstances could be used by the trial judge to raise or lower the presumptive sentence: to raise it, for example, in the case of the robber who terrorizes his elderly victims by cocking a pistol held at their heads; to lower it in the case of the robber who nervously uses a toy gun in a desperate attempt to rob enough money to pay for his child's operation. So, too, prior convictions would increase the presumptive sentence by a specified percentage, perhaps 25%. On appeal, there would be a presumption against any departure from the range of presumptive sentences, which would at once pressure sentencing judges to remain within the presumptive range and yet leave them some needed flexibility to go outside it in truly extraordinary cases.

As may be clear to you by now, my position is basically in accord with that set forth in the sentencing provisions of S. 1437, with some reservations. The system of presumptive sentencing which I sketched earlier is a schematic one, and I would like to note some of the instances in which I believe this bill departs from that model.

First of all, I applaud the innovative step taken by the creation of a Sentencing Commission to develop Guidelines for the use of judges and the Parole Commission. As noted previously, the absence of meaningful guidelines has contributed to the glaring disparity in sentences meted out by different judges for comparable crimes. I welcome this development, however, with serious concern for the composition of the Commission, which is to be appointed by the Judicial Conference of the United States. I would hope and expect that the nine members of this Commission would be suitably familiar with the problems involved in sentencing, and that such expertise will be the sole basis for appointment.

The promulgation of Guidelines leads me to hope that the Commission will not set the range of presumptive sentences higher than is necessary. That is a danger which lurks in systems that focus on the atypical offender—the particularly heinous criminal—and one which I hope may be avoided.

The American Civil Liberties Union has criticized the maximum authorized terms set forth in this bill as being far too high; I would join in that criticism, especially if those maximums came to play a substantial part in establishing the range of presumptive sentences. If indeed the maximum is designated as the extreme to which a judge may go in the extraordinary case, my concerns would be reduced. But I would certainly object to a presumptive sentencing range which approached the maximums provided for, or indeed, one which was set even at the mid-point between the minima and the maxima established by the provisions of the Proposed Code. In short, it is important that these maxima not serve as the basis or even as a guideline for the presumptive sentence range. The value of the presumptive sentencing procedure lies in its ability both to provide certainty and fairness by placing the vast majority of similar crimes within a narrow range of sentences, and to provide the flexibility necessary to deal with extraordinarily different crimes of the same genre by reaching either above or below this range. Consequently it is not necessary, and would be a mistake, to set the range too high; if aggravating circumstances are present the trial judge may deal with the sentence accordingly. But once having established a range, the tendency of judges—and properly so—will be to place nearly all defendants convicted of that particular crime within that range. Thus it is imperative that the fear of "letting him off easy" not be allowed to drive up the range to unnecessary heights, thereby inordinately penalizing the average defendant. Therefore, the range must be kept narrow and low, and reliance placed on judicial discretion to go beyond it when circumstances so dictate. Moreover, I must emphasize that if the range is set too high, it simply will not work. History has taught us that we pay for every increase in severity by a decrease in certainty, and that certainty is far more important than severity in reducing crime.

It would be a sure sign of failure of the proposed sentencing system if it resulted in more total person-days of imprisonment; its goal is to improve the justice and effectiveness of sentencing without creating more imprisonment—without requiring additional prisons. This admirable goal is achievable only if we have the courage to keep presumptive sentences at a reasonable level of severity, while increasing the certainty that the vast majority of convicted serious criminals will receive some serious punishment.

I also favor the provision in this proposed code [§ 2003(b)] compelling the court to state, at the time of sentencing and in open court, the general reasons for its imposition of the particular sentence, and particularly of the obligation to set forth the reasons for any sentence outside the presumptive range. However, I would prefer that there be a presumption in favor of a sentence within the applicable range, an element which is not explicitly provided for at present. Also in the realm of sentencing review, I am troubled by the provision [§ 3725 (a)(1)] denying a felony defendant review of a sentence higher than the maximum established in the Guidelines if “the sentence is consistent with policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(2).” I believe that any sentence outside the presumptive range should be appealable of right; to allow a policy statement of the Commission to provide a justification for denying review threatens to undermine the impact of the presumptive range. The central function of the Commission is to create such ranges in order to infuse a greater degree of certainty into sentencing, and subsequent policy statements susceptible of varying interpretations should not be warrant for overriding this purpose without review.

I should note, also, my objections to this bill’s mandatory sentencing provisions, particularly as to trafficking in an opiate [§ 1811], and, to a lesser degree, to the use of weapons in the commission of a crime [§ 1823]. Again, mandatory sentences address the problem of discretion only at the minimum end of the spectrum: the floor and not the entire house, and are in any case incapable of truly impartial enforcement.

In sum, I would stress again my belief that the time has now come for greater certainty and uniformity in sentencing, a principle which I believe may be furthered by the proper employment of a system of presumptive sentencing such as this bill contemplates. I think the creation of a Sentencing Commission is an important step in the necessary move to rein in the untrammelled discretion of judges and parole boards. But I caution that the Commission must remain aloof from pressures which would disserve these goals; its function is to narrow the permissible range of sentence in all but the extraordinary cases. If it chooses to set the range high in response to external pressures, it will have frittered away an unusual opportunity for truly significant reform of our criminal justice system.

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. In my view, and one of the reasons I now favor the enactment of this bill, is that the sentencing provisions of the proposed criminal code are, I think, the most significant aspect of this important codification.

Indeed, I would go so far as to say that these sentencing provisions may very well constitute the most enduring and far-reaching criminal law reform of this century. That may sound grandiose, but I think in light of the important role that sentencing plays in the criminal justice system of this country, and in light of the fact that so little attention has been paid to it in the past, a systematic new approach to sentencing, which incorporates considerations of fairness and equity, as well as efficiency, can make the major difference in our approach to crime.

As I point out in my prepared statement, the imposition of sentence, not only is the most important aspect of the criminal justice system, but for a great many defendants, it may indeed be the only judicial aspect of our criminal justice system, since the vast majority of criminal defendants do not have an actual trial. Their "trial" is the sentencing proceeding itself. Although in recent years there has been a great deal more attention devoted to this process of sentencing, it is one which has been considerably neglected by legislatures throughout the country, and also by scholars. I think we academics have to take responsibility as well. It should be no surprise that the lack of guidelines and the lack of law on the issue of sentencing, has enured primarily to the disadvantage of the poor, the disadvantaged of other minorities who suffer grievously from the lack of equity.

The statistics are appalling. I need not quote them here. They have been quoted repeatedly, indicating that both in Federal and State courts, when both the crime and the previous history of the offender are held equal, black and minority offenders fare considerably worse in discretionary sentencing by judges than I think they would under the proposals that are being considered today.

As Judge Frankel, who has testified here, indicates: These disparities simply cannot be explained by reference to differences; that is, relative differences among the criminals charged and convicted. They are primarily a function of the different views felt and expressed by different judges.

As indicated in the prior testimony, perhaps there will be 500 judges and when one considers the number of State judges who impose sentences today, the amount of disparity is simply staggering.

I will not go into the studies that have been made. They have been alluded to by previous witnesses.

I think this committee can take as a given—I do not think there is any dispute about that—that sentencing disparity in this country is rampant and that virtually everybody, regardless of their view on criminal justice, wants to see change in the system reduction of disparity.

The only remaining dispute really is how much we narrow the existing disparity. Should we opt for fairly radical provisions such as flat time sentencing provisions which require the judge to impose a single sentence and require the defendant to serve it? Should we opt for the kind of flat time sentencing provisions which enable the judge to select from a wide range of legislatively prescribed sentences, but whatever sentence he picks is a flat time sentence; that is, must be served in full?

That kind of flat time sentencing is simply an abolition of parole. It does not address the problem of disparity at the judicial level; indeed, the disparity would probably be fare worse because I think the prior witness is correct when he points out that the Parole Board does serve, in its own way, the function of reducing disparity.

Indeed, one of the original functions of parole, when enacted in this country, was to reduce the disparity of sentencing. Historically, parole comes just at about the time when legislatively fixed sentences are on the way out.

One centralized parole agency, whether in the Federal Government or in the State, simply by the very nature of the fact that it is a small cohesive group, will have less disparity than several hundred judges operating around the country.

Perhaps at this point it would be appropriate to address myself to the remarks made by the previous witnesses because I think they make a telling argument, but one which ultimately I think misses the point of the appropriate function of parole in our society.

The argument is simply this. It is a tautology: The more you centralize sentencing, the less the disparity will be. If you have 10 people deciding on sentencing, there will be less disparity than if you have 500 people. It does not matter whether the 10 people are judges or parole officials. If you had a system whereby 10 judges in the United States were to determine, one a full-time basis, all of the sentences for the Federal defendants, then there would be considerably less disparity. There would be 10 points of view. They would be acting collectively and, therefore, even the 10 points of view would tend to be compressed into perhaps only one or two or three points of view.

So, I think there is some truth, necessarily, to the fact that the more you centralize sentencing, the more equality there will be and also perhaps the more rigidity there will be. There is always that trade-off.

As I think the last witness was candid to acknowledge that it has nothing really to do with the passage of time, whether it be the four weeks or the years that may come between the judicial imposition of sentencing and the parole amelioration of that sentencing. The time is not the factor, and the personnel is not the factor. It does not matter whether they are judges or parole officials.

It is just that the fewer there are, the more centralization and the less disparity there will be.

That is not, however, an argument for the retention of parole. It is perhaps an argument for some kind of centralization of sentencing. It may very well be that since we have an existing parole board, and since in the area of criminal law reform, one does not like to move in great leaps—one likes to move incrementally—that there might be an argument for retaining this function for a limited period of time as a kind of phasing out process.

I, myself, favor the retention of some kind of parole authority precisely for the kinds of cases that the last witness alluded to at the end of his testimony. There are going to be special circumstances that arise during the course of the prisoner serving his sentence. Whether they be considerations of illness, or whether they be considerations of safety, or whether they be unique educational opportunities, or whether, despite Martinson's studies, there is the rare defendant who truly is rehabilitated, then there are going to be certain factors which come into operation during the course of the prison sentence.

For that reason, I personally would like to see more authority retained for a small amount of discretion to be handled in individualized cases, but not a discretion to determine the actual sentence.

For example, it seems to me a person who is sentenced to serve two years, and that two-year sentence expires in November, and he has a rare educational opportunity that begins in September, and that educational opportunity was not known or could not have been known to the sentencing judge, or a rare work opportunity, then it seems to me there is every reason for allowing the group of experts—not to make policy or broad determinations as to what this person deserves—but to make technical expert decisions involving the need to fit the precise and tailored punishment to this person's individual needs.

That, I think, does not conflict with the basic thrust underlying the sentencing proposal suggested here. It seems to me that it fits exactly into the spirit of what this committee, I think, is doing, which is, that it is not seeking to adopt an academic model. It is seeking to adopt a practical compromise which steers the delicate course between the Scylla and Charybdis of much too inflexible flat-time sentencing and much too discretionary indeterminate sentencing.

Every good piece of legislation in that respect involves compromises. The job of the academic is to create models, not to suggest compromises. I, for one, would not want this committee to adopt the kinds of models that I personally have suggested in the academic literature. I do not have the background and the knowledge to know how that is going to operate in the real world of politics. That is the job of the committee. That is the job of the Congress.

For that reason I strongly favor the modification that has been made by this committee of the presumptive sentencing suggestions I have made in an academic setting.

Let me speak to those briefly for one moment.

Before I do that, let me return to one point on parole before I forget it.

I think it is extremely important the decision whether to abolish the Parole Board be made in absolutely practical terms with a cautious eye toward seeing what its real impact will be on the duration of sentences.

If the abolition of the Parole Board results in people serving far more time than they currently serve, then that would be a failure. If the Parole Board is going to be abolished, or phased out, or changed in its function, or converted from a major policy making organization to an expert technical organization, then the presumptive sentences, or the guideline sentences, have to be reduced accordingly to reflect the fact that under existing approaches, a sentence of five years is seen by everybody in the process as really a sentence of two years.

What we cannot tolerate is the situation where sentencing remains the same and where the parole reduction is eliminated, and the net result is to build far more prisons than are needed and to keep far more people in jail for longer periods of time.

Now let me turn briefly to presumptive sentencing and how I think it is very well incorporated into this bill. The idea of presumptive sentencing is that instead of legislators only deciding what the worse criminal would get, that is, the maximum, and what the best criminal gets, that is, the minimum, the legislature, or somebody delegated by the legislature, has the responsibility to determine what the typical average offender will get.

I know we do not like to hear words like "typical average offenders". It is kind of demeaning. It is insulting. Everybody is different. There is no typical average offender, just as there is no typical average law student or applicant for admission.

But really there are. When one looks at the data, one finds that the average armed robbery, for example, is committed by somebody who fits into relatively narrow circumstances.

I will not go into the circumstances here. They are outlined in my prepared testimony. But many armed robbers are amazingly similar.

Even if they are really different and even if their souls and hearts are different, these are not the considerations that judges take into account in sentencing.

Judges, in fact, take into account only a small number of factors which this committee is fully capable of articulating and fully capable of assigning weight to, or at least articulating and having a commission assign weight to.

So the idea of presumptive sentencing is to shift back to the legislature the responsibility for determining what typical offenders should get for typical first offenses.

At the same time, presumptive sentencing does not surrender to the temptation of having one sentence for every crime. We simply do not have the human capability of knowing in advance every factor that will operate in a given crime on a given defendant.

The vast majority of criminals, who are fairly typical by definition, should receive a fairly typical sentence, articulated in advance by some group, whether it be a committee or commission, but some group designated by Congress.

But there is flexibility for any judge to use the judicial ability for which he has been selected to that important position on the bench. There is the factor of discretion in unusual situations. In presumptive sentencing you build that in by calling the sentence "presumptive", that is, we are to presume that the sentence will fall into a narrow range, but if the judge has good reasons which he can articulate for taking the sentence outside of that range, then he is encouraged to write those reasons out and to impose any sentence which Congress has specified within minimum-maximum range.

The proposal suggested in this bill is somewhat different in detail, but in purpose and effect, they are very similar. What it basically does is it says there should be a commission, "hopefully of experts", as part of the judicial system of this country so as to avoid problems of separation of powers and to give the judiciary what the judiciary essentially is entitled to do under the Constitution, which is to fit the punishment to the particular crime.

So there will be a judicial body. That body will set out presumptive ranges. They are not called presumptive, but in effect—

Senator KENNEDY. What about the makeup of that panel? There have been those that have suggested that it be more representative and not just judicial. What about that?

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. I am concerned that the body not be a political body in the sense of not being a body that is immediately responsive to some of the baser instincts that people in this country temporarily feel when there is a crimewave or when there is concern about increasing crime. I think it would be independent and insulated, but nonetheless ultimately responsible.

If we could know in advance what kinds of people would serve on the Commission, I think we would have a better opportunity to know whether a judicial appointed Commission would be better than, let us say, a mixed Commission.

I am satisfied, personally, with the judicially selected Commission, so long as the message is clear to the judicial conference that what is sought is expertise and what is sought is a wide range of views and what is sought is insulation from the immediate pressures. One, of course, has to have some degree of hope and faith that the commission will be appointed in that spirit.

There is no guarantee. I think the American Civil Liberties Union has a point when it says that we have to hold back ultimate decisions about whether or not this is going to work until we see what kinds of people are appointed to the Commission and what kinds of guidelines they actually set out.

I, for one, think the judicial conference probably is as good an appointing body as one can come up with.

Senator KENNEDY. Should it be just judges?

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. Oh, no. I would not think the people appointed to the Commission should be just judges. I would hope there would be some judges and that there would be some experts. I would hope that they would reflect the wide and rich diversity ethnically and in terms of gender and race that we have in this country. I would think it should reflect a wide spectrum of views. I think it should, with all due respect, include some academics and experts, either in staff capacities or in Commission capacities.

But it should not consist—and I do not think the bill indicates—that it should consist entirely of judges. I think that would be a mistake. I think the problem would be that judges might turn out to be somewhat too protective of the judicial prerogative and somewhat too anxious, conscientiously or unconscientiously, to preserve an existing status quo and not to act in areas which might be seen as criticism of their colleagues and brothers on the bench.

I think it is tremendously important that this body, however it is constituted, understand that it would be absolutely gutting the purposes of this legislation were it to set the presumptive sentences very high and were it to take a one-sided prosecutorial point of view, on the appropriate range of sentencing. I am not arguing that point as a civil libertarian, which I am. I am not arguing that point in terms of sentimentality for criminal defendants. I want to make this point as, I think, somewhat as an expert in this field.

History has taught us that we pay for every increase in severity by a decrease in certainty. Moreover, certainty is far more important than severity in reducing crime. It is not just a matter of muscle flexing. If you set presumptive sentencing high, judges and prosecutors and defense attorneys and the system will find ways around that kind of presumptive high sentencing.

Evidence comes from our own State, Senator, where there was a 1-year mandatory minimum imposed for gun possession. Without taking into account the diversity of factors under which a person might find himself possessing a gun, consider the extreme case of somebody from New Hampshire legally having a gun, and chasing the kidnapper of his son across State lines, and being found in Massachusetts carrying that gun which he legally had in New Hampshire, no judge or prosecutor would tolerate sentencing that law-abiding person to a year in prison. That case actually occurred several months ago.

Ways are found around high sentences, whether they be called “mandatory” or “presumptive”. The system simply will not work unless we are willing to make a sacrifice of reducing what are somewhat higher sentences in the interest of buying greater certainty and the hope thereby of increasing both the fairness and efficiency of the system.

It would be a sure sign of failure of the proposed sentencing system if it resulted in more total person days of imprisonment than the current system. Its goal, one would hope, is to improve the justice and effectiveness of sentencing without creating many more imprisonment than currently exists and without requiring the building of any additional penitentiaries.

I think this admirable goal is achievable only if we have the courage of keeping presumptive sentences at a reasonable level of severity, while increasing the certainty that the vast majority of convicted criminals will receive some substantial punishment.

There is one detail of the sentencing bill that I did want to briefly address myself to, because I do disagree with it.

That is section 3725(a)(1). Maybe I misunderstand it, or maybe there is a policy decision there. It provides that there should be automatic review of sentencing anytime a sentence goes beyond the presumptive range.

But then it states one important exception that there would not be an appeal of sentencing, even if it went beyond the range, if it was, and I paraphrase, consistent with the policy guidelines of the Commission.

It seems to me that is simply too general. It simply gives the judge the power unequivocally and unilaterally to deny appellate review. All the judge has to do is impose a sentence outside the range and state that is consistent with the policy guidelines of the Commission. It does not even require him to explain the reason why he would do it or to justify it in any way.

Obviously, as a practical lawyer, it cannot work. If the judge states it is consistent with the policy guidelines, then the defense attorney certainly has the right to say that it is not consistent. Then you have an appeal as to whether there is a right to an appeal. That simply proliferates the problem.

Senator KENNEDY. We will change that.

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. Good. I am sorry to have taken the committee's time on that.

{Laughter.}

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. That is probably just a technical change.

I have really finished my remarks, I think, on the sentencing provisions which again, let me applaud you for and indicate how important I think they are. I do have certain other observations about changes I think would be warranted in the code if you want me to address myself briefly to that.

Senator KENNEDY. Go right ahead.

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. In the area of victimless crime, my own views, and the views of the ACLU are well known. I will not try to persuade this committee to adopt those views. The views are generally that victimless crimes should not be legislated, but again I will not speak to that.

What I will speak to is the very serious problem of federalism that I think exists in the current code as to two major provisions but, has been eliminated interestingly enough as to a third major provision. The problem is simply stated as follows.

The Federal Government may have very different views than certain States may have on the use of marihuana or the availability of sexually explicit material.

Certain areas of Michigan, for example, are experimenting, within the tradition of Brandeis' great laboratory concept with the decriminalization of marihuana. Iowa experimented and may still be doing it with the decriminalization of certain sexual explicit material not available to minors and not thrust on unconsenting adults.

For purposes of this testimony I do not think it is important for any of us to decide who is right and who is wrong or whether Michigan is more correct than its neighboring State, or whether Iowa is more correct than its neighboring State.

I think the important thing is that States should be entitled to experiment.

This bill does not enable States to experiment in a realistic way. What it says basically is that even though it is not illegal for somebody to possess a certain amount of marihuana in Michigan as a matter of State law, he still cannot possess it because it is illegal as a matter of Federal law.

Even though the citizens of Iowa are entitled to read certain magazines under State law, they may not be entitled to get those magazines under Federal law.

It seems to me that the provision of the code as it relates to prostitution in 1843(c), adopts a model which I think is appropriately a balance between the interests of States and the Federal Government.

It says there that if the matter is legal within the State, then it is a defense to a charge of Federal crime. I strongly urge that similar defenses be written in to all victimless crime provisions, particularly the sexually explicit material provision and the drug, particularly marihuana, and perhaps other "soft drug" provisions as well.

I think it gives the Federal Government what it is entitled to and it gives the State what they are entitled to, and most importantly, it gives the citizens of a particular State what they are entitled to. It is in keeping with the spirit of experimentation. It is in keeping with the appropriate Federal role which in this area, after all, is as an aid to State enforcement.

If you look at the legislative history behind these provisions, they are definitely designed as an aid to State enforcement. The Federal Government comes in and prosecutes those people who are involved in national distribution where the State may have a problem of prosecuting.

But it turns the problem on its head to say that the Federal Government may prosecute where the State does not want to prosecute.

Lest anybody feels this is hypothetical, let me alert you to a Supreme Court decision rendered, I think 2 weeks ago today, involving the State of Iowa where, in fact, somebody was prosecuted for Federal mail violations for sending allegedly obscene material within the State of Iowa. It did not even go out of the State of Iowa. The package was sent from somebody who sent it legally under State law to somebody who received it legally, and nonetheless the Federal Government came in and prosecuted. The Supreme Court, in a split decision, upheld, that provision.

But there is no obligation on Congress to enact a law permitting that kind of prosecution. The Supreme Court did not say that those kinds of statutes are mandatory or even desirable. All they said is that they are not so inconsistent with the constitution as to warrant invocation of the extraordinary remedy of declaring it unconstitutional.

SENATOR KENNEDY. I suppose the Federal Government ought to be using its resources in other areas anyway, shouldn't it?

MR. DERSHOWITZ. Yes; that is the more general argument, but certainly at least this potentially dangerous situation warrants a change.

Another change which I had hoped to see achieved and it had been under discussion, but I notice it has not been incorporated in the legislation, is the venue provisions of section 3311.

Under existing Federal law, anybody can be prosecuted for a Federal crime in the district where any minor aspect of the crime occurred, like even a letter sent through the mail.

The civil law, I think, has achieved a far more appropriate balance. It requires that in order for a case to be brought in the district, it is essential that that district has to have significant contracts and significant ties. It is discretionary. It gives a judge great power to determine where the case should be brought, but under existing Federal law, there is no power in the judge at all. The power lies exclusively in the prosecutor. It is not fair. It permits the prosecutor to take somebody from his home town and put him on trial in a district where he has never been in his life and where no part of the crime really took place, but where, as a result of the fortuities of mail, or the fortuities of the messenger service, venue happened to be found under these varied laws.

I would recommend a change in that area.

SENATOR KENNEDY. Yes. We are attempting to make some important adjustments on that. That is a good suggestion.

MR. DERSHOWITZ. One other area that I would again bring to your attention is this. I know it is controversial. It deals with oral false statements.

The existing law is no better than the proposed law because the existing law as well, is a shambles in this area.

As indicated previously, it is worse because it carries harsher penalties for making a statement not under oath under certain circumstances, than if the statement were made under oath.

There is certainly a legitimate interest in making certain oral statements criminal. An obvious example is any kind of a false alarm or any kind of a statement made to law enforcement officials which makes them divert their efforts from one direction to a false lead. Crying fire in a theater is appropriately criminal. There is a way of drafting the statute to legislate that without any ambiguity. What I am concerned about is the following situation.

A Federal agent walks over to a potential criminal defendant on the street and says, "Hey, I would like to talk with you about certain charges that have been leveled against you."

He says, "I am innocent. I did not do it."

By the terms of this statute, that very proclamation of innocence, which anybody, you would think under our American system, has the right to claim, could constitute a criminal act. After all, it is a false statement if, in fact, he is guilty. It is made to a law enforcement official. Even though he has not been warned about it, but he has volunteered that, and the voluntary aspect of it is very troublesome.

I can understand how the committee and the draftsmen made the mistake it did. They tried to use the concept of the Miranda warning. The Miranda warning does have an exception for voluntariness, but that is very different. He is not being charged with a crime for making that statement. The statement is true, and presumably because it was spontaneously uttered, and the needs that people feel about warnings do not exist in that situation. I would not argue with that, but the compelling need to warn somebody that what he is going to say in conversation may result in his being sentenced to a substantial amount of time, is so foreign to the typical American experience, that I think it requires more careful legislation than that contained in the proposed bill.

I think that most Americans understand that when you file a written statement, then you must tell the truth. I am not suggesting that we are dishonest. I am not suggesting that the lessons of Watergate tell us anything about the general morality of individuals.

But I think it is fair to say that Americans today do not think it is a crime to say something that turns out not to be true to somebody even if he is a law enforcement official.

When Congress seeks to move into an area which flies in the face of what I think are fairly deeply rooted common expectations, then they have to do it with extraordinary care. I think this statute does not reflect the kind of care that is required in this area.

There are other provisions with which I disagree. Hopefully, I will continue to be in touch with the committee, and I will provide continued suggestions, particularly as to certain technical changes that I think can be made.

I only want to highlight one more general area: The area of mental illness commitment. I think there have been some major improvements in existing law in the area. I think there is one suggestion that I would like to propose, which I think can also add a dimension of safety and security. Today if a person is found not guilty by reason of insanity, he can be sentenced indeterminately. Under the provisions of this bill, he can still be sentenced for an indeterminate period of time. I do not think that is consistent with the spirit of the sentencing provisions in the remainder of the code.

I think that one should think carefully about how to reconcile mental illness confinement with the presumptive sentence provision of the code. I think, in general, the absolute maximum that a person should be able to be held if he is found innocent of a crime on insanity grounds is the maximum he would have been held for if he were found guilty of that crime.

If he continues to be dangerous, of course, he can be civilly committed, whether by State or Federal authorities. But the fact of conviction of a crime, coupled with mental illness, should not be able to result in confinement for more than the maximum time. Indeed, it might be my suggestion that the committee ought to at least think about whether he should be able to be held for a time more than the presumptive range, before a new civil commitment proceeding could be instituted. There is literally no danger here. If we have one of the rare cases where a person continues to be dangerous, there are adequate civil commitment provisions.

But the remainder of that part of the code is a substantial improvement. As you know, the change from preponderance of the evidence, the civil standard, to clear and convincing evidence, I think, adequately reflects the difference between our society's feelings toward money, under which the civil standard of preponderance generally operates and feelings of liberty under which a higher standard, such as clear and convincing should operate.

So, I think that is an area where, although there are some changes that are needed, there is a general and considerable improvement.

I have one final summary statement.

I think the bill as a whole is a substantial improvement over existing law, in several respects: Codification in and of itself is a substantial improvement. I think also several important existing problems in the prior law have been changed.

Let me mention just one and make an argument that might not be apparent to this committee.

I have recently had extensive dealings with the Soviet Union on the issue of human rights. I participated recently in an international debate on human rights. I can tell you that in my discussions with the Soviet Union, they constantly focused on the Smith Act, saying, "Look, how can your President be so concerned with human rights in other parts of the world when you have a statute on your books under which you can go around prosecuting Communists for membership in the party?"

I was pleased to be able to say to them, "That is going to be changed." That, I think, is an important message sent out to the world community. I think several of the other changes that have been made are consistent, not only with the domestic concerns of this country, but with the new and important foreign policy initiative undertaken by President Carter in trying to bring a semblance of human rights to other countries in the world today.

We simply have to begin at home. I think this bill provides an important beginning, though by no means an ending point. I, for one, would continue my efforts, and I know colleagues will continue our efforts to see major improvements in the criminal code.

But this bill, I think, should be passed.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me just ask you how you reached the conclusion that this bill is a net gain in the area of the civil liberties of the American people.

Mr. DERSHOWITZ. It is a complicated process to decide that a bill, as long and as complex as this, achieves a net gain. I tried to use several criteria in my own mind. Is not codification an important net gain for civil liberties? I think the answers to that is clearly yes. It permits the citizenry to look to one place and find what its government is saying to them about crime. It provides much more adequate fair warning. It reduces discretion by prosecutors to charge under one provision rather than another for identical conduct. And it provides coherence. As Justice Black once said many years ago, "Tyrants in the old days used to write their criminal laws in print so fine or languages so strange that citizens could not read it."

Our existing criminal code was not quite written in that kind of obscurity, but in practice it provides almost as great an obstacle as a foreign tongue.

So, I think codification in and of itself has to be weighed heavily.

Second, I asked myself a question. Are there any civil liberties "horrors" in the bill? Are there any provisions which are so intolerable to the mind of a civil libertarian that the entire bill would not be worth the effort of enactment?

Although I can say I think there were some provisions in the old bill which could be reasonably categorized as fitting that definition, there are none in the existing bill. There are problems in the existing bill. There are areas where, if I had the last word, I would change them. They are provisions dealing with wiretaps and immunity and provisions where I think the balance has been struck somewhat to the disadvantage of those accused of crime.

But those are all within reasonable ranges of disagreement.

Moreover, in every such case, we see nothing worse than in existing law. When one combines major advantages in the area of sentencing and major advantages in the area of civil commitment and major advantages in the area of codification, and several other major advantages—for example, the decriminalization of small amounts of marijuana which will hopefully be followed over the years with increasing decriminalization—then that is a beginning and an important improvement. There are some important changes in the crimes of advocacy.

For example, eliminating the crimes of attempt of conspiracy and solicitation as they relate to certain forms of CORE political advocacy.

When one adds into the balance what one, I guess, could call perhaps a dozen major substantive civil libertarian changes, and one finds there are really no changes in the opposite direction, then the only criticism one can really make of the code—and it is an important criticism and one which I do not think should be downplayed—is the criticism of the ACLU that this committee did not seize the opportunity to make enough changes; that the committee did not seize the opportunity to structure a criminal code in a way so as to really achieve a model of balance.

One can join those criticisms and one can hope that eventually those kinds of changes will be seen. But at the same time one can support the bill which has moved us considerably along the lines of protection of civil liberties which has made other major changes and which has done so without the sacrifice of, I think, any major interests of the civil liberties community in relation to existing law.

Senator KENNEDY. I would say that in the areas you have identified, which are troublesome, we have a responsibility to attempt to make important changes.

The fact of the matter is that the issue of recodification has been before the committee for about 10 years. I think we are either going to try to make progress in a meaningful way along the lines you have outlined, or we will have nothing to show for it.

We thank you very much.

We will now hear from Mr. John Shattuck and Nancy Crisman of the American Civil Liberties Union.

We welcome you back.

STATEMENT OF JOHN SHATTUCK AND NANCY CRISMAN, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

Mr. SHATTUCK. It seems to me I have been here for 4 days now.

Mr. Chairman, as you know, the issue before this subcommittee has long been of great interest and concern to the American Civil Liberties Union.

I have submitted a lengthy statement for the record which covers a lot of territory. I will attempt to summarize the principal points in it.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection, your statement will appear in the record at this point.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ARYEH NEIER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR AND JOHN H. F. SHATTUCK, WASHINGTON OFFICE DIRECTOR, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

Mr. Chairman. We are pleased to be invited to appear before this Subcommittee on an issue of vital concern to the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU is a nationwide, nonpartisan organization of 275,000 members dedicated to protecting individual rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. One of the ACLU's primary missions is to encourage legislative advancement of civil liberties and to oppose legislative encroachment of them.

I. INTRODUCTION

An opportunity for comprehensive revision of the federal criminal code comes but once in a great many years. It is a moment to seize to put into practice a coherent approach to crime and punishment that concentrates law enforcement energies on the crimes against persons and property that plague Americans and that respects the limits on government power that are mandated by the United States Constitution.

The federal criminal law is significant both in its own right and in its potential to serve as a model for the criminal laws of the states. The American Civil Liberties Union approach to the process of criminal code revision is to attempt to insure that this vital legislation is not merely an improvement on what has gone before. If that is all that emerges from the deliberations of the Congress, we will count it as a setback for civil liberties because we know only too well that we are unlikely to have another opportunity for significant revision in the foreseeable future. Our approach is to seek the best criminal code that can be conceivably obtained. We are very well aware that the process of criminal code revision has already been underway for a decade and understand the impatience of those who seek to complete the process. We know that many compromises have taken place to arrive at the proposal that is now before you in S. 1437. We believe it is incumbent on us and on this Committee to look afresh at each provision of the law, regardless of the compromises that have been reached by its sponsors, in pursuit of a law that will serve us well for many years to come.

Before setting forth our views on particular provisions of the proposed legislation, we state some principles which should guide the Congress in its enactment of a new criminal code:

A. Criminal sanctions should be applied only to conduct that causes harm to others. The proscription of sin, or of consensual behavior in which no other person is victimized, is not a proper concern of the criminal law

Almost half of the approximately nine million arrests nationwide each year are for crimes that do not harm others: public drunkenness, possession of drugs for one's own use, consensual sex acts, vagrancy, loitering, obscenity, gambling and the status offenses committed by the young—running away, truancy, disobedience to parents, curfew violations and "incurability." The damage done by these arrests is incalculable. They criminalize millions of people. They punish people though no legitimate purpose is served by punishment. They consume a very large part of the time of our police, prosecutors, judges and defense attorneys. They jam the judicial process, and their presence in it is a major factor in making it necessary for matters that are the proper concern of the criminal courts to be disposed of through plea-bargaining. They account for about 60 percent of the population of our juvenile institutions, at a moment when there is a great outcry about violent crime by juveniles and not enough space to confine those convicted of such crimes; they account for about 40 percent of the population of local jails nationwide; and for about 10 percent of the population of our prisons. They stigmatize with arrest records many millions of persons who, thereby, find difficulty in finding employment and in integrating themselves into the mainstream of society. And they breed an intense disrespect for the criminal laws that is inimical to the very idea of a law abiding society.

In seeking to punish such conduct, the law does much more to create crime than to control it. At the same time, all parts of the machinery of law are so preoccupied with the crime thus created that they can deal effectively with little else.

As just one example of the misplaced emphasis of law enforcement energies, in the last few years there have been about the same number of arrests nationwide for all the major crimes of violence or threatened violence combined—murder, manslaughter, rape, robbery and aggravated assault—as for offenses involving marijuana. Americans are outraged by the shoddy way our police, prosecutors and courts deal with crimes of violence. The police are slow to respond to calls. No one has any time to inform witnesses of court adjournments. Violent criminals are allowed to plead to minor offenses. Would any of us care to face the victims of a violent crime and admit that these things came about because law enforcement officials were preoccupied with arresting, booking, jailing, prosecuting and judging a youngster charged with possession of marijuana? But admit it or not, that is one of the practical consequences of the criminalization of this drug. Then consider that marijuana counts for only 10 percent of the arrests for behavior that does not harm others. There are almost ten times as many arrests for victimless behavior as for crimes of violence or threatened violence.

B. The criminal laws must respect constitutional provisions, such as the guarantee of freedom of expression in the First Amendment, the guarantee of privacy in the Fourth Amendment and the guarantee of due process of law in the Fifth Amendment

It should be elementary, of course, that no law may be passed by Congress that that violates the provisions of the United States Constitution. There is no room here for compromises.

Many of the provisions of the present criminal law and the proposed criminal law attempt to place forms of speech outside the pale of constitutional protection. These include provisions dealing with conspiracy, solicitation, incitement, impairing, espionage, demonstrating and obscenity. In each instance, the ACLU has examined the provision to see whether it is speech itself that is punished—which is impermissible—or whether it is some form of conduct that may be legitimately prohibited by the government. In connection with some crimes—such as espionage—certain speech may be so closely brigaded with conduct that no separation can be made and a constitutional statute may prohibit it. In other instances, as in the case of obscenity, it is only a perjorative label that has been attached to speech. No conduct other than speech is involved and there should be no criminal sanction.

We approach in the same spirit provisions of the law which intrude on privacy, such as those maintaining authority for wiretapping or providing for the use in evidence of the products of illegal searches, and provisions of the law violating due process, such as those dealing with contempt and the compulsion of testimony. Again, there can be no compromise with constitutional standards. Nor do we think that the law enacted by Congress should go to the very brink of what the United States Supreme Court will tolerate before it declares a law unconstitutional. Where constitutional rights are at stake, it is unbecoming for the Congress of the United States to adopt a law with provisions drafted in the spirit of "How much can we get away with?"

Respect for constitutional provisions in the criminal law also requires machinery for enforcement of those provisions. This means punishment of those who would deprive others of rights directly guaranteed by the Constitution and rights guaranteed in implementing legislation. Government officials must recognize that they face punishment for violating individual rights.

C. A sentencing system must be devised that is fair and no more harsh than is absolutely necessary.

The present system of sentencing persons convicted of crimes is patently unfair. Much of it is a legacy of the belief that people should be punished for their own good so that they could be rehabilitated through isolation from society. It is a theory that has long since fallen into disrepute.

One of the consequences of the belief that people would be made better by punishment is that the authority to determine the length of punishment was shifted from judges to parole boards. Judges would only set the outer limits, while parole boards, which could evaluate a prisoner's rehabilitation, determined the actual length of sentences. The system has been a complete failure. Parole boards have shown no ability to determine rehabilitation. It is also grossly unfair. It makes the length of a sentence depend on behavior in prison, on reports on that behavior by guards, and on the prisoner's performance at a parole board hearing. The sentence for a crime, we believe, should be proportional to the crime committed. This means it should be fixed by a judge at trial who knows what crime has been committed and the aggravating circumstances or mitigating circumstances of the crime.

As study after study has shown, there are wide disparities in the sentences meted out by judges. This, too, is unfair. A sentence should not be dependent on the character traits, moods and whims of judges. Discretion in sentencing must be maintained because the nature and circumstances of each crime differ. It should be recognized that there is no such thing as a mandatory sentence. What is labelled mandatory sentencing merely shifts discretion out of the hands of judges into the hands of prosecutors who determine the charges to be brought. But, while judicial discretion is essential, it should be guided by the legislature. Aggravating and mitigating circumstances should be spelled out in law. This would reduce disparities in sentencing. Requiring judges to explain their sentencing on the record and to state which aggravating or mitigating circumstances influenced their sentences would further reduce disparities. It would also allow for appellate review of sentences. In the interests of fairness, such appeals should be a right of any defendant facing incarceration.

Sentencing reform also requires the elimination of unnecessary harshness. The death penalty is outright barbarous and should be abolished. Despite loud assertions to the contrary, and despite the public opinion polls showing support for the death penalty, this is something Americans have long recognized in practice. Only one American criminal—Gary Gilmore—has been legally executed in the last decade. Before that, executions were very few and far between. Even if capital punishment is resumed full force, no one expects more than 100 or 200 executions each year. That many legal executions would be a blood bath. And yet, it would still mean that only  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 percent of the 20 000 murderers each year would be executed. The death penalty would remain the freakish thing it has been and must be in a society which has recognized in practice, if not yet in word, that it is too cruel and barbarous to be used systematically.

Except as punishment for repeated crimes of violence, long prison sentences are also unnecessarily harsh. Prison itself should be used sparingly and only as punishment for serious crime. For the most part, prison does the opposite of what the advocates of rehabilitation had hoped: it makes people worse. When serious crimes have been committed, there may be no alternative. Prison may be the best way to punish such criminals—for the good of the rest of us, not for the good of the prisoner. But recognizing that prison is likely to make people worse—and more likely than ever to commit crimes after they get out—should make us, in prudence, resort to prison as a punishment only when we are persuaded that no lesser punishment will suffice. Long sentences, such as three years in prison or five years in prison, make people worse than three month sentences. Again, prudence dictates the very sparing use of long sentences. For repeated crimes of violence, long sentences may be the only alternative, but they are an inappropriate response to lesser crimes.

Based on these principles, we recognize that S.1437 represents an improvement over S.1 and other earlier efforts to codify the federal criminal laws. We are pleased that several of the most objectionable features of these earlier bills—such as the "official secrets" sections and the Nuremburg defense for government officials—have been dropped. We also note favorably that S.1437 contains several important reforms which would either tighten existing law from a civil liberties standpoint or eliminate repressive sections of S.1 These include :

Repeal of the Smith Act (§ 1103) which penalizes advocacy of overthrowing the government. While this statute has been greatly weakened by Supreme Court decisions it still has provided the alleged legal basis since 1940 for FBI actions against political groups.

Repeal of the Logan Act which prohibits private communications to a foreign government. It was this law passed in 1799 which the government attempted to use against those U.S. citizens who contacted and visited North Vietnam during the war, in their attempt to achieve peace.

Expansion of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 to make it a criminal offense to discriminate on the basis of sex as well as race, color, religious or national origin.

Strengthening the law to permit prosecution of any person who deprives another by intimidation of his/her federally protected civil rights (§ 1502) because specific intent need not be shown. Current law deals only with a conspiracy to violate civil rights whereas under S.1437 the casts of an individual may also be prosecuted.

Return of the constitutional requirements for proof of treason (§ 1101(b)).

Improvement of the definition of rape by making it sex neutral, clarifying the type of force required and eliminating the necessity for corroborating of the victim's testimony (§§ 1641, 1646).

Elimination of the crime of disorderly conduct, proposed for the first time in S.1.

Repeal of the speech-related crime of impairing military effectiveness by false statement.

We turn now to a closer look at other provisions of S.1437 which, although in a few cases are an improvement over S. 1, continue to threaten civil liberties and cause us to continue to oppose the bill. We urge Congress to make the amendments we suggest in our testimony before taking any further action to codify the criminal law.

II. CHAPTER 4—COMPLICITY

The dangers in the complicity provisions of Chapter 4 §§ 501–404 were described by this Subcommittee when it accurately stated in its report on S. 1, "complicity concepts . . . mark the outermost limits of the criminal law for, in some instances, they operate to hold liable persons who took no part in the conduct and who had no agreement with the actor. . . . There is an inherent risk of overreaching and constant danger of understating" (Report No. 94-00, p. 63). The pitfalls of overreaching and understating are to be found in S. 1437.

A. Accomplice liability

Section 401(a) (1) provides in general that one who "knowingly aids or abets" the commission of an offense by a principal actor is criminally liable for that offense. Although the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws (hereinafter the Brown Commission) limited its definition of "abets" to commands, induces [and] procures," the definition of "abet" in § 111 of S. 1437 includes "counsel, induce, procure and command." We submit that the term "counsel" is overreaching and should be deleted from the definition of "abet" in § 111. Retaining the term "counsel" leaves open the possibility of punishing a person engaged in speech activities (e.g., draft counselling) as principals. But under the Supreme Court definition of "aiding and abetting" they are not associated with the venture, have not participated in it wishing to bring it about, nor sought by counselling to make it succeed. Nyc & Nissen v. United States, 330 U.S. 613, 619 (1949).

B. Conspirator liability

Contrary to the recommendations of the Brown Commission, Section 401(b) retains the Pinkerton rule, setting a different standard for conspirator liability than for accomplice liability in general. In Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640 (1946) the test established for conspirator liability was whether it is "reasonably foreseeable that the conduct would be performed in furtherance of the conspiracy." On that basis the Court sustained a conviction of a substantive crime where there was no proof of participation or knowledge of the crime.

The Brown Commission rejected the doctrine of Pinkerton that mere membership in a conspiracy creates criminal liability for all specific offenses committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Comment, to § 401. Since an application of the Pinkerton test could often reach conduct too attenuated from the conspiratorial goal fairly to hold all parties liable, § 401 (b) (3) should be deleted as overreaching. Instead, we recommend that the standard for holding conspirator parties liable should be the same standard as § 401(a) for general accomplice liability, that is, whether the parties knowingly aided or abetted the commission of the offense. To find criminal liability where persons would not be guilty of aiding and abetting is to "incriminate persons on the fringe of offending." Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949) (Jackson, J., concurring).

C. Defenses precluded

Section 404 (b) (2) provides that an accomplice can be held liable for the conduct of the principal actor even if the principal has been acquitted, has not been prosecuted, has been convicted of another offense or is otherwise immune from prosecution. This is an exception to the general rule that a secondary actor cannot be convicted where the principal actor has committed no crime for which he or she may be convicted. "There is no question but that there must be a guilty principal before there can be an aider and abettor." United States v. Jones, 425 F.2d 1048, 1056 (9th Cir. 1970); Edwards v. United States, 286 F.2d 681 (5th Cir. 1960).

Furthermore, while a principal may be able to exclude crucial evidence on the grounds that it was illegally seized, an accomplice might not have standing to raise this objection.

In order to insure fourth amendment freedom from illegal search and seizure, and reduce the danger of police misconduct in obtaining evidence, we recommend that where the principal is acquitted based on illegally obtained evidence, the accomplice, as well, should be able to raise this defense. In addition, it is patently unfair for a secondary actor to be prosecuted when the principal actor has been acquitted. This same argument applies to § 1002(c), the identical provision concerning defenses precluded for conspirators. No person should be convicted of conspiracy if all other alleged conspirators have been acquitted. Thus, the same deletion is recommended in § 1002(c) in order to restore the defenses precluded for both complicity and conspiracy charges.

III. CHAPTER 10—INCHOATE OFFENSES

The criminal law has wrestled long and hard with the problem of when the law may intervene to prevent criminal conduct by imposing sanctions against activities which lead up to the actual criminal event. The ACLU acknowledges the importance of crime prevention and the logic of punishment which protects the innocent public before rather than after completion of the criminal act. At the same time, we believe that the so-called inchoate offenses—solicitation, attempt, and conspiracy—offer unparalleled opportunities for over-zealous law enforcement which invades constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press, free speech, free association with others, and due process of law.

The combination of inchoate with substantive offenses can lead to such absurdities as the prosecution of outspoken public critics of the government for conspiracy to incite draft resistance. See United States v. Spock, 416 F. 2d 165 (1st Cir. 1969). In such cases the conduct alleged to constitute a criminal offense is doubly removed from any act in itself criminal; the links connecting them may consist entirely of constitutionally protected speech and association, and there is seldom any possible proof that another's act originated in the speech or assembly prosecuted rather than springing from individual choice. Such prosecutions, with their unmistakable overtones of political repression and enforced unanimity of public opinion, move far away from the general purposes of the criminal law and the theories under which inchoate offenses have been held punishable. See Gruncwald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 402 (1957): "For every conspiracy is by its very nature secret; a case can hardly be supposed where men concert together for crime and advertise their purpose to the world."

Society unquestionably has a stake in punishing or deterring those who seek to undermine it by criminal activity. But it has at least as great a stake in clearly marking the limits of the criminal sanction. Laws which make political dissent evidence of criminality have no place in our system of constitutional self-government. The government which extends criminal punishment to responsible opposition attacks its own foundations. The government which sweeps within the label of criminality those who only may perhaps belong there, who may have lacked firm purpose, or drifted temporarily close the margin of legality, makes more outlaws than it needs. See Working Papers of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, Vol. I, at 362-363 (1970) (hereinafter Working Papers). Indeed, it may even induce criminal behavior. Cf. Wootton, Crime and the Criminal Law 14 (1963): "one conviction, and still more one period of imprisonment, is a great impediment to a subsequent honest and respectable living; and . . . the experience of conviction, and still more of imprisonment, is itself only too likely to be criminogenic." Until we learn far more than we now know about deterrence of crime and rehabilitation of offenders, we have an obligation to society, as well as to the prospective victims and defendants, not to make too many criminals.

A. Criminal attempt

Section 1001 would give the federal government, for the first time, an across-the-board attempt statute applicable to all other offenses. Such a statute may have the virtue of uniformity, but it directs Congressional attention away from the salutary effort to determine, in respect to particular crimes, whether an attempt statute is wise or necessary. Do we really want to punish unsuccessful attempts to engage in disorderly conduct, disseminate obscene books, or disclose classified information? Are such prosecutions an intelligent use of limited resources for combatting serious crime? Moreover, the ACLU believes that punishing attempts to incite unlawful conduct seriously increases the danger of government prosecution for advocacy plainly protected by the First Amendment.

Section 1001(a) of S. 1437—like S. 1, but contrary to the Brown Commission recommendation—defines the conduct sufficient to constitute an attempt as "more than mere preparation for and that indicates his intent to complete the commission of the crime." Such a standard could affect many First Amendment activities from their very beginning. For example, making arrangements for a public assembly at which inflammatory statements were to be made would arguably be enough to constitute an attempted incitement to riot. News reporters gathering information for reports on issues of vital public interest might be subject to prosecution for attempts to obtain classified information if their research annoyed someone in authority.

These examples are not farfetched. Courts have not found it easy to define the meaning of "attempt" in the criminal law. Even Justice Holmes, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, had his difficulties. See Commonwealth v. Peaslee, 177 Mass. 267, 272, 59 N.E. 55, 56 (1901): ". . . preparation is not an attempt. But some preparations may amount to an attempt. It is a question of degree. If the preparation comes very near to the accomplishment of the act, the intent to complete it renders the crime so probable that the act will be a misdemeanor, although there is still . . . need of a further exertion of the will to complete the crime."

To eliminate this dangerous ambiguity, we recommend that conduct sufficient to constitute an attempt should, at the least, be defined as a "substantial step toward commission of the offense" in line with both the current practice of federal courts and the Brown Commission recommendation in § 1001(a). Further, a substantial step should be defined as any conduct "corroboration of the firmness of the actor's intent to complete the commission of the offense." Brown Commission, § 1001(a).

Section 1002(b) permits defense of "voluntary and complete renunciation" of criminal conduct. The defendant must abandon his criminal effort and, if this does not prevent the crime in itself, take affirmative steps which do prevent it.

However, such a high standard for renunciation is defined in § 1004(a) that the affirmative defense of § 1002(b) is severely weakened. A renunciation does not meet the "voluntary and complete" standard if motivated even in part by belief that "a circumstance exists that increases the probability of detection or apprehension . . ." or by a decision to postpone the criminal activity. Remembering that the offense involved is merely an attempt, such a high standard for renunciation may be a trap for the belatedly innocent who go along so long as criminal purposes are hazy but draw back when faced with the actual necessity for criminal behavior if their end is to be accomplished. One purpose of criminal sanctions is to deter people from making the ultimate decision to violate the law. If the sanctions work, the case for punishment is at best tenuous.

B. Conspiracy

In defining criminal conspiracy, Section 1002 does nothing to limit the "elastic, sprawling and pervasive" nature of the offense. Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 445 (1949) (Jackson, J., concurring). As long ago as 1925, the federal judiciary expressed serious concern that conspiracy prosecutions were ranging far beyond the legitimate purposes of conspiracy law—to prevent the establishment of continuing group schemes for cooperative lawbreaking—and being used "arbitrarily and harshly." Annual Report of the Attorney General for 1925 at 5-6. Some twenty-five years later Justice Jackson again warned that "loose practice as to this offense constitutes a serious threat to fairness in our administration of justice." Krulewitch, supra, 336 U.S. at 446 (concurring opinion). Twenty-five more years have passed, with conspiracy prosecutions for political dissent and mere advocacy drawing yet more criticism. Yet S. 1437 would leave conspiracy law in much the same state of confusion and overbreadth, subject to the same flagrant abuse, as it is now.

"The modern crime of conspiracy is so vague that it almost defies definition." Krulewitch, supra, 336 U.S. at 446 (concurring opinion). According to section 1002, conspiracy occurs when someone "agrees with one or more persons to engage in conduct, the performance of which would constitute a crime or crimes, and he or one of such persons in fact engages in any conduct with intent to effect any objective of the agreement."

By using the overbroad terminology, "any conduct" and "any objective", the conspirator need not know that the conduct he or she agrees to engage in or cause is actually a crime. He or she can therefore be punished merely for an agreement, evidenced only by speech ordinarily protected by the First Amendment, to engage in other speech ordinarily protected by the First Amendment. The only consummation required is some act to effect an objective of the agreement or relationship. "Any act or omission, however otherwise innocent, other than those acts surrounding the hatching of the plot itself, performed by any member of the conspiracy, while the conspiracy remains yet afoot, fulfills the requirement." Working Papers, vol. I at 393 and cases there cited. Attendance at a meeting may be sufficient. See Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298, 333-334 (1957). The objective effected need not itself be criminal under the terms of S. 1002(a). In short, one may be convicted of conspiracy on almost no proof at all of serious criminal intent or behavior seriously tending to accomplish a crime. The divorce between criminal act and criminal intent is virtually complete. See United States v. Spock, 416 R. 2d 165 (1st Cir. 1969).

At a minimum, reform of § 1002(a) should delete "any conduct with intent" and substitute a "substantial step" standard so that only a substantial step towards the completion of the conspiratorial goal would constitute sufficient conduct for commission of the offense.

The substantive law of conspiracy is made even more dangerous by the procedural anomalies that have grown up around it. Since the parties to a conspiracy need not be aware of the participation of others or know each other's identity. Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 557-58 (1947), and since one co-conspirator may be convicted on the hearsay evidence of another. Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949), a defendant may be convicted of conspiracy on the basis of collateral agreements or acts he knew nothing about, engaged in by persons he had never heard of.

Moreover, although the Sixth Amendment grants the rights to trial in the district where the crime was committed, a conspiracy prosecution may be brought anywhere any conspirator did any act to effect an objective of the conspiracy. Thus in the Spock case, supra, the government chose to try the case in Boston although several of the acts charged in the indictment took place in New York and Washington, D.C. The procedural law of conspiracy permits the government to engage in forum-shopping for the place where a conviction is thought most likely to be obtained.

The political misuses of conspiracy law have been amply demonstrated in the last few years. The more ordinary abuses, against less publicized defendants, were well-known as much as fifty years ago. One test of any revision or reform of the Federal Criminal Code is its willingness to grapple with and end the abuses of this prosecutorial tool. S. 1437 totally abdicates Congressional responsibility in this critical area of the law.

C. Criminal solicitation

Section 1003(a) makes it a crime to endeavor to persuade another to do something which constitutes a criminal offense under "circumstances strongly corroborative of that intent." The solicitor need not know that the conduct he endeavors to persuade another to undertake is criminal. He need only intend that the conduct occur. Thus under S. 1437 he could be convicted for encouraging someone else to engage in what he thinks is constitutionally protected protest activity, and still be convicted for soliciting disorderly conduct.

In proposing a solicitation statute, the Brown Commission intended to provide punishment for those who instigate offenses and thereby are truly culpable. Working Papers, Vol. I at 368. But terms like "endeavor to persuade" cast a much wider net. On their face they ensnare the speaker for nothing more than speech, when no other criminal act has occurred. By deleting the Brown Commission's requirement of an overt act in response to the solicitation, see Final Report § 1003, S. 1437 could be used to punish advocacy without the slightest possibility of producing lawless action. But the First Amendment plainly forbids this consequence. E.g., Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

Although Section 1004(b) (2) of the proposed bill renders the offenses in Chapter 10 inapplicable to certain advocacy crimes (such as obstructing military recruitment, inviting mutiny, or leading a riot), this is not sufficient to safeguard against overreaching. Even with these exclusions, we question whether solicitation should be applicable as a general provision; the entire bill should be examined to determine whether solicitation should be proscribed in particular instances rather than by general provision. In accord with the Brown Commission recommendation to limit solicitation to the instigation of "a particular crime which is, in fact, a felony," solicitation of crimes which are not felonies should not be an offense.

IV. CHAPTER 11—OFFENSES INVOLVING NATIONAL DEFENSE

A. Sabotage

Sections 1111 and 1112 prohibit impairing military effectiveness by damaging, tampering with, or contaminating any property particularly suited for use in the national defense. The required intent is "to impair, interfere with, or obstruct the ability of the United States or an associate nation to prepare for or to engage in war or defense activities."

Under the vague terms of § 1111, anti-Vietnam war demonstrators who "interfered with" public transportation by their very numbers could have been prosecuted for sabotage, a major felony. Nothing in the statute's language prohibits a jury from deducing "intent . . . to obstruct the ability of the United States . . . to . . . engage in war or defense activities" from such circumstances. Nothing would prevent prosecution under the general criminal attempt, conspiracy, and solicitation sections of S. 1437, see sections 1001-03, for speech encouraging such a demonstration. The section could be used to chill the rights of association and assembly guaranteed by the First Amendment. It would make every public demonstration, no matter how peaceful and orderly, subject to criminal sanctions at the whim of official power. See Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 557-58 (1965), where the Supreme Court, in striking down a similarly vague and overboard statute, observed:

"It is clearly unconstitutional to enable a public official to determine which expressions of view will be permitted and which will not or to engage in invidious discrimination among persons or groups either by use of a statute providing a system of broad discretionary licensing power or, as in this case, the equivalent of such a system by selective enforcement of an extremely broad prohibitory statute."

Since intent to impair military effectiveness could be read to include any opposition to development of weapons, no matter how costly or obsolete, editorials against the ABM, news stories exposing enormous cost over-runs and mechanical failure, or simply a citizen's public or private remarks against the situating of nuclear stockpiles in his hometown, could be prosecuted on the theory that they "damage" the objects of their disapproval.

This section should therefore be narrowed to apply only to substantial physical damage.

Moreover, § 1111 applies to a limitless array of property. "Any property", § 1111 (a) (1) (A), or "any public facility." § 1111 (a) (1) (C), can qualify simply by being "particularly suited for use in the national defense." At the very least, therefore, this section should be amended to require designation of such property or facility (for example specific military hardware), or should raise the culpability level to "knowing."

Section 1112 essentially repeats the offense outlined in § 1111, but lowers the level of required intent to "reckless disregard." It thus extends still further the opportunities for official suppression of that vigorous and effective dissent on which democracy relies.

If there should be any impairment of military effectiveness offense at all, it should be limited to periods of declared war, and only to a narrowly defined category of major weapons systems. This is a critical amendment to § 1112, and as presently drafted, a major defect of S. 1437.

B. Espionage—Subchapter C

Through cross-referencing, the proposed bill would retain the language of existing espionage statutes, thereby losing a significant opportunity to reform the archaic and ambiguous provisions of existing law.

If Congress is to codify the general espionage laws, it should at least make clear in the legislative history that proof of specific intent to injure the national defense is an essential element of the offense. The Ellsberg indictment in 1973 demonstrates the vagueness, overbreadth, and adverse impact on the First Amendment of 18 U.S.C. § 793. Prior to the Ellsberg indictment for disclosing the Pentagon Papers, the general espionage laws had been interpreted to require proof of an intent to injure the national defense.

The Ellsberg indictment was constitutionally deficient in that it failed to reflect this element. This deficiency should be cured in codifying existing law.

If the Committee determines merely to re-enact existing espionage laws, every effort must be made to ensure that re-enactment does not carry with it any change in meaning. We note with approval that the provisions of Chapter 3 are expressly made inapplicable to the espionage provisions in order to avoid any change in the statement of mind necessary for conviction. However, the term "communicate" is defined in § 111 (General Definitions) to include publication by a newspaper. The use of the word "communicate" in the existing espionage laws has been the source of continuing controversy. See New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971) (compare the concurring opinions of Justices White, Douglas and Black); see also for an exhaustive review of the legislative history accompanying original enactment of the espionage laws concluding that the laws did not pertain to publication by a newspaper except with regard to a narrow category of cryptographic information, H. Edgar and B. Schmidt, Jr., "The Espionage Statutes and Publication of Defense Information," 73 Col. L. Rev. 929 (1973) (reprinted in Hearings, p. 7141).

C. Obstructing a Government function by fraud

According to § 1301, a person commits a felony if he or she "intentionally obstructs or impairs a government function by defrauding the government in any manner."

To avoid the possibility that defrauding the government might be read to include publishing a government document which does not fall under the Freedom of Information Act, the ACLU believes that either the statutory language or the legislative history should make clear that this section cannot be used to prosecute legitimate journalistic activities. For this reason, the statute should be narrowed in three ways:

To provide an affirmative defense where the primary purpose of a defendant's conduct was the dissemination of information to the public:

To prosecute only "material" obstructions of government functions, and

To provide a defense where the government function obstructed was itself unlawful.

D. Hindering law enforcement

§ 1311 of the bill is aimed at deterring and punishing persons who destroy evidence or conceal a suspect in a criminal case. Although these purposes are clearly legitimate, the statutory language also reaches persons who conceal merely the identity of a suspect language which could be interpreted to include news reporters protecting their sources.

Another section of the bill, § 1333, which penalizes refusing to testify or produce information when ordered to do so by Congress or a federal court, contains an affirmative defense in cases where a defendant is legally privileged to withhold information. An earlier version of § 1311 made it clear that a similar defense applied to this section so as to protect a reporter who asserts constitutional or statutory privilege not to reveal the identity or confidential communications of a secret news source. See Senate Judiciary Committee Report on the Criminal Reform Act of 1974, Vol. II, pp. 317-319.

The ACLU believe that § 1311 should include a similar limitation, a result which requires the elimination or modification of § 1311(C), which precludes such a defense as currently written.

E. Tampering with a Government record

§ 1344 penalizes a person who "alters, destroys, mutilates, conceals, removes, or otherwise impairs the integrity of a government record." The ACLU is concerned about the scope of the terms, "otherwise impairing the integrity of" a government record. The term is inherently vague, raising constitutional problems of notice and due process. In addition, it is possible to interpret the section to criminalize unauthorized photocopying or mere disclosure of the contents of a government document, despite the fact that the document itself was neither removed from government premises nor altered in any way.

Since other provisions of the proposed code deal with the unauthorized disclosure of information in government documents (see, e.g. § 1525—Revealing Private Information Submitted for a Government purpose), we submit that First Amendment interests must be protected by either a clarifying amendment to this section or a statement in the Committee Report that the section is not to be construed to extend to unauthorized photocopying or disclosure of the content of government documents without more.

F. Retaliating against a public servant

§ 135S prohibits any conduct subjecting "another person" to bodily injury, property damage, or improper economic business, or professional loss because of the official action or status of a public servant.

This section is overbroad in its potentially chilling effect on freedom of the press. Because the bill's definition of a public servant—which includes any government employee, consultant, or juror—is broader than the concept of a "public figure" under New York Times v. Sullivan, this section may criminalize the publication of a financially damaging news report which has been found libelous (i.e. "improper") by state law under a mere negligence standard. Just because criticism of certain public servants is not protected by the First Amendment for purposes of civil liability does not mean that such criticism should be turned into a federal criminal offense.

While we recognize that the statute is not intended to reach robust editorial criticism of former or present public servants, this is clearly a section requiring the inclusion of an editorial writer/news reporter's defense.

V. CHAPTER 13—OFFENSES INVOLVING GOVERNMENT PROCESSES (SPEECH RELATED OFFENSES)

Under the guise of protecting the integrity and neutrality of government operations. Chapter 13 would permit governmental interference with First, Fifth, and Sixth Amendment rights. There is a genuine need to protect judicial and administrative proceedings from corruption and intimidation. But this need must not be used to invade constitutional rights where the behavior curbed has, at most, slight chance of deleterious effect. Public demonstrations directed primarily at public opinion must not be suppressed on the theory that they interfere with the sanctity of the judicial process. Vigorous advocacy must not be stifled under the label of criminal contempt.

A. Obstructing a Government function by physical interference

Section 1302 makes physical interference with federal government functions a felony. The proposed bill in subsection (a)(2) through (a)(4) specifically defines the conduct to be covered in acceptable language. However, subsections (a)(1) serves as a residual clause covering obstruction or impairing "the performance by a federal public servant of an official duty." This broad language could be misused against lawful and peaceful demonstrations. Virtually every mass demonstration would, at one moment or another, fall within its prohibition. Yet such demonstrations can be an important contribution to the public debate on a wide variety of topics.

Under the unfettered terms of subsection (a) (1), it would be up to the prosecutor to determine whether a large demonstration on federal grounds or near federal buildings was or was not "physically interfering" with the performance by a federal public servant of an official duty. Even an influx of cars carrying demonstrators to the chosen site might constitute the proscribed felony. Since mass arrests on the basis of group behavior are constitutionally forbidden by the particularly requirements of the Fourth Amendment, this provision would invite selective abuse by law enforcement officials who object to life-styles different from their own. See e.g., Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611, 616 (1971). Subsection (a) (1) should therefore, be amended to specify the particular kinds of public servants and duties that are covered. This could be accomplished by returning to existing law contained in 18 U.S.C. § 1114.

B. Demonstrating to influence a judicial proceeding

Section 1328 prohibits pickets, parades, display of signs or other demonstrations on the grounds or within 200 feet of a courthouse. Although the ACLU generally endorses such statutes as necessary to protect due process rights, we believe the statute should be written so as not to apply to demonstrators who have no possibility of influencing or intimidating the courts, and whose primary intent is to express opinions of the judicial process which are protected by the First Amendment.

The courthouse should not be treated differently from other public buildings generally open to the public. A demonstration should not be prohibited unless it disrupts proceedings being conducted within the courthouse by unreasonable noise, obstruction of an entry, or the threat of force or property injury. For example, the grounds of the Supreme Court should be open to demonstrators wishing to protest the abortion decisions even while the Court is in session unless the demonstrators knowingly disrupt the Court's business.

C. Criminal contempt

Section 1331 makes it a crime to "misbehave in the presence of a court or so near to it as to obstruct the administration of justice." But the provision offers no further guide to judicial discretion. The Supreme Court has cautioned that before the "drastic procedures of the summary contempt power may be invoked," it must be clearly shown that the Court has actually been obstructed in "the performance of a judicial duty." In re McConnell, 370 U.S. 230, 234 (1962).

Under § 1331, there is a significant danger that vigorous representation or self-representation may be held subject to summary punishment, thereby chilling the Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel. See Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); McConnell, supra. The vagueness of the term, "misbehaves," could violate due process rights by leaving the trier of fact "free to decide, without any legally fixed standards, what is prohibited and what is not in each particular case." Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402-03 (1966). See Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 556 (1974). The potential overbreadth of the term may invade First Amendment rights to present relevant public issues for discussion or decision, no matter how distasteful to the individual judge. Cf. Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967).

Section 1331(b) adds an affirmative defense to the proposed bill if the court order disobeyed was "clearly invalid" and if there was no reasonable opportunity to obtain judicial review of the order prior to the disobedience charged. However, by stating the elements of the defense conjunctively rather than in the alternative, this defense has been unnecessarily limited. There is no reason why a person who can show that a court order was, in fact, invalid (regardless of whether the invalidity was "clear") should be guilty of contempt if he or she had no prior opportunity to obtain timely judicial review.<sup>1</sup>

Section 1331(d) further specifies that a criminal contempt proceeding does not bar subsequent prosecution for another federal offense based on the same conduct.

<sup>1</sup> Thus, we would suggest that the affirmative defense to contempt should read as follows: "It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under subsection (a)(2) that the writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command was: (1) clearly invalid; or (2) invalid and that the defendant did not have judicial review or a stay thereof prior to the disobedience or resistance charged."

The ACLU believes that there is a serious question whether the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment permits more than one prosecution based on the same conduct. Such a bifurcation invites prosecutorial harassment. See Comment in the Brown Commission Working Papers, Vol. I at 602.

Because the criminal contempt power is often subject to judicial abuse and has been too often invoked against politically controversial defendants and their counsel, we endorse the recommendation in the original Brown Commission study draft that penalties be sharply curtailed to no more than five days imprisonment and a $500 fine. We also believe that a criminal contempt trial must be held before a neutral judge—not the one in whose court the alleged contempt occurred. See Working Papers, Vol. I at 603. If longer penalties are to be imposed, there can be no substitute for the intervention of a jury between the court and the accused. Indeed, Supreme Court decisions require a jury trial in criminal contempt cases where a sentence longer than six months is imposed. Cheff v. Schnackenberg, 384 U.S. 373 (1966); Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 208 (1968) (Jury trial must be granted in contempt cases where “serious punishment . . . is contemplated”).

D. Making a false statement to a law enforcement official

While judicial authority is split over whether 18 U.S.C. § 1001 covers false statements made to law enforcement authorities, compare United States v. Adler, 380 F. 2d 917 (2nd Cir 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1006 (1967) with Friedman v. United States, 374 F. 2d 363 (8th Cir. 1967), Section 1343 resolves this conflict in favor of covering such statements. Even with the limitation that the defendant must have known he was speaking to a law enforcement agent (unless he volunteered the statement or was advised that the making of such a statement was an offense), this Section invites abuse by law enforcement officials. The possibility of abuse is particularly great with regard to allegedly false oral statements. Prosecution for perjury requires close examination of the actual words used by the defendant. Since this offense sets up a “my word against yours” situation when the defendant and the police officer are the only two witnesses, the unfair advantage of the officer’s presumed credibility in the eyes of the jury makes the fabrication of charges a potential danger. False statements to a law enforcement officer, whether oral or written, or sworn or unsworn, should not be an offense except in the case of false alarms or a person’s intentional false implication of another person in the commission of a crime. See Final Reports § 1354.

V. CHAPTER 18—OFFENSES INVOLVING PUBLIC ORDER, SAFETY, HEALTH, AND WELFARE

A. Drug offenses

Chapter 18, subchapter B, eliminates as a federal offense possession for personal use of 10 grams or less of marijuana. The ACLU endorses the decriminalization of marijuana possession and uses, but recommends in addition, that gratuitous transfer of marijuana also be decriminalized. Further, no federal penalty should be provided in excess of any state law that decriminalizes possession of marijuana.

Beyond marijuana, the ACLU believes that criminal punishment of drug addicts, whose use and possession of the drugs is fundamentally a result of illness rather than criminal intent, is a violation of the Constitution. See Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962), holding it unconstitutional to make addiction per se a crime; Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514 (1968) (dissenting opinion). If the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment forbids punishment for “an irresistible compulsion,” according to Justice White, concurring in Powell, supra, 392 U.S. at 348. “I do not see how it can constitutionally be a crime to yield to such a compulsion.” We agree.

B. Riot offenses

Like many of the offenses against national security, the anti-riot laws are broad and vague, sweeping within their terms conduct clearly protected by the First Amendment, failing to notify the law-abiding of what conduct is properly forbidden, and providing a convenient tool for discriminatory prosecution and governmental oppression of political adversaries.

Although the term, “incitement,” in § 1831(a) (1) has now been defined in section 111 in general accord with the formulation in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), one further change is necessary. The proposed bill defines “incites” as "urging other persons to engage imminently in conduct in circumstances under which there is a substantial likelihood of imminently causing such conduct."<sup>2</sup>

Under this definition, the defendant need only be reckless with regard to the fact that circumstances exist which render his otherwise lawful advocacy likely to result in a riot. The definition of incites in § 111, therefore, should be changed to require knowledge of the requisite existing circumstances.

Section 1831(a) (2) punishes the leading or giving of "commands, instructions, or directions in furtherance of" a riot. This is vague and overbroad. Hess v. Indiana, 94 S.Ct. 326 (1973), amply demonstrates the difficulties encountered in determining who is trying to further a riot and who is trying to limit it. Such speech is protected not only by the First Amendment, but also by the Fifth Amendment guarantee of due process of law. The standards for punishment are so vague as to require potential violators, law enforcement personnel, and judge or jury to guess at their meaning. See Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 4551 (1938).

Section 1833, which prohibits "engaging in a riot," also suffers from vagueness. The problem created by such vagueness is the discretion left to law enforcement officials to determine what conduct is criminal.

Such broad provisions can only encourage dragnet arrests, where police make the arbitrary determination that everyone within sight or reach is "engaging in" the disturbance, even though many of them may be persons who have committed no culpable act whatsoever or innocent bystanders caught up in unexpected circumstances. It invites arrest on the basis of such irrelevant factors as race, age, and manner of dress. The later invalidation of such arrests or the dismissal of charges cannot compensate the victims for restraint, incarceration, or such collateral consequences of arrest as, under current law, the inclusion of their fingerprints in crime control databanks and the refusal by public or private employers to hire them on the basis of their brush with the law. See Sullivan v. Murphy, 478 F.2d 938 (D.C. Cir. 1973).

C. Obscenity

Section 1842 makes it a federal felony to disseminate obscene material, thereby punishing the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment.

The ACLU opposes any restriction on expression on the grounds that it is somehow obscene, immoral, shameful, or distasteful. The Constitution requires that such judgments be left to the individual rather than to the government. Justice Douglas, dissenting from the Supreme Court majority in Miller v. California, 93 S.Ct. 2607 (1973), outlined the dangers of determining that some forms of expression are beyond the protection of the Constitution.

"The idea that the First Amendment permits government to ban publications that are 'offensive' to some people puts an ominous gloss on freedom of the press. That test would make it possible to ban any paper or any journal or magazine in some benighted place * * * To give the power to the censor, as we do today, is to make a sharp and radical break with the traditions of a free society * * * The materials before us may be garbage. But so is much of what is said in political campaigns, in the daily press, on TV or over the radio. By reason of the First Amendment—and solely because of it—speakers and publishers have not been threatened or subdued because their thoughts and ideas may be 'offensive' to some." Id. at 2626.

A definition of obscenity that would both give fair warning of what is prohibited and limit itself to the truly pornographic has defied the best legal minds of the century. In Miller, supra, the Court majority confidently predicted that its newest test would single out protected "commerce in ideas" from punishable "commercial exploitation of obscene material." Id. at 2621. The Georgia Supreme Court responded two weeks later by holding that the widely acclaimed movie "Carnal Knowledge" was obscene, the Supreme Court of the United States failed to relieve itself of "the awesome task of making case by case at once the criminal and the constitutional law." Id. at 5058 (Brennan, J. dissenting). The constitutional definition of obscenity remains uncertain.

Unfortunately, the proposed bill codifies the standards laid down in Miller, thus cementing the "community standards" test into the federal criminal laws.

<sup>2</sup> We assume that there is either a typographical or drafting error in § 1831. Subsection (a) prohibits "inciting" participation in a riot during a riot. Subsection (b) however prohibits "urging" participation in a riot during a riot. If "urging" is meant to denote a lesser quantum of conduct than "inciting," then defining inciting in accord with Brandenburg becomes an illusory change. We assume the sponsors of this bill intended no such result, and will readily agree to delete the relevant language from subsection (b).

Under Section 1842(b) (4) (B) (i) and the venue provisions of Section 3311, the contemporary community standards to be applied are those generally accepted in the judicial district where the offense occurred. Section 1842 thus invites a local jury in any district through which or into which the material has passed by mails or commerce to dictate the standards for the rest of the community. The ACLU strongly opposes any federal obscenity statute, but at the very least, the venue provisions must be modified to reduce the liability of defendants to prosecution in every district of the country.

D. Failing to obey a public safety order

Under Section 1861, it is an offense to disobey a lawful order of any public servant "issued in response to a fire, flood, riot or other connection that creates a risk of serious injury to a person or serious damage to property." No comparable offense exists under current federal law. The residual clauses, "other condition that creates a risk. . .," is vague and should be deleted. Furthermore, authority to issue such orders should be narrowed since the definition of public servant in Section 111 included any "officer, employee, advisor, consultant, juror, or other person authorized to act for or on behalf" of the government. Nothing in Section 1861 requires the public servant whose orders it is an infraction to disobey to be a public safety officer or to have any specific authority related to the specific circumstances. In addition, like other infractions, the offense should carry no prison term, but be punishable solely as a civil violation subjecting the offender to minimal fines.

Under § 1861, members of the press and public could be ordered to "move, disperse, or refrain from specified activity"—such as taking photographs—by any government official who objected to their presence or activity in an area where a riot was "impending" if the order were "reasonably designed" to prevent injury to persons or property. Such vague provisions give government officials broad powers to interfere with free speech and press and to control what the public learns about government response to protest demonstrations as well as to riots, or potential riots. But these are matters of which the public should be thoroughly and accurately informed.

VII. PART III—SENTENCES

In addition to the general comments on sentencing which are set forth at the beginning of our statement, we refer the Subcommittee to the testimony of the ACLU National Prison Project which addresses in detail the proposals in S. 1437.

VIII. CHAPTER 31—ANCILLARY INVESTIGATIVE AUTHORITY

A. Wiretapping—subchapter A

The ACLU has long opposed wiretapping and electronic surveillance by anyone—including the government—for any reason. The use of electronic devices to invade the privacy of conversation in homes and offices, in telephone booths, and nearly anywhere else is a flagrant violation of the Fourth Amendment ban on dragnet searches and seizures, the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, and the constitutional right of privacy. The electronic ear does not discriminate between conversations about criminal activity and conversations entirely within the protection of the First Amendment. It does not separate the intimate discussions of friends from the clandestine plotting of criminals. It sweeps up everything in its way. As Justice Brandeis observed in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 475-76, 478 (1928) (dissenting opinion):

"The evil incident to invasion of the privacy of the telephone is far greater than that involved in tampering with the mails. Whenever a telephone line is tapped, the privacy of the persons at both ends of the line is invaded and all conversations between them upon any subject, and although proper, confidential and privileged, may be overheard. Moreover, the tapping of one man's telephone line involves the tapping of the telephone of every other person whom he may call or who may call him." As a means of espionage, writs of assistance and general warrants are but puny instruments of tyranny and oppression when compared with wire-tapping. . . .

"The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. * * * They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."

The threat to privacy from electronic surveillance was so great, so pervasive, and so alien to the spirit of the Constitution, Brandeis wrote, that even intrusions in the name of law enforcement must be banned. "Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the government's purposes are beneficial. * * * The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning, but without understanding." Id. at 479.

Despite studies indicating that, from the government's point of view, the costs of electronic surveillance far outweigh its purported benefits, Schwartz, Report on Costs and Benefits of Electronic Surveillance (ACLU 1973), S. 1437 essentially re-enacts the electronic surveillance provisions of Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510-20.

The ACLU vigorously opposed Title III at the time it was under consideration by Congress. We oppose its re-enactment now. Despite its requirement that a neutral magistrate issue a warrant based on "probable cause" and on the failure of ordinary investigative techniques, Title III has greatly expanded the use of electronic surveillance. In the overwhelming majority of cases, the neutral magistrate has accepted the government's word that such surveillance was necessary and would be carefully limited within statutory guidelines.

The number of "intercept applications" authorized has risen from 174 in 1968 to 686 in 1976; in the latter year only two applications were denied. Of the 686 applications granted in 1976, only 20% were granted by federal rather than state judges. In 1976, the average number of persons whose conversations were overheard was 54 per wiretap; and the average number of conversations overheard was 662 per order. The average wiretap was in actual operation for almost 19 days. Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Report on Applications for Orders Authorizing or Approving the Interception of Wire or Oral Communications (1976).

Yet there have been extraordinary abuses—abuses involving wholesale deception of the courts by the Administration. Despite the requirement that only the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General specially designated by him could authorize federal applications for intercept orders, 18 U.S.C. § 2516, a requirement designed by Congress to insure that only a "publicly responsible official" would set law enforcement policy in this sensitive area, S. Rep. No. 1067, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 96-97 (1968), a large number of such orders were routinely approved by an executive assistant to the Attorney General and submitted to the courts in the name of an Assistant Attorney General who had, in fact, nothing to do with their authorization. As a result, the Supreme Court has held that evidence gathered under those orders cannot be admitted in court. See generally, United States v. Giordano, 416 U.S. 505 (1974).

While Section 3104 limits the types of crimes for which an emergency warrantless wiretap is obtainable, and removes the reservation of an inherent presidential power to conduct wiretaps without warrants, it still permits broad wiretapping. An important opportunity is thus lost to examine closely the record of nine years under Title III to determine whether the minimal gains for law enforcement are, as we submit, far outweighed by the loss of privacy which has been suffered.

B. Compulsion of testimony

Subchapter 31 (b) restates existing law, compelling a person's testimony even though his or her refusal is based on the privileges against self-incrimination. Section 311(b) thus continues the practice adopted in 1970 in the Organized Crime Control Act, which cut to the heart of the Fifth Amendment privilege by providing that a witness claiming the privilege could nevertheless be compelled to testify by being granted limited, "use" immunity. Use immunity means that testimony or evidence derived from such testimony cannot be used against the witness, but the witness can still be prosecuted for any crimes admitted in the testimony, so long as the prosecution is based on independent evidence.

Substituting use immunity for the broader, historically approved "transactional" immunity from prosecution severely weakens Fifth Amendment rights. The ACLU opposes use immunity on the ground that the Fifth Amendment guarantees a person's right to remain silent and to be free from compulsory self-incrimination. The requirement of full transactional immunity is the minimum constitutional compromise which could justify displacing that right of silence.

The rationale for this position is explained in Justice Douglas' dissenting opinion in Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 411, 467 (1972):

"The Self-Incrimination Clause says: 'No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.' I see no answer to the proposition that he is such a witness when only "use" immunity is granted." Kastigar

v. United States, 406 U.S. at 462. Emphasizing the broad reach of the Fifth Amendment, Justice Douglas noted that "the framers put it beyond the power of Congress to compel anyone to confess his crimes. The Self-Incrimination clause creates, as I have said before, 'the federally protected right of silence,' making it unconstitutional to use a law 'to pry open one's lips and make him a witness against himself.'" Id., at 467. We agree. The compulsion of involuntary self-incriminating testimony through use immunity should be abolished.

IX. CHAPTER 36—DISPOSITION OF INCOMPETENT OFFENDERS

Chapter 36(b) deals with determination of competency to stand trial and treatment of offenders who are suffering from mental disease or defect. It also provides for the disposition of persons found not guilty of any federal offense by reason of insanity. Most of these sections either entirely rewrite existing law or codify current practice that is not dealt with at present by statute. The subject is not without difficulty and a complete discussion would substantially lengthen this already lengthy testimony. Therefore, we merely set forth below some general comments in this subchapter as a starting point for the Committee:<sup>3</sup>

A. S. 1347 makes an important change in S. 3611. A person held to determine competency to stand trial may not be held for more than a year. Current law specifies only a reasonable time or until it is clear that there is no substantial likelihood that the defendant will regain competency. Legislative definition of time limit is useful and a year would appear to be appropriate for felony cases, for a misdemeanor, the time period should be considerably shorter.

The major defect in this section is that it fails to deal with dismissal of charges of one found to be incompetent to stand trial.

As the statute of limitations is tolled when the prosecution is commenced, an incompetent defendant can remain subject to further prosecution for an indefinite time. This is a fundamentally unfair burden to impose on one who, through no fault of the accused, cannot be brought to trial.

B. Chapter 36(b) also asserts federal authority to commit a person who has been found not guilty (by reason of insanity) of any federal offense or whose term of imprisonment about to expire. Such authority does not exist under current federal law, nor should it. Once a person has been found not guilty—for any reason—or served the prison sentence imposed, the federal interest expires.

If there is reason to believe that such a person must be involuntarily confined, the proper course is to refer such person to state authorities for possible commitment under state civil commitment law. By this method, commitment will only be obtained when both authorities, state and federal, agree that the defendant must be deprived of his or her freedom. This renders less likely the possibility that commitment will be obtained out of retribution, either by the federal prosecutory who has been "defeated" by a plea of insanity, or by prison authorities who seek additional punishment for an unruly inmate whose term is about to expire. The checks and balances built into the present system should be preserved.

The S. 1347 bill changes the commitment standard from preponderance of the evidence to "clear and convincing"—a significant and welcome change but one which in no way mitigates the overreaching of federal authority. Other procedural changes are necessary if these sections are to be retained against our recommendations. This chapter should be compared in its entirety with H.R. 12504 which in numerous ways better protects the defendant's right to a fair hearing before the loss of his liberty, e.g., composition of the examining panel of psychiatrists, video-taping of evaluative staff conferences, and frequency of reports from the hospital staff of the committing authority.

X. CHAPTER 37—SUBCHAPTER B—EVIDENCE

A. Admissibility of confessions

Section 3713 is an attempt, derived from existing law enacted as part of the 1968 omnibus anti-crime bill, to undercut the Miranda decision providing suspects certain rights when subjected to custodial interrogations by law enforcement officials. Section 3713(C), provides that the presence or absence of any of the factors enumerated is not conclusive as to voluntariness of the confession. Among the factors, which are not to be conclusive, is "whether the person was advised or knew that he was not required to make a statement and that the statement could be used against him." Allowing judges and juries to find a confession admissible even if this requirement has not been met is inconsistent with a defendant's right to be so advised in custodial interrogations and the ACLU opposes it.

<sup>3</sup> We understand that Professor Heathcote Wales of Georgetown University Law Center will be invited to testify on Chapter 36(b). Professor Wales has served as an advisor to the ACLU on this subject and played a key role in drafting Chapter 36(b) of H.R. 12504 "the 94th Congress (now H.R. 2311) which we commend to this Committee for comparison.

B. Admissibility of evidence in sentencing proceedings

The ACLU opposes Section 3714, which would allow illegally obtained confessions and fruits of illegal searches to be considered in sentencing. The section provides that "any relevant information concerning the history, characteristics and conduct of a person * * * regardless of the admissibility of the information under the Federal Rules of Evidence" would be permitted.

XI. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

A. Revealing private information submitted for a Government purpose

§ 1525 prohibits a present or former public servant from disclosing information submitted to the government by a private citizen in connection with an application for a license or benefit or to comply with a legal duty, where such disclosure would violate a specific duty imposed on the official by statute, regulation, rule or order.

This section is properly aimed at assuring the reliability of private information submitted to regulatory and other government agencies by assuring that the confidentiality of such records will be maintained.

We submit however, that this section as drafted could be used to insulate documentary evidence of official corruption or other wrongdoing from scrutiny and airing by Congress, the press, and the general public. To obviate this danger, we suggest that the Committee Report make it clear that the section does not cover internally generated government documents or documents obtainable under the Freedom of Information Act or discoverable under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

In addition, the legislative history should reflect the fact that Congress intends this section neither to restrict its own access to information nor to dilute the obligation of public servants to come forward with evidence of wrongdoing (codified in § 1311 or elsewhere).

B. News reporters' defense to theft offenses

§ 1733(b) creates a defense for receiving stolen property where the property was received with intent to report the matter to a law enforcement officer or the owner of the property. § 1739(C) bars prosecution for theft of intangible government property where the defendant obtained the property by non-criminal means and used it solely for disseminating it to the public without deriving anything of value therefrom.

The ACLU strongly endorses the policies expressed in the affirmative defense of § 1733(b) and the bar to prosecution of § 1739(C). We are concerned, however, that § 1739(C) as currently written will not protect a news reporter who uses intangible government property as the basis for an investigative report for which he is paid his usual salary. It is not in the public interest for investigative reporters to be cut off from their usual sources of income while pursuing their profession; and we assume that such was not the intent of the bill's drafters.

We suggest therefore, that § 1739(C)(2) be amended to read: "* * * the defendant obtained or used the property for the purpose of disseminating it to the public, and not for the primary purpose of deriving anything of value. * * *"

Thank you for the opportunity of appearing before the Subcommittee.

Mr. SHATTUCK. There are two parts to our testimony. First I would like to present an overview of the bill, S. 1437, and point out some ways in which it is an improvement over prior bills and other ways in which we continue to see problems in it.

Then Ms. Crisman of the ACLU national prison project will focus on the issues which many of the other witnesses this morning, and in previous hearings, have focused on, which is the sentencing structure of S. 1437.

We all know that the opportunity to codify the criminal laws is a rare opportunity indeed. I suppose that most people would agree that it is also a rare opportunity to improve those laws.

That is the spirit in which we at the ACLU have reviewed S. 1437.

We recognize that the bill is an improvement over S. 1 and earlier bills which we strongly opposed and felt should not be enacted under any circumstances. But we also recognize that S. 1437 poses dangers to civil liberties, some of which are not found in existing law at all.

Before I review the details of the bill, let me summarize the principles that we have tried to follow in reaching our conclusions.

The first principle is the one that Professor Dershowitz alluded to, and that is that where there is no victim, there should be no crime. I think there are at least two very compelling social reasons for this.

First, the society should not be in the business of telling people what is harmful to them. It should not be in the business of legislating morality in the criminal law. That is certainly true when it comes to locking people up or otherwise penalizing them under the criminal code, even if certain warnings to people can be given that things may be harmful to them.

The second reason is that it is an incredible waste of judicial and law enforcement resources to focus on victimless crimes when there are so many crimes with victims that go unpunished. One very dramatic example of this is the fact that in the last few years there have been the same number of arrests nationwide for marihuana offenses as for all other major crimes of violence combined.

In fact, speaking to this question of wasted resources, there is every reason to believe that we actually create crime by stigmatizing people with criminal records so that they cannot get employment and they become social and economic outcasts and in some instances will then have to turn to crime. This is a result of criminal laws which penalize those who are engaged in what we broadly categorize as victimless crimes.

This point has been made again and again in the Presidential Crime Commission reports. I will not dwell on it here.

So, we believe that an enlightened criminal code should eliminate victimless crimes and focus on while-collar crimes and crimes of violence.

Our second principle is that the criminal law should not undermine crucial constitutional rights, such as free speech, due process of law, the right of privacy, the fourth amendment, and the whole range of protections in the Bill of Rights.

From our point of view, as I am sure you are aware, Mr. Chairman, there is no room for compromise on the question of undermining constitutional rights in the enactment of a criminal code.

In the first amendment area, for example, it is essential that the criminal law stay clear of speech and thought and association and focus on conduct and not on behavior that is protected, even if that behavior is controversial or might possibly be leading toward crime.

There is a whole range of offenses which must be carefully drafted in this area. These are the so-called inchoate offenses, such as conspiracy and solicitation, which is a new offense in S. 1437, as well as obscenity in the area that Professor Dershowitz was touching on, and the laws regulating demonstrations and assembly.

There are many provisions in S. 1437 which come very close to protected speech, and we have set forth in the prepared statement ways in which those provisions must be amended in order to avoid trampling on that speech.

There are other areas. There are the areas affecting the press, for example, which I will get into in a moment, and laws intended to protect the national security, or national defense.

These all come very close to protected speech, and unless extremely, carefully drafted—we would submit, more carefully than is presently the case in S. 1437—will have a serious impact on first amendment rights.

The same thing, of course, is true of investigative authority which intrudes on privacy, or can intrude on privacy, such as wiretapping, search procedures, and the administration of the criminal justice system and the evidentiary rules which can also touch very closely on constitutional rights, and must be very carefully drafted.

In sum, I would say in no area should we sacrifice constitutional rights to criminal law, which is not to say that laws cannot be narrowly drafted, that is, with care and attention. We think the task can be accomplished.

Our third principle involves the fairness of the sentencing system. In this area, my colleague, Ms. Crisman, will present to you our testimony and our view of the sentencing structure of S. 1437, after I have concluded with an overview of the bill.

We have examined the bill under these general principles. As you might suspect, we have been rigorous in our review and have not hesitated to identify problems. We have already identified many of these problems to your staff in the drafting stages of the bill. We will set them in the record in the prepared testimony which I have submitted.

Based upon our review, our general conclusion is that S. 1437 does indeed represent an improvement over S. 1, but in key respects as now drafted, it fails to seize the opportunity for significant reform of the criminal law, and it contains a substantial number of provisions which threaten constitutional rights.

Before I summarize these sections, let me review quickly the bill's major civil liberties improvements over S. 1.

First, and now importantly to us is the elimination of the official secrets section and the Nuremberg defense for Government officials. The repeal of the Smith Act is also important. This penalizes advocacy of the overthrow of the Government and, of course, is right in the middle of this area of criminal law intruding upon constitutional rights. The repeal of the Logan Act which prohibits private communication to a foreign government is, of course, important. It was this law, passed way back in 1799, which the Government attempted to use against U.S. citizens who contacted and visited North Vietnam during the war there in an attempt to achieve peace.

The expansion of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 to make it a criminal offense to discriminate on the basis of sex and strengthen the law to permit prosecution of any person who deprives another by intimidation of federally protected civil rights is also important.

There is also the return to the constitutional requirements of proof of treason and the improvement of the definition of rape by making it sex neutral and clarifying the type of force required and eliminating the necessity for corroborating the victim's testimony and elimination of the crime of disorderly conduct, proposed for the first time in S. 1, and finally, the repeal of the speech related crime of impairing military effectiveness by false statement.

These are improvements over S. 1. We recognize them as such. But these improvements are balanced and in many respects over-shadowed by a large number of sections in the bill which would have a negative impact on civil liberties. In my prepared statement I have analyzed these sections in detail. Let me summarize the areas in which they occur and brief them for you here.

First, there are the so-called inchoate offenses, contempt conspiracy, complicity, and the new crime of solicitation, all of which, as drafted, reach beyond specific criminal conduct. As drafted, they reflect many of the constitutional difficulties of inchoate offenses.

Because the focus of these offenses is on precriminal associations and relationships, on thinking and on speech, they are dangerously vague and overbroad. There are ways in which this bill can be improved to eliminate the overreaching of these inchoate offenses. We would commend to you, Mr. Chairman, the suggestions that we have made in our prepared statement.

The second area involves the national defense. Here the bill contains a number of offenses which cut severely into political activity and the right of assembly.

For example, the impairment of military effectiveness section, as drafted, would probably have permitted the arrest and prosecution of antiwar demonstrators in many situations during the great national controversy over the Vietnam war. We know that is not the intent of the section, and we trust that is not the way it would be used. But an over-zealous prosecutor could certainly read the impairment of military effectiveness section in that manner. We have again suggested ways in which that could be improved.

A third and related area is the series of sections involving interference with government processes. Here again, the right of political assembly and speech is restricted by, for example, broadly defining the crime of obstructing a Government official in the performance of his duty. Or, the attempt to influence a judicial proceeding, which has been improved over S. 1, but requires further amendment so that it does not impinge on First Amendment rights, and the new crime of failing to obey a public safety order, which again, is a crime we do not find in existing law.

In another area we are concerned that S. 1437 will perpetuate some of the dangers of political surveillance and political investigations by, for example, reenacting the use immunity standard of the grand jury investigations. The grand jury was one of the principal elements in the abuse of the Justice Department under Attorney General Mitchell when the grand jury was used to round up and question large numbers of people who were forced, under a use immunity standard, to give their testimony.

The bill also creates a new crime of making a false oral statement to any law enforcement official, and I think for the same reasons that Professor Dershowitz has identified, we have serious problems with that. As he said, it is not generally the perception of American people that oral statements will get them involved in criminal violations. Beyond that we think this section would invite a swearing contest between the police and dissenters or others in contact with the police over whether or not some statement was, in fact, made by the person charged.

A fifth area in which the bill threatens civil liberties involves constitutional safeguards in the administration of criminal justice. In several respects, these are undermined by S. 1437. For example, there is the provision permitting a court to find that a confession was voluntary even if the defendant did not receive Miranda warnings before making a confession. Another provision permits the use of illegally obtained evidence in sentencing proceedings.

In the area of obscenity regulation, we are disappointed that S. 1437 follows the trend of the Burger court towards removing Federal protections of constitutional rights by mandating community rather than national standards in defining obscenity and by codifying the Supreme Court decision in Miller v. United States.

This means that a defendant charged with disseminating obscene materials under Federal law could be prosecuted in any district in the country where those materials are found under the venue provisions of this bill, and the standard to be applied against him would be the local one, even if he had never set foot in that district. As Professor Dershowitz pointed out, this could result from the mere fortuities of the mail system.

Another area in which we are concerned about the reach of S. 1437 involves offenses which cut into freedom of the press. Again, we trust that this is not the intent of the bill, but as drafted, there are several dangers. For example, there is nothing to indicate that the crime of obstructing a Government function by fraud, which is found in the bill, would not be applied against a person who publishes a Government document obtained outside the Freedom of Information Act.

There is no reason for us to believe that this is the intent of that section. But there is, by the same token, no evidence or no indication that there is a defense for a journalist who publishes a Government document obtained without resorting to the Freedom of Information Act.

We have a similar question about the offense of tampering with the Government record. Publishing a record should not be construed as tampering, but again it might be under this section where there are no affirmative journalist offenses inserted. We understand the committee is considering this problem and hopefully there will be improvements here.

Finally, in the extremely difficult area of the disposition of incompetent offenders, we have proposed several amendments. We recognize that the subject is complicated. We urge the committee to turn to the large number of experts in this field, particularly Professor Heathcote Wales of Georgetown University, who has been very helpful to us in formulating our position, and whom, we understand, will be appearing before the committee.

Although the chapter on the disposition of incompetent offenders is an improvement over existing law in some respects, we feel that in another respect, it improperly expands Federal authority to commit a person who is found not guilty by reason of insanity.

To avoid the prejudice of having the same authority commit a person who has been found not guilty for any reason, the commitment proceedings, we believe, should take place in State rather than in Federal court.

Obviously, there is a great deal more in my statement than I covered in this summary of its highlights. I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that the specific proposals we have made, which I will not go through here, will be seriously considered by the committee so that the bill can become a gain rather than a loss for civil liberties.

I would like to turn to Ms. Crisman now who will focus for you our thoughts on the sentencing structure. Before she testifies, let me point out that the ACLU national prison project has had a great deal of experience in the area of sentencing and incarceration and parole. Her testimony will reflect this experience.

Senator KENNEDY. Ms. Crisman, we are glad to have you here. You will have to excuse me for a moment. I do not want to be a name dropper, but I have a meeting with the President at 12:45 on airline deregulation.

So, we will take that testimony and come back at 2:15 and hear our final witness, Benjamin Ward. I have gone over your testimony. You are very close to the approach we are taking.

At that time we will have about 40 minutes. So, would you like to proceed, or you can come back at that time.

Ms. CRISMAN. I can proceed. I can highlight my testimony. Also, if there are questions, I will be happy to take them.

Senator KENNEDY. I must leave.

Please proceed.

Ms. CRISMAN. My name is Nancy Crisman and I am a staff attorney with the national prison project of the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation in Washington, D.C. I would like to thank the subcommittee for inviting me to testify. Through litigation and public education, the national prison project seeks to protect and strengthen prisoners' rights, to improve conditions in the Nation's prisons and to develop rational, less costly, more humane and more effective alternatives to incarceration. We are primarily a litigation project and it is from the lessons we have learned in that arena that I speak today.

Any analysis of the sentencing proposals now pending before this subcommittee must begin with an examination of the problems caused by the existing statutory framework. At present, offenders are sentenced to prison for an indeterminate length of time; neither the offender, nor the court, nor the public has any idea or any control over how long the offender will actually stay in prison. Individual judges exercise wide, virtually unfettered discretion in determining who should go to prison and how long a sentence should be. Offenders are not accorded even the most rudimentary due process when they are sentenced. The U.S. Parole Commission decides when a prisoner is ready to be released, a decision which most experts agree cannot be and has not been made in any statistically fair way.

The results of this system have been disastrous. Incarceration has been overused as a primary sanction and virtually all of our prisons are overcrowded. There is a vast disparity in sentences in violation of all notions of justice and fundamental fairness and which breeds hostility, distrust and disrespect for the entire criminal justice system.<sup>1</sup>

We commend the drafters of S. 1437 for taking the initial steps to remedy the problems of the present sentencing structure. We are particularly pleased that you have included a Federal Sentencing Commission, sentencing guidelines, reasons for sentences, and appellate review of sentences in the bill. However, the bill falls far short of solving the critical problems of sentencing reform and the present half-hearted attempt at reform may create as many problems as it solves. Our concerns are as follows:

ALTERNATIVES

Any attempt at sentencing reform must emphasize the use of alternatives to incarceration; S. 1437 does not. We overuse incarceration as a sanction in this country. We send a greater percentage of the men and women convicted of crimes to prison than any nation in Western Europe.<sup>2</sup> There is now wide agreement among experts that over 50 percent of the people presently incarcerated could be released to the community without increasing the chances that they would recidivate and without endangering the community.<sup>3</sup> In one of our recent cases, Pugh v. Locke, 406 F. Supp. 318 (M.D. Ala. 1976), the Honorable Frank M. Johnson, Jr., Chief Judge of the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Alabama, declared the entire Alabama prison system unconstitutional. As part of the court's order, and to remedy the unconstitutionality, a team of experts reevaluated every prisoner in the Alabama prison system and concluded that approximately 40 percent of those incarcerated could immediately or shortly be placed in the community.

In addition, the destructive and dehumanizing effect of overcrowded institutions on the people incarcerated in them is becoming more widely recognized.<sup>4</sup> Prisoners are forced to spend almost all of their time idle, with little or no privacy, subject to unbearable noise, in an atmosphere of hostility and in constant fear of assault. Institutional emphasis on impersonal regimentation and control is increased. Tension and violence skyrocket. In the short run, wide scale violence or rioting is inevitable. Over the longer term, prisoners are physically and psychologically debilitated, their progress toward rehabilitation destroyed and their chance of reentering society successfully is reduced.

In the same Alabama case mentioned above, after hearing evidence on almost every aspect of the entire State prison system, as well as extensive expert testimony, Judge Johnson found as a matter of fact that Alabama's prisons necessarily and inevitably made people worse. It is no wonder that national statistics reflect that a large percentage of those in prison will commit a new crime upon release and that most correctional experts now acknowledge that we do not know how to rehabilitate.<sup>1</sup>

The excessive use of incarceration in closed institutions in light of this data, is antithetical to the interests of society as a whole. It not only fails to protect society from crime and brutalizes all who are subjected to these conditions, but it actually increases the likelihood that those who enter the criminal justice system for the first time will return time and time again.

To alleviate this problem a sentencing statute must contain a presumption in favor of the use of alternatives to incarceration for all offenders except where surveillance in the community has already failed or where the offender's recorded criminal behavior clearly demonstrates that protection of society cannot be afforded in any other way.

Senate bill 1437 would permit sentencing alternatives to be used, but does not require them or even encourage them (§§ 2101, 2102, 2202). The bill should provide for a range of alternatives, such as fines, restitution, forfeiture, intermittent incarceration, community supervision and community service, and require the sentencing authority to consider each of these alternatives before imposing a sentence of imprisonment. Senate bill 1437 provides, as alternatives to imprisonment, only fines and probation (§§ 2101, 2202). It allows forfeiture notice to victims and restitution to be used only "in addition to" rather than in place of fines, probation or prison (§§ 2004, 2005, 2006).

We would urge this subcommittee to adopt the provisions of Senate bill 204 on this issue. Senate bill 204 creates a presumption in favor of the use of alternatives to incarceration except in certain specified instances (§§ 8, 9). It provides for a range of alternatives which can be imposed instead of incarceration.

SENTENCING RATIONALE

Any sentencing reform must set forth a coherent rationale for sentencing. It should eliminate standards which have been proven ineffective and allow only criteria related to the seriousness of the offense to be used when setting sentences.

Washington Post. Interview with Norman Carlson, Director, Federal Bureau of Prisons, Washington Post, Apr. 13, 1975; see note 2, supra.

Several sections of S. 1437 permit sentences to be imposed for the purpose of providing the offender with "needed educational or vocational training, medical care or other correctional treatment" (§§ 101, 2003, 2102, 2202, 2302). The same criteria may be used to enhance the length of incarceration (§ 2302). Other sections allow the Sentencing Commission and Parole Commission to consider a defendant's education, vocational skills, mental, emotional and physical condition, employment record and family ties, when determining sentencing ranges and the date of release from prison (§§ 994, 3822, 3831). Another provision would make release from prison contingent on a finding that there is "no undue risk" that the offender will commit another crime or fail to conform to certain conditions of parole (§ 3831).

These criteria are totally unacceptable from both a correctional and a civil libertarian point of view. Current criminal justice data indicates that we do not know how to rehabilitate, or how to determine when a person has been rehabilitated. Almost every expert, including the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, agrees.<sup>1</sup>

The facts show that first, there is no proven correlation between participation in any prison program and lower recidivism rates.<sup>2</sup> Second, authorities agree that therapy or programs which are forced on an individual by the threat of the indeterminate sentence cannot be successful.<sup>3</sup> Third, parole boards and other professionals making determinations as to when people can be released from institutions cannot predict with any accuracy who will or will not commit another crime and that decisions based upon these predictions are wrong so frequently as to be considered completely arbitrary.<sup>4</sup>

Obviously, it is illogical and unjust to put someone in prison to do something to them that we do not know how to do—rehabilitate. Equally, it is illogical and unjust to make determinations as to how long a person must remain inside a prison based upon a determination of rehabilitation when we do not know how to make that decision in any objective way. The result of using these criteria can only create greater disparity and unfairness than already exist under the current system.

The "rehabilitation" criteria also present a serious threat to civil liberties. Obviously, the use of criteria which are inherently arbitrary and capricious to determine whether a person should go to prison or how long that person should stay in prison, raises serious due process problems. Moreover, using criteria like education, vocational skills, employment records, family and community ties to determine the freedom of offenders, a large percentage of whom are poor, undereducated and minorities, is grossly discriminatory and a violation of the 1st, 5th, 9th, and 14th amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Finally, permitting "prior criminal activity not resulting in convictions" to be used as a basis for sentencing decisions totally undermines the notion of a presumption of innocence which is fundamental to our criminal justice system and protected by the 5th and 11th amendments to the Constitution.

This is not to say that we must abandon rehabilitation efforts in prisons, only that the state of the art is such that no one can justly be sent to prison or kept in prison for the purpose of rehabilitation. Programs in prisons should be encouraged. In order to be successful, participation in the programs should be voluntary and not tied to release.

It is our firm belief that the only fair rationale for sentencing is what has been termed "just deserts."<sup>1</sup> The criteria for sentencing should be based on the seriousness of the individual's offense rather than on his or her need for rehabilitation or on the likelihood of recidivism.

Some of the criteria in the bill clearly do relate to the seriousness of the offense and can be measured with some degree of objectivity.<sup>2</sup> For example, "the nature and degree of harm caused by the offense," the offender's "role in the offense," "prior convictions" and "prior sentences" (§ 994). Senate bill 204 is limited to only "just deserts" criteria. We urge the subcommittee to similarly limit S. 1437.

FIXED SENTENCES

In order to limit judicial discretion and eliminate disparity in sentences, reform of our sentencing structure ought to establish a scheme for fixed or determinate sentences which grant the sentencing judge carefully defined power to modify a standard sentence only in cases involving certain specified aggravating or mitigating circumstances.

Senate bill 1437 will not accomplish these goals for two reasons: First, S. 1437 calls for the Sentencing Commission to establish a sentencing range for each category of defendant and each category of crime (§§ 994, 2301(b)). Depending on what that range is, this proposal could result in a wide variance in sentences. Moreover, S.

<sup>2</sup> Some of the other criteria in S. 1437 for determining sentences bear no relation whatsoever to any legitimate interest of the criminal justice system. For example: (1) the community view of the gravity of the offense; (2) the public concern generated by the offense; (3) the current incidence of the offense in the community; (4) the degree of dependence upon criminal activity for a livelihood (§ 994). Each of these criteria is totally irrelevant to any objective determination of just punishment, is highly prejudicial to defendants, and in all likelihood will increase disparity in sentences.

1437 allows the judge to sentence outside the guidelines (§ 3836). Although such a sentence is appealable, it will still allow for a significant amount of disparity.

Several experts who have studied these problems recommend a system of presumptive sentences.<sup>1</sup> Under that system, for each gradation of seriousness of criminal behavior, a definite penalty—the “presumptive sentence”—would be set. Individuals convicted of crimes of that degree of seriousness would receive the presumptive sentence, unless there were special, carefully defined circumstances of aggravation or mitigation. For example, a second serious offense would be considered an aggravating circumstance, requiring a more severe sentence than the presumptive sentence. Senate bill 204 sets out a presumptive sentencing proposal and I urge that this provision of S. 204 be adopted.

The second reason S. 1437 will not eliminate sentence disparities is that it does not eliminate the parole process. While the guidelines and criteria established by the bill and the Commission may narrow a judge’s sentencing discretion, the amount of time a person will actually serve will continue to be determined by a separate entity—the Parole Commission.

We join with the Attorney General, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, and many other experts who recommend that parole be abolished. However, we caution that if parole is abolished, any sentences established pursuant to a new sentencing bill must be short! Under our present system, a person is incarcerated for only a fraction of his or her maximum sentence. Under the Parole Reorganization Act even prisoners with life sentences are eligible for parole after no more than 10 years (18 U.S.C. 4205). In light of the debilitating effects of prisons, sentences under the new definite sentencing scheme should be no longer and preferably should be shorter than the time which is actually served under our present system. Again, only S. 204 seems to have been drafted with full awareness of these factors. It provides for a presumptive sentencing scheme and short sentences and we recommend that the subcommittee adopt its provisions.

If parole is maintained or phased out of existence instead of abolished, there is one provision of S. 1437 which must be eliminated. Section 2301(c) allows a judge to make a prisoner parole ineligible for up to nine-tenths of his or her sentence. In our opinion, this is one of the most egregious provisions in the entire bill. If enacted, this provision could result in shockingly harsh sentences, on a scale far worse than anything we know today under our present system. Moreover, this draconian provision is contrary to all current correctional thought which, I indicated earlier, favors short sentences.

SENTENCE REDUCTIONS

If some sort of definite sentencing scheme is adopted, and if parole is eliminated, two types of correctional programs assume increased importance and should be supported in the bill—(1) a program providing prisoners with good time credits for discipline free behavior and (2) a program which permits the prisoner greater access to the community. We agree with the Director of the Bureau of Prisons that offenders, particularly prisoners serving long sentences, must be given some "light at the end of the tunnel."<sup>1</sup> Under our present system, good time credits normally reduce a prisoner's sentence by one-third. In addition, prison administrators find good time a useful tool for encouraging good behavior. The problem with the system as it now exists is that the granting and denying of good time is, to a large extent, discretionary and is often abused.

We suggest the bill be amended to include a system whereby a prisoner can earn a specified amount of good time for every day of good behavior. The good time should be vested and not subject to removal. A prisoner may be subject to losing prospective good time for a disciplinary infraction but no more than 15 days. Any serious intraprison infraction should be handled by a court of law, not by taking good time as a sanction.<sup>2</sup>

Senate bill 1437 also allows release from prison for a number of reasons, including establishing family ties, participation in training and educational programs and work, § 3822. A number of studies have shown that furlough programs can be highly effective as a correctional tool as well as safe for the community.<sup>3</sup> They help prisoners maintain important community ties, give them an opportunity to participate in educational and vocational programs which are not available inside prisons and provide prisoners with an opportunity to work, learn skills, and earn money. Furlough programs have been particularly useful for helping offenders going through the difficult transition period from prison to the community.

One concern of the people who oppose abolishing parole is that there will be no after care for offenders leaving prison. Obviously, many of these same services can be provided to prisoners through the furlough system. We therefore urge the subcommittee to make the furlough program as effective as possible. Specifically, we suggest that § 3822(a) should be amended to allow the 30-day furlough to be extended. Often the prisoner who is nearing release would like to participate in a job training program or educational opportunity which will take longer than 30 days. We also believe that § 3822(c)(2) must be eliminated. This section provides that a prisoner can be furloughed to a job only in trades in which there is not a surplus of available labor in the community. With our current level of unemployment, this provision would virtually preclude prisoners from obtaining jobs. The ability of an offender to find employment upon his or her release has been shown to be directly related to his or her ability to lead a crime-free life. Therefore, unnecessary barriers to the employment of offenders should be removed.

<sup>2</sup> The bill also provides mechanisms for early termination of probation, parole, and prison on the recommendation of the controlling authority of §§ 2104(c), 3834(f), 2302(c)). We have no objections to these provisions. However, we recommend that some sort of mechanism be added so that the probationer, parolee, or prisoner can initiate a request for reduction.

APPEALS

The provision of S. 1437 which permits the appeal of sentences is a significant step in eliminating the disparities and inequities which are now the bane of our sentencing system (§ 3725). However, under this section appeals may be taken only from sentences which are outside the guidelines. Any attempt to minimize disparity in sentences must permit appeals from all sentences. Sentences within the guidelines could also be too severe or too lenient. Any defendant should have the opportunity to challenge the application of the sentencing standards to his or her particular case as well as the validity of the sentencing standards themselves.

Limits on the appellate procedure were apparently drafted in order to prevent the courts from being flooded with appeals. However, this is a highly unlikely result. Any nonmeritorious appeals can be handled summarily by the traditional appellate court doctrines. Senate bill 204 permits appeals from all sentences and we believe its provisions should be adopted (§ 13).

We also believe that the section of S. 1437 which permits the Government to appeal sentences which are too lenient is highly questionable from both correctional and constitutional standpoints. As I indicated above, most criminologists agree that we overincarcerate. In our law and order society there is a tendency to give long sentences regardless of the fact that such sentences are probably not necessary to protect society and regardless of the fact that such sentences may actually debilitate the prisoner. From a correctional standpoint it is not a good idea to give the Government an additional mechanism to enhance sentences.

More importantly, we feel that this provision, which allows the Government a second chance at giving a defendant a more severe or longer sentence violates the spirit of the double jeopardy clause and raises serious questions of its constitutionality.

SENTENCING COMMISSION

There are several problems with the structure of the new Commission which we urge the subcommittee to change. Senate bill 1437 and S. 181 provide that the Judicial Conference of the United States should select Commission members and that the Commission itself should be part of the judicial branch (§ 991). It is our position that sentencing is not the concern of judges alone. Sentencing is an integral part of the entire criminal justice system. The appointing authority for the Commission should be one whose interest is broad enough to take all of the variables into account. We join with several others from whom you have already heard to suggest that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, should appoint the Commission. Senate bill 204 already provides for this type of appointment (§ 4).

Considering the breadth and difficulty of the task the Commission must accomplish, we also think the membership of the Commission should be as varied and accomplished as possible. Neither S. 1437 nor S. 204 address this problem. However, S. 181 provides that membership of the Commission should not be limited to judges but should include practicing attorneys, criminologists, prison and parole authorities (§ 3802). This provision should be adopted. The Commission should also include exoffenders and prisoners in its membership.

Finally, we believe that the bill contains adequate review of Commission decisions. Congress has traditionally set Federal sentences. Although we believe that the complexity and scope of the presently proposed sentencing revision is much too complex and time consuming to be performed on the floor of Congress, we believe it is important that Congress maintain the ultimate veto power over the results of the Commission's work. Section 994(g) makes the sentencing standards promulgated by the Commission subject to congressional disapproval. This seems to be a satisfactory balance of interests.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT AND ACCESS TO INFORMATION

The ACLU is particularly disturbed that S. 1437 would exempt the Bureau of Prisons and the Parole Commission from the Administrative Procedure Act and its subchapters, the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act (§§ 3825, 3837 respectively). Under current law, both agencies are subject to all three acts except the Parole Board is exempted from the adjudication sections of the APA (18 U.S.C. § 4218).

The Administrative Procedure Act is intended to insure fairness and consideration of important administrative determinations, to make public information about Government decisions available and to prevent unwarranted invasions of personal privacy. It is even more important that these protections be afforded to prisoners because the agencies, to which they are subject, control every aspect of their daily lives, as well as their ultimate freedom.

Previously, the Bureau of Prisons and the Parole Commission attempted to avoid their responsibilities under these acts by claiming that they were not agencies. After protracted litigation, several courts have held that the two organizations are subject to the acts.<sup>1</sup> The courts found that the rules and practices of these two agencies have such a staggering impact on the life of a prisoner and his or her family that they are entitled to the protections afforded by these acts. The courts also found that the general public as well has an interest in the administration of these agencies and that the statutes should be followed. These hard fought battles should not be reversed by this legislation.

Questions about the availability of information are raised by several other sections of the bill as well. Sections 2002 (b) and (c), 3725(c), 3832(a), and 3833(c) concern presentence, preparole, and other sentencing materials. These sections provide for the gathering and use of these materials at every level of decisionmaking. They require that the materials be made available to the Government, the courts, and to prison, probation, and parole authorities. However, they do not provide that the materials should be made available to the individual. Each of these sections should be amended to require that all of these materials should be made available to the defendant and to his or her counsel subject to any previously existing statutory restrictions.

PROCEDURAL FAIRNESS

Several sections of the bill fail to meet minimum requirements of procedural due process and should be amended. First, the bill permits the conditions and length of an offender's probation or parole (if it continues to exist) to be modified, but it provides no procedures for a prisoner to participate in or state his or her reasons for objecting to the decision. Fundamental fairness requires that an offender should, at a minimum, have the opportunity to have a hearing, present evidence, and be represented by counsel before such a decision can be made—sections 2103(c), 2104(d), 3834(g).

Second, the bill is vague as to what due process procedures are to be accorded to a probationer whose probation is being revoked—section 2105. When he or she is taken into custody, section 3806, a bail hearing should be provided. When he or she is subject to revocation, the offender should be entitled to a hearing, the opportunity to present evidence, and to be represented by counsel.

The procedures for revocation of parole are equally lacking in due process, section 3835. Where a person's freedom is concerned full due process should be accorded. The bill should be amended as follows: (1) An offender taken into custody should be given an opportunity for a bail hearing since he or she can be held in custody well over 60 days before the decision on revocation is made, section 3835(c); (2) The parolee should be provided with warnings and counsel at the preliminary hearing stage, section 3835(b); (3) Hearsay testimony should not be permitted, section 3835(d). For similar reasons we object to section 2803 which provides for a contingent parole term and allows a person to be sent to jail for up to 90 days without having committed a crime and without due process.

CONDITIONS OF PROBATION AND PAROLE

Several of the conditions to which the bill permits a probationer or parolee to be subjected are violative of the Constitution and should be eliminated. Specifically, sections 2103(b)(7) and 3834(e) provide that a parolee may be ordered to "refrain from frequenting specified kinds of places or from associating unnecessarily with specified persons." This provision infringes upon the basic constitutional right to freedom of association. Section 2103(b)(3) as it is referred to in section 3834 allows a probationer or parolee to be ordered "to refrain from possessing a firearm, destructive device, or other dangerous weapon." It is our opinion that "destructive device" is unnecessarily vague, subject to abuse and therefore a violation of the Constitution.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I commend the subcommittee for taking the important initial steps toward sentencing reform. However, the bill as it is presently drafted fails to solve many of the most fundamental problems which have motivated the call for reform. I urge this subcommittee to make the necessary amendments, or in the alternative, to adopt S. 204.

Mr. FEINBERG. Senator Kennedy did want two or three questions asked. I would like to ask them of you and your response will be part of the record.

The first is this. There is the recommendation that there be presumption in favor of probation. How do you justify that in light of an approach taken in S. 1437 that there should be no presumption either way and that the Sentencing Commission, in promulgating its guidelines, shall decide appropriate sentences in appropriate cases without regard to any presumption either in favor of probation or in favor of imprisonment?

Ms. CRISMAN. In fact, the Commission, when setting its guidelines, is going to come up with a set of criteria under which we can assess the seriousness of crimes. I assume that applying those criteria, is, in fact, going to establish presumptions.

In other words, there are clearly some crimes that are less heinous than others.

Mr. FEINBERG. Should not the Commission do that?

Ms. CRISMAN. Yes, but we are simply suggesting that the bill itself ought to give some guidance to the Commission based on what we currently know about prisons and prisoners.

Current studies of sentencing schemes, as they are applied throughout this country, show us that we are grossly over-incarcerating. Virtually 99 percent of our prisons are overcrowded, Federal prisons, as well as almost every State prison system. There are experts who have analyzed those populations and determined that almost 50 percent of those populations can be reduced and eliminated and can be put out in the community safely. We are paying huge amounts of money to incarcerate those people. We are incarcerating them in prisons which are, in fact, debilitating them, as Judge Johnson found in Pugh v. Locke.

Interestingly enough, part of his order in that case was to send in experts to analyze the population. They determined that 40 percent of the prisoners could be safely put out on the streets. They are in the process of doing that now. That is the only way that the Alabama prison system is going to continue.

You are hearing people like the Parole Commissioner tell you that one of the functions of the current parole board is to take people out of prisons, that is, to operate at the other end of the system and reduce disparity by reducing overcrowding in our systems.

We are suggesting to you that if the Commission is abolished, you will have to have a presumption right in that bill that is going to do something about the overcrowded status of our prisons, that is a presumption in favor of alternatives.

Mr. FEINBERG. Let me ask you one other question which has been on Senator Kennedy's mind, and a lot of other people's minds as well.

What about the argument that has been made in recent weeks that perhaps this bill and the statement of the ACLU goes too much the other way in the sentencing area.

The American Civil Liberties Union, by coming out for the abolition of the Parole Board, and by stating very clearly that rehabilitation should not be a function of imprisonment, or the purpose of imprisonment, then what about the argument that some people are making?

I am talking about Professor Vorenberg at the Harvard Law School, for example. The argument is that we are all too quick to push this new approach and that perhaps rehabilitation should be kept in the bill the way it is in the bill, that is, to the extent that the Commission finds rehabilitation applicable in the next few years and that there is a concern that we may be over-reacting the other way to what all would agree would be unacceptable situations today.

You are not the first witness who has said this, but I think what runs through the concerns of people like Professor Vorenberg, is the fear that we do not know enough about all of this. The ACLU, or anybody else, does not really know enough about this. It could be a fad. We are throwing out the parole boards and rehabilitation is out. It is strange that everyone is saying that.

How do you react to a statement like that? He is saying:

Hey, wait a minute. Let us leave rehabilitation in to the extent that it might be found to be applicable. Let us gradually phase out the Parole Board, but let us not willy-nilly abolish parole, because in another 3 years or 4 years or 5 years there may be another approach to sentencing that we have not even begun to deal with here today.

How do you react to that?

Ms. CRISMAN. First, any law you draft can subsequently be amended. I think that you are well aware that the proposed bills call for the setting up of a commission which is going to be packed full of experts who are going to continue to analyze the data as it comes in.

I assume that as science develops and as our research develops, and as we find out what works and does not work, we will modify our legislation.

Our major point is this. There is every indication right now that rehabilitation does not work. It is an incredible abuse of discretion to pretend to send someone to prison to do something that we do not know how to do.

Mr. FEINBERG. I agree.

Ms. CRISMAN. It is equally abusive to use this term "rehabilitation" to determine the length of time a person would spend in prison. There are innumerable studies which I have cited in my written testimony which indicate that any kind of decisionmaking board, when they look at any institutionalized population and say, "This guy is cured and this guy is not cured and we are going to let him out and not let the other one out," is simply guessing. They have no idea of what they are doing and their judgments have been proven inaccurate up to 75 percent. It is simply not a decision that we know how to make and should not be included in a sentencing guideline.

We are not saying that we should lock criminals away in warehouses forever. There have got to be programs inside prisons. Prison programs could be a lot better than they are today. If we reduced the population inside prisons we would have more resources to spend on that population. Then we might accomplish more.

Mr. FEINBERG. A technical question: Would you be satisfied with carrying forward current law concerning application of the Administrative Procedures Act to the Bureau of Prisons and the Parole Commission?

MS. CRISMAN. Yes, we would. We have litigated several cases on that. That is the reason we have taken this position. We do not want our cases reversed by legislation.

MR. FEINBERG. As Senator Kennedy stated, we will pick up with our last witness at 2:15.

The committee will stand in recess until that time.

AFTERNOON SESSION

SENATOR KENNEDY. The subcommittee will come to order.

We want to welcome Benjamin Ward, who is the commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services in the State of New York. Probably no State has more difficulty or complex problems than the State of New York in dealing with the whole system of criminal justice.

We know that Benjamin Ward made a very special effort to be with us. He came overnight from Florida to join us. It has been a long night and day for him. I apologize to him for the delay, but look forward to your testimony.

STATEMENT OF BENJAMIN WARD, COMMISSIONER, DEPARTMENT OF CORRECTIONAL SERVICES, STATE OF NEW YORK

MR. WARD. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I thank you for the opportunity to testify on S. 1437.

Just by way of background, since I am a State correctional commissioner, I thought I might talk a moment about New York State.

We are probably the third largest correctional system in the State systems. We have some 18,300 prisoners and over 16,000 parolees and over 11,000 employees in the correctional system, 6,000 of whom are correctional officers.

Field parole services are under my jurisdiction and until the last few years the parole board as well was under the direction of the commissioner of corrections and now it is split out as a separate entity.

While I have been involved in criminal justice for more than 30 years, I currently am involved in one aspect of criminal justice—corrections. My concern today is the sentencing portion and the parole portion of the bill S. 1437.

I am particularly pleased to be here today because I am a black State commissioner of corrections, and to my knowledge I am the only black State commissioner of corrections in this country at this time, although your State [Massachusetts] at one time did have a black commissioner. That ought not to be important, but in this country, unfortunately, it is important.

I know how difficult it is for you as well as State legislators to deal with the problems of rising crime without appearing to do things that have racial overtones, particularly where so many of the Nation's prison inmates are black, brown, or red. I know it is difficult to advocate change, particularly when that change admits failure of a long-cherished scheme of sentencing and correctional theory that well-intentioned men designed to help the offender without undue harassment and punishment.

If my voice and some notoriety can make your task easier, then I am happy to be with you today.

Increasingly, the fundamental precepts of corrections are being subjected to intense scrutiny.

By the way, I would like to ask that my full statement be included in the record.

Senator KENNEDY. It will be included as if read.

[The material follows:]

THE INDETERMINATE SENTENCE: A COMMENTARY

(By Commissioner Benjamin Ward, New York State Department of Correctional Services)

Increasingly the fundamental precepts of corrections are being subjected to intense scrutiny.

Since corrections is a part of the criminal justice system, should it not operate under the basic principles of justice?

Is it sufficient to state that since corrections is in the business of rehabilitation, the question of a justice base has no proper meaning in the discipline of corrections?

Many factors have led to the reexamination of the basic precepts of corrections: the civil rights movement of the 1960's; the Viet Nam War; the erosion of the judicial "hands-off" policy toward corrections; the advent of Watergate; and, most importantly, the decades of the failure of corrections to achieve the rehabilitation of offenders.

The rehabilitation of offenders as a proper goal of corrections was not open to question for almost a hundred years following the Declaration of Principles of the National Prison Congress of October 1879 at Cincinnati, Ohio.<sup>1</sup>

The indeterminate sentence was the vehicle through which the new penology would be implanted.<sup>2</sup>

In the decade of the the seventies, the indeterminate sentence has come under especially severe attack.

In the Nineteenth Century, Americans, armed with a new conscience, with the humanitarian and rational ideals of the Enlightenment, and with the "can-do" spirit of a young nation, faced the problem of what to do with its deviant members, the criminals and the mentally ill. They responded by constructing asylums and prisons. Mental hospitals and prisons were developed at approximately the same time in America and their purposes, construction, organization, and methods significantly influenced each other.<sup>3</sup>

Although it was never fully practiced, corrections borrowed from the medical model.<sup>4</sup> Reception, classification, rehabilitation, and parole were the analogues of admission, diagnosis, treatment, and discharge to out-patient status.

Despite the absence of objective physiological conditions, "criminality" was inferred from criminal acts, and the offender was seen as the victim of a treatable malady.<sup>5</sup> Treatment, commonly called rehabilitation, required the development of an individualized treatment plan. Corrections became offender-oriented and punishment would henceforth fit the criminal rather than the crime.

<sup>4</sup> "The indeterminate sentence has always been justified by analogy to other forms of indeterminate confinement, such as commitment of the mentally ill. Cesare Lombroso directly analogized indeterminate imprisonment of the 'born criminal' to confinement of the insane." Alan M. With regard to the lack of physical manifestations of criminality, it will be recalled that the 19th Century penologist Cesare Lombroso attempted to establish the existence of objective physiological conditions or stigmata of criminality.

The prison sentence, now seen as a temporal framework within which to work a cure, acquired some of the flexibility of medicine where confinement to a hospital for an arbitrary "flat-time" was clearly absurd.<sup>6</sup> The power to set the prison term was transferred from the legislative and judicial to the correctional administrators of the executive branch.

In 1847, S. J. May, a leading prison reformer, stated the argument as follows: "You ask me for how long a time he should be sentenced to such confinement? Obviously, it seems to me, until the evil disposition is removed from his heart; until his disqualification to go at large no longer exists; that is, until he is a reformed man. How long this may be, no human sagacity certainly may predetermine. I have therefore for many years been of the opinion that no discretion should be conferred on our judges in regard to the length of a convict's confinement; that no term of the time should be affixed to any sentence of the court. The offender should be adjudged to undergo the duress and discipline of the prison-house, not for weeks, months, or years, but until that end for which alone he should be put there is accomplished; that is, until reformation has evidently been affected."<sup>7</sup>

A resolution to replace "peremptory" sentences, "measured by mere lapse of time," with "those of indeterminate duration. . . limited only by satisfactory proof of reformation" was unanimously adopted at the 1870 National Prison Congress.<sup>8</sup> The resolution stated that "with men of ability and experience at the head of our penal establishments, holding their offices during good behavior, we believe that it will be little, if at all, more difficult to judge correctly as to the moral cure of a criminal, than it is of the mental cure of a lunatic."<sup>9</sup>

As an enlightened means to secure public protection both through the reformation of the offender and his incapacitation for so long as he was considered dangerous, the principle of the indeterminate sentence was widely adopted. Although the "pure," totally open-ended indeterminate sentence of one day to life was rarely authorized in law and more rarely imposed, every state of the union had some measure of indeterminacy by the 1970's.<sup>10</sup> Suddenly, we are witnessing the beginning of a retreat.

The indeterminate sentence can be described as a noble experiment that has failed. After decades of experience, there is still no evidence in support of the hypothesis that criminals are sick, that we can treat them, or that we can determine the moment of cure.<sup>11</sup> Stripped of its theoretical basis, the indeterminate sentence serves only to increase the length and disparity of sentences, and is a cause of frustration for inmates and administrators. It undermines the ends of criminal justice by obscuring the nexus or link between crime and punishment and by enabling unjust discretionary treatment of offenders.

The indeterminate sentence often amounts to indefinite preventive detention.<sup>12</sup> In most jurisdictions, "the principal consideration in the decision to grant or deny parole is the probability that the inmate will violate the criminal law if he is released."<sup>13</sup> Aside from the ethical question of whether punishment to prevent uncommitted crimes is a right of the State, predictive techniques are not sufficiently advanced to allow the releasing authority to make this decision with acceptable accuracy. Research indicates that in order to detain the truly dangerous, a great many non-dangerous persons must also be detained.<sup>14</sup>

Professor Hans Toch presents the argument succinctly: "Followup studies of parolees across the country tell us . . . that one percent of parolees formerly imprisoned for homicide commit a new murder, and one percent of paroled rapists rape again . . . it is true that one could prevent some murders and rapes by refusing to parole all men convicted of such offenses. But as a consequence of this strategy, 99 persons would have been erroneously detained . . . to neutralize one individual who would repeat his offense."<sup>15</sup>

Any offender-oriented sentencing system requires that a great deal of discretion be allocated to the sentencing authorities. While I feel that a system with no room for discretion would be appropriate only in a world peopled by robots, we must recognize that unbridled discretion is certain to result in sentencing disparity and other abuses.

Discretion is supposed to make allowances for differences in attitudes, circumstances, and potential of offenders; in practice, however, it may reflect the attitudes, circumstances, and prejudices of criminal justice practitioners, be they policemen, judges, wardens, case-workers, or parole commissioners. In an experiment conducted at the University of California at Los Angeles, a sample of students with clean driving records placed Black Panther bumper stickers on their automobiles. "The experiment had to be terminated after several weeks because the $1,000 fund that had been set aside to pay fines had been exhausted by the immediate rash of tickets received by the students."<sup>16</sup>

Judge Marvin E. Frankel has said that sentences are "not so much in terms of defendants, but mainly in terms of the wide spectrums of character, bias, neurosis, and daily vagary encountered among occupants of the trial bench."<sup>17</sup>

The discretion of parole boards are in a sense lawless because most are not regulated by specific rules, criteria or guidelines. Decisions are generally not appealable, and even if they were, appeal of a decision based on broad criteria of none at all is meaningless.

The danger of abuse increases when discretion, in the name of individualized treatment, is conferred on bureaucratic agencies. As Caleb Foote noted in his study of parole in California, there is a tendency to compromise among a variety of conflicting interests including, in addition to the needs of the offender, "political pressure . . . cooperation with law enforcement and prosecution . . . the management interests of correctional bureaucracy . . . the pulse of seething unrest in inmate populations . . . widely divergent views (of colleagues) . . . budget priorities (and) administrative policies. . . ."<sup>18</sup>

Even where discretion is not abused, it will be perceived as arbitrary and discriminatory, with equally troublesome consequences for correction officials.

Although the indeterminate sentence was intended to promote the rehabilitative ideal, a number of observers feel that, because it is perceived as unfair in its implementation, it mitigates against the achievement of respect for the law,<sup>19</sup> and because release is in theory based on rehabilitation, it encourages insincere program participation, thereby diluting the quality and effectiveness of the programs. Prisons become theaters, inmates are the actors and parole boards, the critics.<sup>20</sup>

While rehabilitation, the cornerstone of the indeterminate sentence, has not generally been achieved, there has been an increase in the length of the sentences. Although existing evidence is inconclusive, it is probable that the indeterminate sentence has produced an increase in the average time actually served,<sup>21</sup> and many offenders serve more time (though some serve less) than they would have under a definite sentence structure. Of greater concern should be the fact that the additional time served is often for reasons unrelated to the offense for which the inmate was incarcerated (e.g., predicted dangerousness, failure to participate in institutional programs, or political pressures on the releasing authority).

The indeterminate sentence tends to sever the link of nexus between crime and punishment, and in so doing undermines the entire justice system. By diffusing responsibility for sentence length, reference by any of the participants (offender, victim, law-enforcement, judiciary, paroling authority) or the public to the reasons for punishment is difficult. Indeed, the differing perspectives of the judge (retrospective) and the parole board (prospective) dictate that there be more than one reason, with the perception that there is no reason. Tailoring of the punishment to the offender rather than the offense breaks the link. Any deterrent effect, special or general, of the sentence is weakened as punishment is terminated or continued for what the offender is rather than for what he has done.<sup>22</sup> Even the retributive effect is dissipated. These unfortunate effects are magnified as the decision concerning the length of the sentence is further removed in time from the commission of the offense.

In addition to the theoretical difficulties of the indeterminate sentence, it creates practical management problems. Administrators, as well as inmates, are aggrieved by the uncertainty of the time to be served. When the correctional agency can only guess at the inmate's release date, the development of a realistic program plan is difficult. There is no point in enrolling an inmate in a treatment program if, after completion, the effect will wear off with years of continued imprisonment. Alternately, it is a waste of resources to enroll an inmate in a program if he will be released prior to completion.

But the chief management problem is that the indeterminate sentence is a source of inmate discontent. The uncertainty of the release date may be a punishment in itself.<sup>23</sup>

Interestingly, Zebulon R. Brockway, one of the pioneer advocates of the indeterminate sentence, recognized this but felt that it was beneficial. "The indeterminateness of the sentence," he said, "breeds discontent, breeds purposefulness, and prompts to a new exertion. Captivity, always irksome, is now increasingly so, because of the duty and responsibility of shortening it and of modifying any undesirable present condition of it devolves upon the prisoner himself, and again, by the active exactions of the standards and criterion to which he must attain."<sup>24</sup>

Modern observers agree that uncertainty renders captivity more irksome, but do not agree that this is desirable. Whatever contribution the torture of suspense may make to prison discipline, it is more than offset by its creation of inmate frustration and aggression.<sup>25</sup> After the 1971 riot at Attica, where 43 men died in the retaking of the prison, the McKay Commission reported that "the operation of the parole system was a primary source of tension and bitterness within the walls."<sup>26</sup> My experience in speaking with prisoners at Attica and other New York State correctional facilities indicates that this is still true.

As a result of perceived inequities in the nation's sentencing policies, recent years have witnessed an emerging call for a narrowing of discretion and disparity. In 1962, the American Law Institute developed a Model Penal Code. The Code's most significant achievement for corrections was the development of statutory criteria for sentencing decisions.<sup>27</sup>

<sup>22</sup> Federal Judge Constance Baker Motley observes that "punishment is an effective device for altering conduct only if it is applied fairly and as a direct sanction against the conduct which is sought to be punished . . . By punishing the defendant for what he is rather than what he has done, some sentences loosen what may already be a fragile tie between the defendant and society." Constance Baker Motley, "Criminal Law: 'Law and Order' and the Criminal Justice System," in Telford Taylor, Constance Baker Motley, and James K. Feibleman, Perspectives on Justice (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1975), pp. 69-70.

<sup>23</sup> "The growing evidence of prisoner sentiment . . . indicate that the inmate experiences as cruel and degrading the command that he remain in custody for some uncertain period, while his keepers study him, grade him in secret, and decide if and when he may be let go . . . The uncertainty of the indeterminate sentence is experienced as a steadily galling affliction." Frankel, op. cit. (note 11), pp. 96-97.

<sup>25</sup> Cf. Foster, et al.: "Bitterness over unequal sentence lengths as well as tensions and frustrations arising from the uncertainties and irrationalities of the parole process are cited by correctional administrators, as well as prisoners, as a major contributor to violence within correctional institutions. Overcrowding, lack of adequate medical services, or poor food are secondary sources of prisoner grievances compared to the resentment engendered by the indefinite sentence. The cited violence was not limited to organized or spontaneous prison riots against correctional authorities; individual, random acts of violence against prison guards and other prisoners have been the more prevalent expression of frustration and outrage." <sup>27</sup> National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals, Corrections (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1973), p. 549.

In 1969, the American Bar Association expanded on the Model Penal Code along traditional indeterminate lines. While proposing generally low maximum sentences and limiting judicial discretion (with a provision for appellate review of sentences), the principle of indeterminacy was expressly preserved.<sup>28</sup>

In 1973, the National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals issued its report on corrections. Again, judicial discretion was limited by relatively low maximums and strict guidelines for deviating from sentencing norms. Strict definitions, for example, of persistent felony offenders, professional criminals, and dangerous offenders were developed.<sup>29</sup>

All three models substantially circumscribe the discretion of judges and parole boards. However, inasmuch as indeterminacy is retained, each model continues uncertainty and diminishes the essential crime-punishment link.

In the past few years, a variety of proposals for the elimination or reduction of indeterminacy have been published. They go by a variety of names—the Justice Model, the Just Deserts Model, Presumptive Sentencing—but they are substantially consistent in their aims and strategies.

The Quakers, more than anyone else, were responsible for the development of the American correctional system. It would be ironic—were it not that the Quakers have never forsaken their interest in offenders—that the American Friends Service Committee attacked the prison system in an influential monograph entitled Struggle for Justice (1971). The monograph focused on the inappropriate application of a medical model, the dangers of unfettered discretion, and recommended the abolition of the indeterminate sentence. Punishment should “fit the crime” and should be the least restrictive of alternatives. Rehabilitative services were to be made available on a truly voluntary basis since participation is no longer to be a consideration in the determination to release.<sup>30</sup>

In 1972, Federal Judge Marvin E. Frankel published Criminal Sentences: Law Without Order. Judge Frankel’s central theme is that the sentencing and release functions, exercised in an atmosphere of invisibility and unchecked by rule, are intolerably disparate. Judge Frankel calls for subjecting the discretion of judges and parole boards to clear checks. While the indeterminate sentence may in some cases be proper, it “has produced more cruelty and injustice than the benefits its supporters envisage,”<sup>31</sup> and is “usually evil and unwarranted.”<sup>32</sup> The “presumption ought always to be in favor of a definite sentence, known and justified on the day of sentencing (and probably much shorter than our sentences tend to run). There should be a burden of justifying an indeterminate sentence in any particular case—a burden to be satisfied only by concrete reasons and a concrete program for the defendant in that case.”<sup>33</sup>

In 1973, in a lecture at the Northwestern University School of Law, another Federal Judge, the Hon. Constance Baker Motley, reiterated that the practice of sentencing and release decisions are without law and order. She proposes fixed sentences for purposes of punishment and deterrence without reference to rehabilitation.<sup>34</sup>

In 1974, Norval Morris in The Future of Imprisonment recommended that punishment be based on “desert,” a concept similar to but not synonymous with retribution, which links crime and punishment and limits the allocation and severity of punishment.<sup>35</sup> While rehabilitation is not a purpose of the prison sanction, services should be offered; the emphasis is changed from “coerced cure” to “facilitated change.”<sup>36</sup> While “predicted dangerousness” is not to be considered in the decision to imprison (or in the decision to release), “graduated testing of increased increments of freedom must be substituted for parole predictions of suitability for release.”<sup>37</sup>

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., pp. 41–43. Milton Rector, according to David Fogel, suggests a similar technique: “the periodic mandatory release of prisoners with assessments of how the prisoner fares on those furloughs as determination of readiness-for-release decisions.” Fogel, op. cit. (note 1), note on p. 241.

David Fogel's well-known proposal that corrections be based on a due process or "justice" model was published in 1975. In the pursuit of justice, Fogel advocates a return to totally "flat time" sentences for different classes of felonies. Sentence may be reduced through good time, earned at the rate of a day-for-a-day and vested. Parole boards would be abolished. Legislatively fixed sentences for each offense category would be reduced or increased by the court, within predetermined limits and under specified circumstances indicating aggravation or mitigation.<sup>38</sup>

Two committee reports came out in 1976. Although the Report of the Committee for the Study of Incarceration, written by Andrew von Hirsch, is popularly called the "Commensurate Deserts" model, and the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Criminal Sentencing calls its proposal "Presumptive Sentencing," they are very similar in aim and substance. Imposition of the criminal is justified, and limited, on the grounds that the specific criminal act, coupled with the interests of the public at large, merits punishment. Desert is posited as a requirement of justice.

Each model recommends that conviction for a particular crime "presumes" a given sentence. Variation from the presumptive, legislatively fixed sentence, may be made on the basis of prior convictions and specified aggravating or mitigating standards.<sup>39</sup>

Just deserts, the justice model, and presumptive sentencing severely curtail judicial and administrative discretion, make the punishment fit the crime, and generally admit good time in the interests of prison discipline.

Maine adopted definite sentencing effective March 1, 1976. Indiana has legislatively passed and California has enacted determinate sentencing. Bills are pending in Alaska, Colorado, Connecticut, Illinois, Ohio and Washington. In Florida, South Dakota, and Virginia, legislative commissions are studying fixed prison terms.<sup>40</sup> United States Senators Hart and Javits recently proposed (United States Senate Bill S. 204) that the Federal criminal justice system adopt a presumptive sentencing model. Senator Edward Kennedy and Senator John L. McClellan have a similar bill (United States Senate Bill 1437).

While it is difficult to summarize, the new models generally establish crime categories to each of which a scale of terms is attached. Most of the models assume a fixed sentence at a particular point on the scale, and specify the circumstances (such as prior convictions or use of a weapon) under which the sentence may be set at a higher or lower point within the range. In each model, sentences are subject to reduction through the application of good time credits.

According to David Fogel, "an important chorus . . . is developing, seeking a sensible sentencing scheme."<sup>41</sup> The American Law Institute's Model Penal Code; the National Council on Crime and Delinquency's Model Sentencing Act; the American Bar Association's Standards Relating to Sentencing Alternatives and Procedures; the National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals' Report on Corrections; the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice; the New York State Citizens' Inquiry on Parole and Criminal Justice; the Committee for the Study of Incarceration; and the Group for the Advancement of Corrections represent an emergent consensus that sentencing criteria should be statutorily required; that sentences should be based upon classification of offenders into risk categories; that sentences should be more definite; that they should be reviewable; that they should be shorter; and that they should be imposed only when a satisfactory community-based alternative is not practicable.<sup>42</sup>

With respect to sentencing policy, correction is coming into full circle.

Correctional administrators tend to look warily at flat time sentencing proposals. They fear that sentences will be unnecessarily severe; that prison populations, <sup>39</sup> von Hirsch, op. cit. (note 14); Twentieth Century Fund, Fair and Certain Punishment: Report of the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Criminal Sentencing (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976). Whereas the other "flat time" proposals discussed eliminate the paroling authority, the Twentieth Century Fund grants it a limited power to reduce a sentence "within a previously fixed range and on the basis of relevant information . . . that was not available to the sentencing judge . . . to facilitate the prisoner's transition to the outside community or because of compelling medical needs" (p. 22).

already at the breaking point, will increase; and that, because the indeterminate sentence is based on the rehabilitative ideal, the death of the one will mean the death of the other.

Determinate certainly need not mean longer. Comparative lengths will depend on the existing practices and models adopted by individual jurisdictions. California's flat sentences will be based on the average time served over the last six years.<sup>43</sup>

A recent LEAA funded study concluded that, excluding enhanced terms, "the lengths of sentences . . . contrary to the popular presumption, are on the whole either shorter or similar to the average time served under the indefinite sentence in California, Illinois, and Minnesota . . ."<sup>44</sup>

Whether prison populations will increase is also a matter for speculation; average time served is only one of many factors affecting the prison census.

It is understandable that correctional administrators fear that the abandonment of the concept of indeterminacy threatens programs. Indeed before supporting the bill, the California Department of Corrections sought and received assurances that there would be no cut-backs in funds for programs which will be voluntary.<sup>45</sup>

While rehabilitation is necessary to the indeterminate sentence, the indeterminate sentence is certainly not necessary to the pursuit of rehabilitation.<sup>46</sup>

Offenders must be given the opportunity to acquire some of the skills for successful living in a technological society.

The indeterminate sentence should be abolished because it is an unjust basis for sentencing; and because, being perceived as unjust and discriminatory, it mitigates against rehabilitation. The indeterminate sentence should be abolished because it breeds unnecessary frustration in the prison setting. Finally, the indeterminate sentence should be abolished because it undermines justice by breaking the link between crime and punishment.

In its place, I suggest the presumptive sentencing model. Presumptive sentencing eliminates uncertainty and reduces discretionary disparity while avoiding the danger of inflexible rigidity. The punishment is commensurate with and clearly a consequence of the criminal act. A primary source of bitterness, frustration, anxiety, and cynicism is removed. Criminal justice, operating in a visible theater, becomes known and knowable in advance.

Mr. WARD. Many factors have led to the reexamination of the basic precepts of corrections: The civil rights movement of the 1960's; the Vietnam war; the erosion of the judicial hands-off policy toward corrections; the advent of Watergate; and, most importantly, the decades of the failure of corrections to achieve the rehabilitation of offenders.

The rehabilitation of offenders as a proper goal of corrections was not open to question for almost 100 years following the declaration of principles of the National Prison Congress of October 1870 at Cincinnati, Ohio.

The indeterminate sentence was the vehicle through which the new penology would be implemented.

In the decade of the seventies, the indeterminate sentence has come under especially severe attack.

In the nineteenth century, Americans, armed with a new conscience, with the humanitarian and rational ideals of the enlightenment, and with the can-do spirit of a young Nation, faced the problem of what to do with its deviant members, the criminals and the mentally ill.

<sup>46</sup> It is suggested above that relating release to progress in rehabilitative programs may dilute the quality of participation in programs. Professor Toch suggests that definite sentences may in fact be a spur to rehabilitation: "But a short sentence is a challenge for treaters to do the best they can in the time they have. It may even enhance their work. Freund recommends fixing terminal dates for complacent patients, and he notes that this often inspires serious efforts to change." Toch, op. cit. (note 15), p. 119.

They responded by constructing asylums and prisons. Mental hospitals and prisons were developed at approximately the same time in America and their purposes, construction, organization, and methods significantly influenced each other.

Although it was never fully practiced, corrections borrowed from the medical model. Reception, classification, rehabilitation, and parole were the analogs of admission, diagnosis, treatment, and discharge to out-patient status.

Despite the absence of objective physiological conditions, criminality was inferred from criminal acts, and the offender was seen as the victim of a treatable malady. Treatment, commonly called rehabilitation, required the development of an individualized treatment plan. Corrections became offender-oriented and punishment would henceforth fit the criminal rather than the crime.

The prison sentence, now seen as a temporal framework within which to work a cure, acquired some of the flexibility of medicine where confinement to a hospital for an arbitrary flat time was clearly absurd. The power to set the prison term was transferred from the legislative and judicial to the correctional administrators of the executive branch.

A resolution to replace peremptory sentences, measured by mere lapse of time, with those of indeterminate duration, limited only by satisfactory proof of reformation, was unanimously adopted at the 1870 National Prison Congress. The resolution stated that

With men of ability and experience at the head of our penal establishments, holding their officers during good behavior, we believe that it will be little, if at all, more difficult to judge correctly as to the moral cure of a criminal, than it is of the mental cure of a lunatic.

As an enlightened means to secure public protection both through the reformation of the offender and his incapacitation for so long as he was considered dangerous, the principle of the indeterminate sentence was widely adopted. Although the pure, totally open-ended indeterminate sentence of 1 day to life was rarely authorized in law and more rarely imposed, every State of the Union had some measure of indeterminacy by the 1970s. Suddenly, we are witnessing the beginning of a retreat.

The indeterminate sentence can be described as a noble experiment that has failed. After decades of experience, there is still no evidence in support of the hypothesis that criminals are sick, that we can treat them, or that we can determine the moment of cure. Stripped of its theoretical basis, the indeterminate sentence serves only to increase the length and disparity of sentences, and is a cause of frustration for inmates and administrators. It undermines the ends of criminal justice by obscuring the nexus or link between crime and punishment and by enabling unjust discretionary treatment of offenders.

The indeterminate sentence often amounts to indefinite preventive detention. In most jurisdictions, the principal consideration in the decision to grant or deny parole is the probability that the inmate will violate the criminal law if he is released. Aside from the ethical question of whether punishment to prevent uncommitted crimes is a right of the State, predictive techniques are not sufficiently advanced to allow the releasing authority to make this decision with acceptable accuracy.

Any offender-oriented sentencing system requires that a great deal of discretion be allocated to the sentencing authorities. While I feel that a system with no room for discretion would be appropriate only in world peopled by robots, we must recognize that unbridled discretion is certain to result in sentencing disparity and other abuses.

Discretion is supposed to make allowances for differences in attitudes, circumstances, and potential of offenders; in practice, however, it may reflect the attitudes, circumstances, and prejudices of criminal justice practitioners, be they policemen, judges, wardens, caseworkers, or parole commissioners.

Judge Marvin E. Frankel has said that sentences are "not so much in terms of defendants, but mainly in terms of the wide spectrum of character, bias, neurosis, and daily vagary encountered among occupants of the trial bench."

The discretion of parole boards is in a sense lawless because most are not regulated by specific rules, criterias, or guidelines. Decisions are generally not appealable, and, even if they were, appeal of a decision based on broad criteria or none at all is meaningless.

The danger of abuse increases when discretion, in the name of individualized treatment, is conferred on bureaucratic agencies.

There is a tendency to compromise among a variety of conflicting interests including, in addition to the needs of the offender, political pressure, cooperation with law enforcement and prosecution, the management interests of correctional bureaucracy, the pulse of seething unrest in inmate populations, widely divergent views of colleagues, budget priorities, and administrative policies.

Even where discretion is not abused, it will be perceived as arbitrary and discriminatory with equally troublesome consequences for corrections officials.

Although the indeterminate sentence was intended to promote the rehabilitative ideal, a number of observers feel that, because it is perceived as unfair in its implementation, it mitigates against the achievement of respect for the law, and, because release is in theory based on rehabilitation, it encourages insincere program participation, thereby diluting the quality and effectiveness of the programs. Prisons become theaters, inmates are the actors, and parole boards are the critics.

While rehabilitation, the cornerstone of the indeterminate sentence has not generally been achieved, there has been an increase in the average time actually served, and many offenders serve more than—though some serve less—than they would have under a definite sentence structure. Of greater concern should be the fact that the additional time served is often for reasons unrelated to the offense for which the inmate was incarcerated—for example, predicted dangerousness, failure to participate in institutional programs, or political pressures on the releasing authority.

The indeterminate sentence tends to sever the link or nexus between crime and punishment, and in so doing undermines the entire criminal justice system. By diffusing responsibility for sentence length, reference by any of the participants—offender, victim, law-enforcement, judiciary, paroling authority—or the public to the reasons for punishment is difficult. Indeed, the differing perspectiveness of the judge—retrospective—and the parole board—prospective—dictate that there be more than one reason, with the perception that there is no reason.

Tailoring of the punishment to the offender rather than the offense breaks the link. Any deterrent effect, special or general, of the sentence is weakened as punishment is terminated or continued for what the offender is rather than for what he has done. Even the retributive effect is dissipated.

These unfortunate effects are magnified as the decision concerning the length of the sentence is further removed in time from the commission of the offense.

In addition to the theoretical difficulties of the indeterminate sentence, it creates practical management problems. Administrators as well as inmates are aggrieved by the uncertainty of the time to be served. When the correctional agency can only guess at the inmate's release date, the development of a realistic program plan is difficult. There is no point in enrolling an inmate in a treatment program if, after completion, the effect will wear off with years of continued imprisonment. Alternately, it is a waste of resources to enroll an inmate in a program if he will be released prior to completion.

But the chief management problem is that the indeterminate sentence is a source of inmate discontent. The uncertainty of the release date may be a punishment in itself.

Whatever contribution the torture of suspense may take to prison discipline, it is more than offset by its creation of inmate frustration and aggression. After the 1971 riot at Attica, where 43 men died in the retaking of the prison, the McKay Commission reported that "the operation of the parole system was a primary source of tension and bitterness within the walls." My experience in speaking with prisoners at Attica and other New York State correctional facilities indicates that this is still true.

As a result of perceived inequities in the Nation's sentencing policies, several new models have been proposed in recent years. Most of the new models recommend that conviction for a particular crime "presumes" a given sentence. Variation from the presumptive, legislatively fixed sentence, may be made on the basis of prior convictions and specified aggravating or mitigating standards.

Just deserts, the justice model, and presumptive sentencing severely curtail judicial and administrative discretion, make the punishment fit the crime, and generally admit good time in the interests of prison discipline.

Maine adopted definite sentencing effective March 1976. Indiana has legislatively passed and California has enacted determinate sentencing. Bills are pending in Alaska, Colorado, Connecticut, Illinois, Ohio, and Washington. In Florida, South Dakota, and Virginia, legislative commissions are studying fixed prison terms.

While it is difficult to summarize, the new models generally establish crime categories to each of which a scale of terms is attached. Most of the models assume a fixed sentence at a particular point on the scale, and specify the circumstances—such as prior convictions or use of a weapon—under which the sentence may be set at a higher or lower point within the range. In each model, sentences are subject to reduction through the application of good time credits.

An important chorus is developing, seeking a sensible sentencing scheme. The American Law Institute's Model Penal Code; the National Council on Crime and Delinquency's Model Sentencing Act; the American Bar Association's Standards Relating to Sentencing Alternatives and Procedures; the National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals' Report on Corrections; the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice; the New York State Citizens' Inquiry on Parole and Criminal Justice; the Committee for the Study of Incarceration; and the Group for the Advancement of Corrections represent an emergent consensus that sentencing criteria should be statutorily required; that sentences should be based upon classification of offenders into risk categories; that sentences should be more definite; that they should be reviewable; that they should be shorter; and that they should be imposed only when a satisfactory community-based alternative is not practicable.

With respect to sentencing policy, corrections is coming full circle.

Correctional administrators tend to look warily at flat time sentencing proposals. They fear that sentences will be unnecessarily severe; that prison populations, already at the breaking point, will increase; and that, because the indeterminate sentence is based on the rehabilitative ideal, the death of the one will mean the death of the other.

"Determinate" certainly need not mean longer. Comparative lengths will depend on the existing practices and models adopted by individual jurisdictions. California's flat sentence will be based on the average time served over the last 6 years.

A recent LEAA funded study concluded that, excluding enhanced terms, "the lengths of sentences * * * contrary to the popular presumption, are on the whole either shorter or similar to the average time served under the indefinite sentence in California, Illinois, and Minnesota."

Whether prison populations will increase is also a matter for speculation. Average time served is only one of many factors affecting the prison census.

It is understandable that correctional administrators fear that the abandonment of the concept of indeterminacy threatens programs. Indeed, before supporting the bill, the California Department of Correction sought and received assurances that there would be not cut-backs in funds for programs which will be voluntary.

While rehabilitation is necessary to the indeterminate sentence, the indeterminate sentence is certainly not necessary to the pursuit of rehabilitation. Offenders must be given the opportunity to acquire some of the skills for successful living in a technological society.

The indeterminate sentence should be abolished because it is an unjust basis for sentencing; and because, being perceived as unjust and discriminatory, it mitigates against rehabilitation. The indeterminate sentence should be abolished because it breeds unnecessary frustration in the prison setting. Finally, the indeterminate sentence should be abolished because it undermines justice by breaking the link between crime and punishment.

In its place, I suggest a more determinate sentencing model. Determinate sentencing eliminates uncertainty and reduces discretionary disparity while avoiding the danger of inflexible rigidity. The punishment is commensurate with and clearly a consequence of the criminal act. A primary source of bitterness, frustration, anxiety, and cynicism is removed. Criminal justice, operating in a visible theater, becomes known and knowable in advance.

The McClellan-Kennedy bill, S. 1437, recognizes that rehabilitation is only one of several purposes for which a penal sentence is imposed by a court of law. S. 1437 would require the sentencing judge to state in writing whether he is imposing the sentence for deterrence, incapacitation for protection of the public, retribution as an insurance of just punishment, or rehabilitation.

The present sentencing practices in this country leave the participating members of the criminal justice system in a state of confusion.

Judges frequently sentence for the purpose of retribution and this is often interpreted by correctional administrators as a sentence for incapacitation. Parole boards generally ignore both of these purposes for sentencing and operate on the theory that the purpose of all sentencing is for rehabilitation.

The McClellan-Kennedy bill will go a long way toward setting a standard which will eliminate this confusion at the State level as well as the Federal level.

Parole was created on the twin theories that prisons could rehabilitate prisoners and that penal authorities could predict human behavior. Experience has demonstrated the fallibility of both theories.

The idea of abolishing parole in the Nation's next criminal code may sound startling, but the concept is in fact eminently sensible. The combination of disparate sentences doled out for similar offenses and the quixotic and often arbitrary character of parole decisions has undermined the rationality of the criminal justice system and contributed greatly to prison tensions. One provision of the McClellan-Kennedy bill would sharply narrow the discretion of judges in sentencing. If accompanied by the elimination of parole, an inmate would serve his full sentence, less time earned for good behavior.

The result will be equal time for equal crimes. The criminal justice system gains by removing a cause of bitterness and tension in our volatile prisons, and by taking a giant stride toward fundamental fairness.

Just in case I was not going to get any questions, I thought that I would answer one that you asked of an earlier witness this morning. I think your question was this: Why shouldn't the defendant know before what his sentence will be and whether he will be released if he behaves himself in the correctional setting?

I do not know why he should not know that. I am hard pressed to understand how anyone can defend a system that says burglar A goes to prison and in my State he will not see a parole board for 10 months. At the end of that 10 months he will sit down with three parole board members who will then determine what his sentence will be. Burglar B, from another part of the State will come in with the same kind of crime and a similar type of background and see a different set of parole commissioners and receive an entirely different sentence.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask you: As I understand the argument, they say that you need parole to be sure of eliminating disparity. They say that a small group of people, the parole board, could assure a greater degree of certainty, and therefore justice, as it applies to the individual. They feel it is valuable and worthwhile.

How do you answer that?

MR. WARD. I disagree with that on several grounds. To begin with, I think the sentencing judge has more information available to him at the time of sentencing than a parole board has, even in a State like mine where they see them 10 months later.

If you look at the folders or the records of any of the inmates who are coming before that parole board then you will see the presentence report in which most of the information is contained. If you are in a system that is heavily programmed, as my State is and many other States are, the man quickly learns that the way to please the parole board is to become involved in programs. Therefore, he quickly becomes involved in programing to favorably impress the parole board.

Therefore, what good, really, is that 10 months in a controlled environment in which he has already begun to play the game so that he can favorably impress that small board?

If you want to argue that 500 judges will have more disparity than 12 parole commissioners, then certainly we cannot argue with that. However, I think that one of the most important decisions, one of the most important roles, that judges have in this country—particularly in large metropolitan districts like mine, where plea bargaining is the name for more than 9 out of 10 defendants—is sentencing. To take that judicial responsibility and legislative responsibility and shift it to the parole board, I think is a mistake.

SENATOR KENNEDY. How do you deal with plea bargaining? Should we be speaking of guidelines as well in that area? Does plea bargaining have a legitimate place? If it does have a legitimate place in society, how do you try and deal with it in a way that is going to eliminate disparity?

MR. WARD. Well, I think plea bargaining is greatly misunderstood by the public. If for no other reason, the public ought to be informed as to what is involved in it. I cannot find a sensible argument for administrative plea bargaining. That is the kind of plea bargaining that serves only the purpose of clearing the calendar. The people have a case that should be ready to go to trial and the only thing that is stopping them from going to trial is a crowded calendar, so you administratively plea bargain and get rid of the case.

There really is no excuse for that, as I think Senator Hruska stated. That ought not to be a reason for not giving a man his day in court.

I think there were other cases in which plea bargaining may be appropriate—particularly in those jurisdictions where police officials set the crime. They charge the robbery when prosecutors would admit that this is grand larceny. In those jurisdictions where prosecutors over-indict and indict for grand larceny when they clearly know that this really would fall within the petty larceny area, then you have those cases.

In those cases there is room for plea bargaining because clearly there is just no point in going forward with it. In your State, the man who goes over the line maybe unknowing with a gun in his possession and may unknowingly find himself facing a year. That ought to be plea bargained out.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you think many of the abuses of plea bargaining could be remedied by having it done in an open forum or an open session with everything on the record?

Mr. WARD. I really think so. I don't know of anyone supporting plea bargaining as it goes on in so many of our jurisdictions. It just happens. I don't know of anybody defending that system that makes believe that a judge is not a party to it.

Senator KENNEDY. Would that move us a long way down the road, do you think, in terms of a more fair and equitable—

Mr. WARD. I think it would put more equity into the plea bargaining and get rid of some of the disparity that goes on in the plea bargaining area. My lawyer, if I could afford the right one, would be able to get a better deal for me than the person who is a street mugger or the common house burglar who is trying to support a drug habit. He's got legal aid, and he gets in with a fellow who has got 50 or 60 cases, and his plea bargaining is not going very far.

Senator KENNEDY. There are those who say that we should not really get involved in terms of recodification until we deal with the social causes of crime. What is your reaction to that?

Mr. WARD. I disagree strongly. That seems to me to be the old excuse for doing nothing because we can't do everything. Surely we ought to be dealing with the root cause of the crime. Certainly there are high unemployment rates and many social factors that perhaps people could argue lead to crime. However, there is a great injustice going on within the criminal justice system.

Surely, within the criminal justice system there ought to—it ought to be the place where justice ought to prevail. Poor people, black people in particular, and minorities in general in this country, since they tend to be the poor, become the victims of this system that tends to be based upon rehabilitation.

With our great concern for these people, we put them in prison for their own good under this system. We put them in there because they need rehabilitation. We let some people whose fathers and mothers have millions of dollars go off on 5 or 6 years of probation because obviously they do not need rehabilitation.

The system operates against the poor. It operates against the minorities. The fact that we cannot straighten out our system in this country to provide employment for everyone and equal opportunity for everyone ought not to be tolerated as an excuse to do nothing about an area where we can do something.

Senator KENNEDY. I think you have answered the second point that I was going to bring up, and that is that, as Professor Dershowitz indicated, under the present system we do discriminate against the black and the poor and the other minorities.

Mr. WARD. Absolutely, Senator. You would only have to look at any State in this country to get rid of the myth that minorities, and blacks in particular, are not involved in criminal justice. They are greatly involved. They just happen to be on the other side of those bars and on the inside of those walls. That is where they are involved. It is the majority population that is putting them in there. In the name of rehabilitation we are imprisoning minorities for their own good so that we can help them.

I think that what we are doing—if you take a look at any one of our prison systems you would be hard pressed to come to the conclusion that prisons help anyone except you and me and my mother and my sister. They feel better when that rapist and that burglar and that robber get punished. That is what they think should happen to him.

Somehow or other we have gotten mixed up in this society and come to the conclusion that it is wrong to say “punish the person who breaks the law or violates our codes.” It is not wrong to do that. There is an expectation that that will happen. Don’t put him on the stocks and whip him or put him in a chair and shoot electricity through him or some of these kind of Draconian solutions. However, there is absolutely nothing wrong with separating him from society for reasonably short periods of time under relatively humane conditions of confinement. It is about time we got back to taking a good, firm look at that and admit that all criminals are not sick. Even those that are sick we do not have a cure for. We really do not know when the cure has taken place.

What we do know is that perhaps there is some deterrent effect to prisons. Certainly there is some incapacitation effect to it.

Senator KENNEDY. What can we do to help New York and the other State jurisdictions? I don’t know whether there are any others like New York, but what can we do?

Mr. WARD. Well, I started to say “send money.” However, aside from that, I think that the reason I am here and the reason I expressed the willingness to be here is that I think there is so much confusion in New York, as well as around this country, on this whole issue of indeterminacy and the whole question of rehabilitation. We need some guidance from the Federal level in the direction that corrections ought to go—maybe not for the next 100 years, but certainly after 100 years of a model that has not worked, and which no one is defending today.

I think that this bill goes a long way toward giving that direction.

Senator KENNEDY. I would just like to hammer home one final point. This is repeating a previous question, but I think it is important. The question is: If you have the minimums and maximums within a guideline, there have been those who say we ought to have it very narrow for every crime. For every crime we ought to have just one flat time. We have tried to have a very narrow range of flexibility. It might be 6 to 8 years—but we have to try and define it.

Do you think that that kind of protection which we have included in the sentencing provisions is sufficient to meet the kind of extenuating circumstances which may arise?

Mr. WARD. Yes, Senator. I can’t stress it too strongly. I think Professor Dershowitz was absolutely correct. There are no typical offenders, but when you look at a large aggregate of offenders there does seem to be a kind of typical offender. It is no one person, but one that you can put together.

Certainly, you can design a range of sentences that take into consideration the extenuating circumstances. The person who should get less and the person who should get more could be included in that range. If that is not sufficient, this bill gives enough. What this bill does is to allow increases in sentences or decreases in sentences to be written on the record with reasons given for why it is done. I think that gives enough flexibility to the statute to encompass these unusual cases without going into a straight indeterminate sentence.

Senator KENNEDY. Just briefly, and finally, do you think this bill is anti-civil-libertarian, in terms of trying to address this particular issue in the way that we have approached it?

Mr. WARD. Not at all. That is one of the main reasons that I am here. It is not at all anti-civil-libertarian in my regard. I would suggest that if there were some way that you could get into a prison and speak to the prisoners you would find that they would agree with what I say.

The most discouraging thing and the most uncivil thing is to not know when you are going to get out of prison. Prisoners are ready to accept some measure of deprivation of liberty for what they have done. However, they are not willing to accept open-ended punishment. There should be an end to the concept of "treatment until cured." We do not know when the cure takes place.

Senator KENNEDY. That was excellent testimony.

Mr. WARD. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. It was very, very helpful. We are going to be working with you.

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM ACT OF 1977

TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1977

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES OF THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:33 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Senator Strom Thurmond (acting chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Kennedy and Thurmond.

Staff present: Paul C. Summitt, chief counsel; D. Eric Hultman, minority counsel; Paul H. Robinson, counsel; Kenneth Feinberg, counsel to Senator Kennedy; and Mabel A. Downey, chief clerk.

Senator THURMOND. The subcommittee will come to order.

Our first witness this morning is Prof. Thomas I. Emerson, Yale School of Law, on behalf of the National Committee Against Repressive Legislation.

Mr. Emerson, since we have a lot of witnesses today, I would suggest that your entire prepared statement be included in the record, and then you may summarize if you are agreeable to that.

STATEMENT OF PROF. THOMAS I. EMERSON, YALE SCHOOL OF LAW, ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE AGAINST REPRESSIVE LEGISLATION

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; that is agreeable.

I should say that the statement has the approval not only of myself, but of Prof. Vern Countryman of the Harvard Law School as well as Prof. Carole Goldberg of the law school at the University of California at Los Angeles.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THOMAS I. EMERSON, LINES PROFESSOR OF LAW, EMERITUS

S. 1437, introduced in the Senate jointly by Senator McClellan and Senator Kennedy, represents the latest proposal for codification and revision of the Federal criminal laws. The bill is the result of a compromise, reached after long negotiations, between Senator McClellan and Senator Kennedy. It is a revision of S. 1, the notorious bill that was smothered in the Senate in 1976 as a result of widespread popular opposition.

S. 1437 is a substantial improvement over S. 1, as will be noted below. Nevertheless, S. 1437 retains a large number of provisions which, individually and in totality, are gravely detrimental to the American system of individual rights.

We must therefore oppose it. We continue to support revision and codification of the Federal Criminal Code. But we do not believe that such reform should be achieved at the price of sacrificing our civil liberties.

The many features of S. 1437 which are repressive on their face or in potential application can be grouped under the following categories:

(1) The inchoate offenses—attempt, conspiracy, and the new crime of solicitation—are dangerously vague and overbroad, and have enormous possibilities for oppressive use.

(2) While dropping the original provisions of S. 1 dealing with the publication of national defense and classified information, S. 1437 does not eliminate the dangers of establishing an official secrets act as part of our law, thereby imposing unprecedented restrictions upon freedom of speech and of the press.

(3) A series of provisions attempting to protect the executive branch of government from the impact of political opposition—including the new crimes of obstructing government functions by fraud and by physical interference—would seriously hamper many forms of political expression.

(4) The sections attempting to protect the judicial process—including provisions against “improperly” impairing the administration of justice and “resisting” a court order—could be used to limit drastically legitimate activities directed against judicial proceedings deemed to be unfair or oppressive.

(5) The attempt to shield military and defense operations from political opposition—including the offenses of impairing military effectiveness and of obstructing military recruitment—go substantially beyond what is necessary or proper in a democratic society which treasures the principle of civilian control over the military.

(6) Provisions affecting the right of assembly and demonstration—particularly the new crime of failing to obey a public safety order—could be used to curtail seriously the most effective form of political expression available to those without access to the mass media.

(7) The dangers inherent in political investigations and political surveillance are enlarged by several provisions, particularly the reenactment of use immunity, available in grand jury proceedings, and the creation of the crime of making a false statement to any enforcement official.

(8) Safeguards in the administration of criminal justice are reduced by several provisions, including one which would undermine the requirement of Miranda warnings in police interrogation, and one sanctioning the use of illegally obtained evidence in sentencing proceedings.

(9) The extortion and blackmail sections, as well as other provisions, bring a wide range of legitimate labor union activities under Federal control.

(10) The trend of the Burger Court toward removing Federal protections against infringement of individual rights is encouraged and accentuated by expressly mandating the use of community, rather than national, standards in obscenity cases.

(11) Reform of the penalty and sentencing procedures is undercut by providing mandatory sentences for some offenses and by delegating the task of achieving uniformity in sentencing to a Sentencing Commission to be appointed at a later date.

(12) Probation and parole reforms do not conform to the progressive proposals made by the Brown Commission.

There are improvements in S. 1437 as compared with S. 1. S. 1437 omits the sections which would have created an official secrets act and allowed government officials the Nuremberg defense; it deletes the provision nullifying the insanity defense; it removes the definition which would have authorized the police to engage in virtually unrestricted entrapment; and it contains a hundred or more similar omissions and modifications of some of the reactionary provisions of S. 1. The new bill also contains some important gains over existing law, including the repeal of the Smith Act; a more effective version of the laws prohibiting interference with political and civil rights; a more sensitive rape statute; some improvement in the wiretap law; and decriminalization of the possession of small amounts of marijuana. As a systematic codification of the existing jumbled statutes S. 1437 has some deficiencies, but it does make significant progress in removing inconsistencies, ambiguities and obsolescences from our Federal Criminal Code.

These advantages over S. 1, however, cannot be grounds for supporting S. 1437 so long as so many objectionable provisions remain. It is unlikely that the bill can be successfully amended. Omnibus legislation of this nature is subject to very limited change in the course of the legislative process. The difficulties of securing amendments are accentuated in this case because Senator Kennedy, the chief liberal sponsor of the bill, is committed to support the whole bill and is not in a position to advocate or acquiesce in large-scale amendments. Hence the only satisfactory procedure is to start the legislative process with an acceptable bill. We believe the Kastenmeier bill, introduced in the House last year as H.R. 12504, and in the present session by Representative Cohen as H.R. 2311, can serve this function. We therefore urge that H.R. 2311, rather than S. 1437, be used as the instrument for considering Federal Criminal Code reform.

A more detailed analysis of the principal provisions of S. 1437 that conflict with our system of individual rights is set forth below. Before proceeding to that analysis, however, one general point should be emphasized. Virtually all criminal offenses require that an intent to commit the crime be shown, and in some instances, a particular kind of intent must be demonstrated. Moreover, the drafters of a provision may be concentrating on a specific form of conduct and may not mean to cover other forms of activity within their prohibition. The actual impact of a proposed provision, however, cannot be judged on the assumption that prosecutors or juries will make refined distinctions about the mental state of the accused, especially an unpopular accused, or that courts will limit the scope of a provision to the primary focus of the original authors. Nor is it safe to pass laws on the theory that only wise and benevolent government officials will be the ones to enforce them. If we are to preserve our system of individual rights a far more demanding standard must be applied.

1. INCHOATE CRIMES

Attempt, conspiracy, complicity and solicitation are all inchoate crimes. They punish, by criminal penalty, not the actual conduct which constitutes the social evil but conduct prior to the occurrence of the evil or conduct by persons on the periphery who did not themselves actually participate in the crime. Traditionally inchoate crimes have been used as dragnet devices to permit the government to extend the scope of its control over wrongful activity. Moreover, the procedures for proof and trial of these offenses are likely to be inherently unfair. Not only are the rules of evidence relaxed, in order to allow easier proof of states of mind, but the linking of those at the center of the offense with those on the boundaries inevitably creates a built-in prejudice against the latter.

Inchoate crimes may have some justification in dealing with organized crime, drug offenses, or the anti-trust laws. But they pose serious dangers for offenses occurring in the course of political opposition to the government. They can be used to prosecute or harass many individuals who participate in group political activity by making everyone associated with the group liable for the offenses of a few militant members, or for the conduct of an agent provocateur. They have, in short, an extreme chilling effect upon legitimate political expression.

The inchoate crimes incorporated in S. 1437 are sweeping in their impact. Section 1001 (Criminal Attempt) provides that a person is guilty of an offense if "he intentionally engages in conduct that, in fact, amounts to more than mere preparation for the commission of the crime, and that indicates his intent that the crime be completed." This would mean that a person who planned with others to picket a courthouse (a Federal crime under Section 1328) and then walked in the direction of the courthouse would be guilty of an offense even though he or she never reached the courthouse or picketed there. There is no reason for the government to have the power to make such conduct criminal so far in advance of the event.

Section 1002 (Criminal Conspiracy) makes it an offense if an individual "agrees with one or more persons to engage in conduct, the performance of which would constitute a crime or crimes, and he or one of such persons in fact engages in any conduct with intent to effect any objective of the agreement." Like the traditional conspiracy statute, all that is really required to constitute the crime is an expression of agreement to commit the offense; after that any conduct by any party to the agreement which the jury finds was intended to effectuate any objective of the agreement completes the proof necessary. Under this provision any person present at a meeting where it was agreed to block construction of an interstate highway through a part (a Federal crime under Section 1302) would be guilty of criminal conspiracy even though he or she never participated in the demonstration.

Section 401 (Liability of an Accomplice) establishes a general offense of complicity. This makes a person "criminally liable for an offense based upon the conduct of another person 'if' he knowingly aids or abets the commission of the offense by the other person." The term "abet" is defined in Section 111 to include, not only "procure" or "command", but "counsel" or "induce." Thus a person who advises another person not to tell the whole truth when an FBI agent calls at the door (a Federal crime under Section 1343) would be guilty of a crime. So would a person who advised a young man to avoid the draft by emigrating to Canada (a Federal crime under Section 1114).

Most dangerous of all is Section 1003 (Criminal Solicitation). This section creates a new Federal crime, the crime of "criminal solicitation": "A person is guilty of an offense if, with intent that another person engage in conduct constituting a crime, and, in fact, under circumstances strongly corroborative of that intent, he commands, entreats, induces, or otherwise endeavors to persuade such other person to engage in such conduct." By the terms of this all-embracing provision any discussion of political tactics which might involve commission of a Federal offense, such as "obstructing a government function by fraud" (Sec. 1301), could be the basis of a criminal prosecution.

It is true that S. 1437, recognizing the danger of these catch-all crimes, exempts from their coverage an attempt, conspiracy or solicitation to commit the crimes of obstructing military recruitment, inciting or aiding mutiny or insubordination in the armed forces, and leading a riot (Sec. 1004(b)). (It also exempts anti-trust violations). But this palliative has little meaning. The crime of complicity is not included. And many other criminal offenses which may be involved when political activity takes place, such as those mentioned above, are not exempted.

The fact is that, in attempting to codify and thereby generalize the inchoate offenses, S. 1437 has gone far beyond what is necessary to maintain the integrity of the democratic process against illegal conduct and has cut deeply into fundamental political rights. The inchoate crimes in Federal law should be limited to a few specified offenses.

2. OFFICIAL SECRETS

S. 1437 has dropped the provision of S. 1 which would have established an official secrets act, that is, would have made the publication or dissemination of classified or national defense information by anyone at any time a criminal offense. Instead S. 1437 reenacts Sections 793, 794 (a), (b) and (c), and 798 of Title 18 of the present Code, and Sections 4(b) and 4(c) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950. This modification of S. 1 leaves existing law in effect. But it does not eliminate serious dangers to freedom of speech and the press that exist in the present state of the law. On the contrary it accentuates those dangers. The threat to freedom of expression is evident from the following facts:

(1) Much of the legislation left in effect goes far beyond the needs of a proper espionage law. It is in fact the product of the hysteria and repression of the McCarthy period. This is true of Section 4(b) and 4(c) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 (originally the Mundt-Nixon bill), and Section 798, which was Section 18 of the same legislation. Most of the Subversive Activities Control Act has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, and the Subversive Activities Control Board is now defunct. The remaining provisions of that infamous law ought not to remain on the books in any reform of the Criminal Code.

(2) The government has consistently claimed, in the Ellsberg case and elsewhere, that the present statutes should be interpreted as imposing an official secrets act. In fact the Department of Justice took the position that the provisions included in S. 1 did not change the existing law. Under these circumstances it would be a disaster not to repudiate the government's interpretation of the provisions left in operation by S. 1437.

(3) The impact of an official secrets act could be obtained under S. 1437, apart from the espionage provisions, as a result of Section 1301 (Obstructing a Government Function by Fraud). It could easily be asserted, under this section, that obtaining or publishing classified, defense, or other information without the government's consent impairs a government function through fraud. That this danger is real is evidenced by the fact that in the Ellsberg prosecution one of the charges brought by the government was that Ellsberg and Russo had violated 18 U.S.C. § 371 by conspiracy "to defraud the government." The presence of Section 1301 in S. 1437 is virtually equivalent to retaining the original official secrets provision of S. 1.

(4) Other provisions of S. 1437 might also be construed to restrict the publication or dissemination of material the government wishes to keep secret. These include Sections 1731 (Theft), 1732 (Trafficking in Stolen Property), and 1733 (Receiving Stolen Property); Section 1525 (Revealing Private Information Submitted for a Government Purpose); and Section 1524 (Intercepting Correspondence).

The only way to avoid the likelihood of serious repression is to limit criminal prosecution for the dissemination of government secrets to a simple and straightforward espionage provision, such as that proposed in the Kastenmeier bill (Sec. 1121 and 1122 of H.R. 2311).

3. POLITICAL OPPOSITION THAT INTERFERES WITH GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

One of the principal objectives of the original S.1 was to enact legislation which would, in numerous ways, shield government functions and government operations from the impact of political opposition such as that expressed in the civil rights movement and the peace movement of the 1960's and early 1970's. A substantial residue of these provisions remain in S. 1437.

Section 1111 (Sabotage) makes it a crime to damage, tamper with, contaminate, or defectively make or repair "any property used in, or particularly suited for use in, the national defense" that is owned by or being produced for the United States; "any facility that is engaged in whole or in part" for the United States in "furnishing defense materials or services" or "producing raw materials necessary to the support of a national defense production or mobilization program"; and "any public facility," defined as "a facility designed for use, or used, as a means of national defense" or "a facility of a police, fire, or public health agency" (Sec. 111). The offense must be committed "with intent to impair, interfere with, or obstruct the ability of the United States or an associate nation to prepare for or engage in war or defense activities"; but this is hardly a limitation, as such an intent could be found by a prosecutor or jury in almost any case of damage to government or defense property that was not accidental. Moreover, Section 1112, discussed below, eliminates even this requirement of intent.

A statute directed against sabotage is necessary. But Section 1111 goes much too far. It would apply to damage to most government property, all police and fire facilities, and an enormous sector of American industry. It would be applicable to any political assembly or demonstration where incidental damage to property or obstruction of a facility resulted. It would also be applicable to many labor disputes, where damage to property is not unusual, and perhaps to other labor activities such as boycotts. There is no reason why traditional State and local laws against destruction of property are not adequate to deal with most of the problem. Federal laws against sabotage should be confined to military property or services.

Section 1301 (Obstructing a Government Function by Fraud) introduces a new crime. A person is guilty of this offense if he "intentionally obstructs or impairs a governmental function by defrauding the government in any manner." There seems to be no logic or limit to the scope of this crime. A person could commit it by giving a postman the wrong directions to a house. A businessman would be guilty if he engaged in some deception in fulfilling a government contract. Or a political activist might be in violation if he used a trick to avoid surveillance by an FBI agent. On a more sinister level Section 1301, as noted above, could perform the function of an official secrets act. There is no justification for any such amorphous crime.

Section 1302 (Obstructing a Government Function by Physical Interference) also proposes a new crime. This offense is committed by a person if, "by means of physical interference or obstacle, he intentionally obstructs or impairs a government function" involving "the performance by a federal public servant of an official duty," or "the exercise of a right, or the performance of a duty" by any one under a court order or judgment. The only defense is if the government function was "unlawful" and "conducted by a public servant who was not acting in good faith." There are no other limitations. Any physical interference or obstacle, impairing any government function, under any circumstances, is the basis for up to a year in prison. A demonstration that partially blocks a post office, a refusal to open the door to a marshal serving a subpoena, continuation of picketing after a patently invalid injunction issued by a judge "acting in good faith," all would be subject to criminal prosecution. So might numerous forms of areas, such as interference with the mails or with government inspection.

Two other provisions give over-protection to government operations and under-protection to political dissent. Section 1334 (Obstructing a Proceeding by Disorderly Conduct) makes it an offense if a person obstructs or impairs an official proceeding "by means of unreasonable noise," by means of violent or tumultuous behavior or disturbance, or "by similar means." Section 1358 (Retaliating Against a Public Servant) punishes a person who "improperly subjects another person to economic loss or injury to his business or profession . . . because of an official action taken . . . or because of the status of a person as a public servant." Both of these provisions are excessively vague and overbroad and Section 1354 imposes absurdly high penalties for the nature of the offense. Moreover, like the other provisions discussed above, they would only be applied on a highly selective basis, against unpopular or minority groups.

4. POLITICAL OPPOSITION TO JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

S. 1437 also inherits a group of provisions from the original S. 1 that attempted to curtail political opposition directed against actions of the judiciary. Section 1323 (Tampering with a Witness or an Informant), after including the usual provisions against using force, threat, intimidation or deception to influence a judicial or other official proceeding, goes on to make it also an offense to do "any other act with intent to influence improperly, or obstruct or impair," the administration of any law or the exercise of a legislative power of inquiry. This provision could readily be used to suppress or inhibit many forms of legitimate opposition to judicial, administrative or legislative proceedings. The word "improperly" has no clear meaning, but obviously includes more than illegal conduct: the word "impair," which is not even qualified by the term "improperly," could include any kind of effective objection to an official proceeding. Thus organizing a demonstration to protest the conduct of a political case, or to oppose a legislative committee like the House Un-American Activities Committee, would fall within the ban of the statute.

Section 1328 (Demonstrating to Influence a Judicial Proceeding) prohibits picketing, parading, displaying a sign, using a sound amplifying device, or otherwise demonstrating within 200 feet of a Federal courthouse, while any judicial proceeding is in progress, or at any time within 200 feet of a building occupied by a judicial official. The section is entirely too broad: the judiciary does not need, and should not have, that kind of isolation from public opinion. Judicial proceedings, like all government activity, ought not to be immune from public criticism or influence. At most, a judicial proceeding needs protection only from violence or physical intimidation. The provision should be so limited.

Section 1331 (Criminal Contempt) makes it an offense not only to disobey but to "resist" a court order. Moreover, the fact that the court order is "clearly invalid" is no defense for refusal to obey so long as there has been a reasonable opportunity to obtain court review or a stay of the order, even though such appeal did not result in relief. The same language is repeated in Section 1335 (Disobeying a Judicial Order), where a higher penalty is applicable. The term "resist" could include any form of opposition to a court order and is subject to serious abuse. The refusal to allow a defense that the court order is "clearly invalid" puts every person at the mercy of every judge. If, for example, a judge issued a gag order against a newspaper, enjoining publication of information about a pending trial, even though the order was "clearly invalid," the newspaper could not publish the material but would have to await the outcome of a long appellate process. By the time the right to be free from censorship had been established, the material would long since have lost its value as news.

Judicial proceedings deserve their share of protection. But the provisions of S. 1437 go far beyond the necessary limits and impair important rights of free expression.

5. OPPOSITION TO WAR OR DEFENSE

The crucial test of a system of freedom of expression is whether it can operate effectively under the pressures of war or defense preparations. We have seen in the Viet Nam War how important it is that the channels of political discourse be kept open during a period of hostilities. The provisions of S. 1437 dealing with this problem unfortunately do not afford the protections to political opposition that we have learned by past experience are essential in a democratic society.

Section 1115 (Obstructing Military Recruitment or Induction) makes it an offense if a person, in time of war and with intent to interfere, "creates a physical interference or obstacle to the recruitment, conscription, or induction" of persons into the armed forces, or "incites others" to evade military service. The term "war" includes not only a declared war but a situation in which the armed forces are engaged in hostilities (Sec. 111). The term "incites" means "to urge other persons to engage imminently in conduct in circumstances under which there is a substantial likelihood of imminently causing such conduct." (Sec. 111). Picketing in front of an induction center could be held illegal under this section. Likewise conduct such as signing the "Call to Resist Illegitimate Authority" (to which over 300 prominent people attached their names during the Viet Nam War), the urging of young men to turn in or burn their draft cards, and counseling a conscientious objector not to register for the draft, would all fall within the prohibition. Effective expression of opposition to a war deemed unjust could thus be suppressed.

Section 1116 (Inciting or Aiding Mutiny, Insubordination, or Desertion) makes it an offense if a person "incites" members of the armed force to engage in mutiny, insubordination, refusal of duty or desertion or "aids or abets" the commission of mutiny or desertion. "Incites" is defined as above, and "abets" includes "counsels" (Sec. 111). Here again the criminal net is spread too indiscriminately. The provision would extend to a forcefully written article or pamphlet opposing the war or objecting to conditions in a military installation, so long as such material might reach the hands of members of the armed forces. In short, the provision would tend to isolate military operations from civilian criticism.

Finally, Section 1112 (Impairing Military Effectiveness) makes it an offense for any person to engage in sabotage (as set forth in Section 1111, noted above), whether or not such person has the intent to interfere with the ability of the United States to prepare for or engage in war or defense activities, but merely if the person acted "in reckless disregard of the risk" that his conduct would do so. Thus the section makes it a Federal offense to engage in virtually any conduct that damages facilities connected in any way with defense, including police, fire and health agencies, without regard to the purpose which motivated the conduct.

6. ASSEMBLIES AND DEMONSTRATIONS

Assemblies, demonstrations, picketing, leafleting, and canvassing constitute the "poor person's media," a way for those who do not have access to the mass media to reach their fellow citizens. We have seen in the civil rights movement, the peace movement, the women's liberation movement, and in other areas what a vital role these activities can play in a changing society. Political expression of this sort is frequently unsettling and sometimes, through the actions of extremists, agents provocateur, or otherwise ends up in turbulence or violence. A healthy society must find a way to protect itself against violence or intimidation, without throttling legitimate political expression. In general, State and local laws of long standing are entirely capable of doing this. Federal intervention is normally superfluous, tends to be discriminatory in application, and much too far.

It has already been noted that the provisions of S. 1437 which attempt to protect Federal government operations against interference from political opposition seriously curtail the right of citizens to assemble and demonstrate. In addition, S. 1437 in Section 1861 (Failing to Obey a Public Safety Order) creates a wholly new Federal offense. This section makes it unlawful if any person "disobeys an order of a public servant to move, disperse, or refrain from specified activity in a particular place", where the order is issued in response to a fire, flood, riot, "or other condition that creates a risk of serious injury to a person or serious damage to property" and is, in fact, "lawful and reasonably designed" to accomplish the end. This provision put in the hand of any Federal employee the authority to disperse a gathering, to forbid picketing or parading, to require citizens to refrain from leafleting or canvassing, whenever in his judgment there is a risk of injury to person or property. The impact of granting such autocratic power to petty government officials does not need to be elaborated. Moreover, the authority is conferred not only with respect to specific Federal areas, such as a Federal building, but anywhere in the United States. There is no possible justification for such an extension of Federal authority.

The Federal Riot Act provisions of S. 1437 contain the same defects. They impinge too far on legitimate political expression, including labor activity, and they needlessly extend Federal power into local affairs. Section 1831 (Leading a Riot) states that a person is guilty of an offense not only if he causes a riot, or leads, give commands or directions in furtherance of a riot, but also if he "incites participation" in a riot taking place or during a riot he "urges participation" in the riot. As noted above, the term "incite" includes urging a person to engage imminently in conduct, which brings the application of the government prohibition at a stage when only expression is involved. Use of the term "urges" carries government controls even further back into the speech process. The result is that expression is punished even though there is no immediate danger that it will have any effect upon the riot. The area of government power is thus expanded far beyond the core toward the periphery of the problem, with an obvious impact upon freedom of expression.

Section 1831 Federal jurisdiction over riots to any situation involving the movement of a person across State lines, and Section 1833 (Engaging in a Riot), which punishes persons who actually participate in a riot, extends to any riot which "obstructs a federal government function". A "riot" is a public disturbance that involves ten or more persons. Thus the vast weight of the Federal criminal law can be brought to every nook and cranny in the land, regardless of the magnitude of the event.

7. POLITICAL INVESTIGATIONS AND SURVEILLANCE

Recent disclosure of abuses by the intelligence community has alerted us to the dangers emanating from law enforcement agencies and officials who have not kept within strict bounds. S. 1437 does little or nothing to maintain those boundaries. On the contrary, some provisions greatly expand the powers of enforcement agencies to interfere with legitimate political activities.

The most glaring instance of this is Section 1343 (Making a False Statement). This section provides that a person is guilty of an offense if, "in a government matter" he makes "a material oral statement that is false" to a person he knows is "a law enforcement officer" or "a person assigned investigative responsibility" by a statute or regulation, or by the head of a government agency. Although there is some authority to the contrary, it has been assumed that under present law a person was guilty of a criminal offense for making a false oral statement only if the statement was made under oath before a government official authorized to administer oaths, in a context of the safeguards available in a judicial or quasi-judicial proceeding. This new provision would give enormous power to FBI agents, Internal Revenue investigators, custom officials, and every other Federal employee engaged in law enforcement. Any statement made to such a government agent, deemed by him to be false or later found to be false, would subject the citizen to the risk of Federal prosecution. In that prosecution the outcome would depend upon the citizen's word against the official's word. No prior warning, no presence of counsel, no other safeguard would be afforded. It is unthinkable that police officials should wield such power in a democratic state.

Much concern has been expressed recently over the use of the grand jury, not to protect the citizen from unwarranted prosecution, but to give prosecuting attorneys what is in effect subpoena power for criminal investigative purposes. This development has been facilitated by the authority to grant a witness before a grand jury "use immunity". That is, the witness must forego his right under the Fifth Amendment to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination, and in return is promised that the evidence he gives may not be used against him. But the witness may still be prosecuted for an offense about which he testifies, if other evidence is available. Section 3111 (Compulsion of Testimony Generally) reaffirms this procedure. "Use immunity" not only deprives a citizen of an express constitutional safeguard—the right to remain silent—but places him in grave risk of being prosecuted for an offense he has been forced by the government to divulge. Section 3111 is a serious encroachment upon a fundamental right.

The wiretap and bugging provisions of S. 1437 (Secs. 3101–3108) make some improvements in the present law as set forth in the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968. They reduce the number of crimes in the investigation of which electronic surveillance may be employed, and remove the provision disclaiming intention to interfere with any "inherent" power the President may have to use electronic surveillance without regard to constitutional or statutory limitations. But S. 1437 otherwise leaves the authority to wiretap and bug intact. Experience since 1968 has shown that these powers are of little use in law enforcement and, since they infringe so patently upon the right of privacy, they should be abandoned altogether.

Section 1521 (Eavesdropping), prohibiting interception of a "private oral communication by means of an eavesdropping device", does not apply where one party consents. The consent of all parties should be required.

It also should be noted that several other provisions of S. 1437, mentioned above, particularly Section 1301 (Obstructing a Government Function by Fraud), add greatly to the investigating powers of government officials and seriously threaten individual rights.

8. ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Some provisions of S. 1437 which adversely affect the fairness of criminal law administration, including use immunity, wiretapping, and bugging, have already been mentioned. Another unwarranted abridgement of the rights of an accused is found in Section 3713 (Admissibility of Confessions) which provides that the test of whether a confession is admissible in evidence at a trial is, not whether Miranda warnings have been given, but simply whether it "is made voluntarily". Section 3714 (Admissibility of Evidence in Sentencing Procedures) allows the use of any "relevant information" in sentencing proceedings even though it was obtained illegally, thereby encouraging police practices which violate constitutional and other legal rights. Section 3725 (Review of a Sentence) allows the government to appeal the length of a sentence under certain circumstances, a right which may jeopardize the defendant's freedom to appeal his or her conviction.

None of these provisions seem compelled by the need of effective law enforcement.

9. LABOR ACTIVITIES

A number of sections of S. 1437 which could seriously hamper legitimate labor activities have already been mentioned. The overbroad provisions of the sabotage law (Sec. 1111), the new crime of obstructing a government function by physical interference (Sec. 1302), and the proscription against "resisting" a court injunction (Sec. 1331), all pose great danger for labor unions. Two other provisions are of paramount concern to labor. There are Section 1722 (Extortion) and Section 1723 (Blackmail).

Section 1722 provides that a person is guilty of an offense "if he obtains property of another . . . by threatening or placing another person in fear that any person will be subjected to bodily injury or kidnapping or that any property will be damaged." Section 1723 defines blackmail as including, among other things, obtaining the property of another "by threatening or placing another person in fear that any person will . . . improperly subject any person to economic loss or injury to his business or profession." Obviously these provisions on their face can be applied to a broad range of labor union activities. Any strike involving violence would clearly violate both sections. Moreover, quite apart from violence, labor unions seeking higher wages and more favorable working conditions frequently "threaten" an employer or "place him in fear" that his "property will be damaged" by a strike. In fact these are the very purposes of a strike. Similarly labor unions attempt to obtain property from an employer, in the form of higher wages, by threatening him with "economic loss or injury" unless he consents to a new contract; whether the conduct is "improper" or not may depend on the court's attitude. Hence labor unions are placed in a very vulnerable position by S. 1437, far worse than at the present time when activity occurring in the course of a legitimate labor dispute has been held not to be covered by the analogous provisions of the Hobbs Act.

Section 1722 does recognize the threat to labor union activities inherent in that provision. It provides that it is an affirmative defense, to be proved by the defendant, that "the threatened or feared injury or damage was minor and was incidental to peaceful picketing or other concerted activity in the course of a bona fide labor dispute." This affords totally inadequate protection. Violence in labor disputes, whether instigated by union members or provoked by the employer, is frequently not "minor" or "incidental" to "concerted activity." Moreover, the provision puts the government in the position of determining whether a labor dispute is "bona fide" or not, a dangerous power. Furthermore, no exception for labor union activity is contained in Section 1723.

The fact is that Sections 1722 and 1723 would put the Federal government in the business of intervening in the conduct of labor disputes on a massive scale. No such Federal intrusion union activities is necessary or justified.

10. WITHDRAWAL OF FEDERAL PROTECTION TO INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

One of the major concerns in the area of civil liberties today is the tendency of the Supreme Court to withdraw Federal protection, both procedural and substantive, against State and local infringements upon individuals rights. S. 1437 does nothing to halt this development. And in at least one important respect it encourages and promotes it.

Section 1842 (Disseminating Obscene Material) prohibits the commercial dissemination of "obscene material", which is defined in part as material that "appeals predominantly to prurient interest of * * * the average person, applying contemporary community standards". The result of substituting local standards for national standards in obscenity cases is that every publisher and distributor is liable to criminal prosecution in every city and town which wishes to impose more strict standards than prevail nationally. A number of such prosecutions have already taken place. In the end the kind of material that the vast majority of people in the United States are allowed to read, or see in films, is determined by the strictest view of what "appeals to the prurient interest."

It is true that the Supreme Court, by divided vote, has accepted the "community standards" test, at least for the time being. But it is clear from pending cases that the Supreme Court has not yet fully resolved the issue, and the present majority may back away in whole or in part. At any rate, it is most unfortunate at this stage in the controversy to have Federal legislation which enacts into permanent law this highly restrictive doctrine of "community standards."

11. PENALTIES AND SENTENCING

The penalty and sentencing provisions of S. 1437 (Part III), while an improvement over S. 1, fall considerably short of the recommendations made by the Brown Commission:

(1) The penalties imposed, although not as draconian as those incorporated in S. 1, nevertheless remain much too high, substantially more severe than the Brown Commission proposals. Moreover, mandatory sentences are required in two areas,—trafficking in an epiate (Sec. 1811), and using a weapon in the course of a crime (Sec. 1823).

(2) S. 1437, unlike the report of the Brown Commission, does not seriously approach the problem of reconsidering the goals of our criminal justice system, or reforming the sentencing structure. On the contrary it delegates the whole matter to a United States Sentencing Commission, to be appointed by the Judicial Conference of the United States. It is the Commission, not our representatives in Congress, which is to establish the guidelines for sentencing. These guidelines are to be reported to Congress, but they become effective unless both Houses of Congress decide otherwise within 180 days. There is no way of knowing what the proposed Commission would do or what the nature of its guidelines would be.

(3) The Brown Commission proposed a method of appellate review of sentences in order to achieve uniformity, rationality and fairness. S. 1437 largely abandons these proposals. It allows appellate review only in felony cases and only if the sentence is more severe than the Sentencing Commission's guidelines. Where the guidelines allow the maximum sentence, which are the more significant cases, there is in effect no review. Moreover, as noted above, the government is empowered to appeal felony sentences that are lower than the guidelines suggest.

One of the major purposes of the effort to codify the Federal criminal law has always been to modernize and reform the penalty and sentencing structure. S. 1437 fails to accomplish this.

12. PROBATION AND PAROLE

S. 1437 also fails to measure up to the recommendations of the Brown Commission in its provisions dealing with probation and parole. For example, under the Brown Commission proposals a judge could require that a sentence be served up to one third of the time before the person sentenced was eligible for parole; under S. 1437 the judge may bar parole up to nine-tenths of the sentence (Sec. 2301). The difference is that, if the sentence is 30 years, a defendant would be eligible for parole in 10 years under the Brown Commission recommendation; under S. 1437 he would not be eligible for 27 years.

CONCLUSION

Reform of the Federal Criminal Code is a worthwhile project. That reform is not, however, inconsistent with maintaining our system of individual rights. On the contrary one cannot be done successfully without the other. S. 1 was designed to impose a Watergate-type straitjacket upon the people of this country. S. 1437 retains too many of those provisions to be acceptable. They are still framed with an eye toward affording the government apparatus meticulous protection against every possible form of inconvenience, while forgetting the needs of a healthy and dynamic citizenry. There is no reason why codification of the Federal criminal law cannot be accomplished in a manner that strengthens, rather than undermines, democratic institutions in America.

Mr. EMERSON. My testimony is concerned with the impact of the proposed Federal Criminal Code on the system of individual rights in the United States. I am particularly concerned with the results it has with respect to the power of the ordinary citizen to oppose the policies of the government that is in power.

I think that S. 1437 is a substantial improvement over S. 1, but I still believe that it retains a large number of provisions which individually and in totality are greatly detrimental to the American system of individual rights.

The National Committee Against Repressive Legislation therefore opposes the bill. We continue to support revision and codification of the Federal Criminal Code. We do not believe that such reform should be achieved at the price of sacrificing civil liberties.

Let me address myself to some of the provisions as examples of the problems which I have in mind.

First of all, let me address myself to the inchoate crimes—attempt, conspiracy, solicitation, and I would add to that the crime of complicity. The purpose of these criminal offenses, of course, is to allow the Government to punish conduct that goes beyond the actual physical conduct of committing the crime. It allows the Government to punish activities of persons who are associated in some way or on the periphery of what happens.

These offenses are useful for law enforcement purposes with respect to some aspects of crime—for instance, organized crime and probably the antitrust laws. When you apply these general inchoate offenses in the field of political expression, however, it is likely to have a very dampening effect on freedom of expression.

First of all, the inchoate crimes necessarily deal with conduct before the crime is committed and therefore in the speech area. They, therefore, have a direct impact on speech.

They also deal with the right of association, which is a basic right in terms of political opposition, because they bring within the scope of the Criminal Code many people who are on the edges. Therefore, they have a very hampering effect on persons who want to associate with other persons but feel they may be liable for the actions of extremists in their group.

Third, inchoate crimes by their very nature, since they apply so much across-the-board, are administered on a selective basis. Therefore, they are directed against unpopular causes.

If one looks at these crimes as applied in the civil liberties field, one can see the potential impact. The crime of conspiracy, for instance, would mean that anyone who joined an association that considered plans, say, to lie down in front of bulldozers that were about to put an interstate highway through a park, even though the person took no part in the action, would be guilty of a Federal criminal offense.

Consider the crime of solicitation, which is a totally new crime in the books as far as the Federal Code is concerned. Under that provision anyone who talked with another person about civil disobedience and urged a person to live up to his principles and engage in civil disobedience would be guilty of a Federal offense.

Stated as they are in such broad language, these offenses are a very grave threat to civil liberties. They should be confined to very specific areas, not generalized across the whole field. In my view the crime of solicitation should be eliminated entirely.

A second area with which I am particularly concerned is the area of official secrets. The original provisions of S. 1 were, of course, eliminated, leaving in effect the present provisions of the espionage laws.

The fact is that the Department of Justice has consistently said that the existing espionage laws do impose what amounts to an official secrets act. In the Ellsberg case the prosecution was based on that assumption, although the issue never came to a decision. Assistant Attorney General Thornberg consistently repeated that the provisions of S. 1 did not change existing law. So we have here a situation where the Government is claiming that existing law does constitute an official secrets act which would impose criminal penalties on dissemination of any information that the Government wanted to keep secret. Therefore, to leave the law in that situation is almost as bad as the original provisions of S. 1 which were taken out.

In addition to that, section 1301 of S. 1437, obstructing a government function by fraud, might be utilized as an official secrets act. The fact is that in the Ellsberg case one of the charges of the indictment, in addition to those under the espionage laws, was a violation of section 371 of the Criminal Code for conspiracy on the part of Ellsberg and Russo to defraud the Government. If the Government had succeeded in that charge, it would have established that obtaining information the Government wants to keep secret is defrauding the Government. Of course, a newspaper reporter who collaborated or obtained that information could be charged with conspiracy or with obstructing a government function by fraud.

Section 1310 thus seems to me to bring back into S. 1437 the worst provisions of S. 1 with respect to classified and national defense information.

Similarly, the theft and revealing information provisions could be interpreted with the same results. It seems to me that the only solution to this is to take the provisions in the Kastenmeier bill with respect to espionage and make them the sole provisions that apply to the disclosure of government information.

Third, I wish to call the subcommittee's attention to the provisions that deal with political opposition that interferes with government operations. The problem here is that a great deal of political expression is not carried on in an abstract, essentially polite sort of way.

If one were to look at the social movements that have marked the progress of our nation over the years, one would see that there is a certain amount of turbulence, disturbance, interference with government activities, and so forth. That is true of the labor movement. That is true of the women's suffrage movement. It is true of the civil rights movement, the peace movement, and the women's liberation movement. All of those social movements involved activities that interfered with the Government.

What this bill does is attempt to eliminate all inconveniences and annoyances, in effect, that the Government might face from that sort of political opposition.

The provisions of section 1111, the sabotage provisions, apply most across-the-board to almost all activity of American industry and make it a Federal crime to interfere. Of course, you have to have intent to interfere with a government function, but that is very easy for a prosecutor or a jury to find.

Most important of all, section 1301, which I just mentioned, obstructing a government function by fraud, opens up the possibility of making it a Federal criminal offense to engage in many kinds of activities that are the inevitable outcome of political opposition.

Even worse, section 1302, obstructing a government function by physical interference, is a totally new provision. It would mean that anything that in some physical way interfered with a Federal Government function could be a Federal criminal offense. Thus a demonstration in which a lot of people gathered together outside a post office would interfere with access to the post office or would interfere with traffic in front of the post office. It would be a physical interference with a Federal function.

There is almost no end to what could be involved there. Moreover, that provision could be used, of course, in a highly selective way to prosecute certain people the Government found objectionable.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Emerson, we have a long list of witnesses here so we are going to have to confine each witness, in addition to putting his statement in the record, to not over 15 minutes. I thought I should mention that since your time will soon be over. In the event you have something special you want to bring up before your time is up, I hope you will bring it to the subcommittee's attention.

Mr. EMERSON. I will hasten along, Senator.

Another series of provisions I want to mention deal with assemblies and demonstrations, which is related to what I just said. This may be the only method of political expression that is available to persons who do not have access to the mass media.

Section 1861, failing to obey a public safety order, and section 1831, leading a riot, both could be used to seriously hamper the right of demonstration, which, as we have seen, in the civil rights movement and peace movement has been a matter of extreme importance.

Similarly, I would call the subcommittee's attention to political investigations. I would particularly call the attention of the subcommittee to section 1343, making a false statement, which is essentially a new criminal offense. This provision gives any law enforcement officer or any police officer an extraordinary power over the investigation of anything in which a person might be involved.

Similarly, many provisions affect labor adversely.

In conclusion, let me say that the difficulties I find are partly due to the fact that the draftsmen have attempted to generalize or write general crimes of conspiracy, solicitation, obstruction of Government by fraud, and so forth. They have simply cut across the board in a very inhibitory way.

Second, they have, as I said, attempted to protect Government operations against every possible source of inconvenience and to, in effect, isolate the Government from the people that the Government is supposed to serve. The provisions seem to be written by persons who went into a back room and tried to think up every possible kind of interference or annoyance or opposition that might arise and then put some provision in the bill to make that a Federal criminal offense.

It seems to me that it is about time that someone wrote a code from the point of view of the people who are on the receiving end, not from the point of view of the people who are in the Government who have plenty of power to handle their affairs as it is. The citizens who are trying to have an impact on Government are the ones that ought to be considered in this code, not the Government officials.

While a Federal Criminal Code is certainly a worthwhile project, that reform is not inconsistent with maintaining our system of individual rights. On the contrary, one cannot be done successfully without the other.

S. 1 was designed to impose a Watergate-type straitjacket on the people of this country. S. 1437 retains too many of those provisions to be acceptable.

There is no reason why codification of the Federal criminal law cannot be accomplished in a manner that strengthens, rather than undermines, democratic institutions, in America.

Thank you.

Senator THURMOND. We are glad to have you with us, Professor Emerson. We thank you for your presence and the contribution you made to this hearing.

Our next witness is Ms. Marilyn Kay Harris, coordinator on behalf of National Moratorium on Prison Construction, Washington, D.C.

Ms. Harris, would you like to have your entire statement placed in the record?

Ms. HARRIS. Yes; I would.

Senator THURMOND. Without objection, that will be done. You will have not to exceed 15 minutes to say anything in addition to that statement which you may wish to say.

STATEMENT OF MARILYN KAY HARRIS, COORDINATOR ON BEHALF OF NATIONAL MORATORIUM ON PRISON CONSTRUCTION, WASH-INGTON, D.C.

Ms. HARRIS. Thank you very much.

I would also like to ask permission to extend my remarks concerning some specific revisions of the bill. We would like to provide this in addition to what I will say orally today.

Senator THURMOND. Without objection, that will be done. You may submit it to us.

Ms. HARRIS. Thank you.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT—NATIONAL MORATORIUM ON PRISON CONSTRUCTION

The National Moratorium on Prison Construction is pleased to submit this written statement for the record to further elaborate on points raised in our oral testimony and to direct attention to specific sections of the bill with which we are concerned. As stated in our testimony, the National Moratorium on Prison Construction (NMPC) has scrutinized S. 1437 in terms of its potential impact on the nature and extent of incarceration of federal offenders and found the bill seriously deficient. In undertaking comprehensive sentencing reform, the Congress should authorize and encourage a wide range of sanctions. More imagination and effort should be devoted to developing a hierarchy of sanctions ranging from less severe to more severe. The criminal code should expressly favor sanctions of lesser severity and explicitly disfavor incarceration.

Society has an interest in minimizing incarceration because it is drastic, costly, and productive of alienation, and because there are alternative means for promoting and protecting societal values. Any criminal sanction involves various degrees of impairment of an offender's freedom. Residence restrictions, curfews, supervision, community service, even money damages, diminish personal liberty and involve elements of control and manipulation. The point is that the criminal code should try to minimize these elements both for the offender's sake and for the sake of the larger society. The code should prefer those measures which are most consistent with and conducive to, individual freedom and dignity.

It is vital that the Congress recognize that imprisonment as we know it is cruel, and although all too usual, does not comport with evolving standards of decency. Prisons as we know them are antithetical to dignity and humanity. They destroy the human spirit, brutalize, and negatively socialize.

It is difficult to understand how the typical prison or jail thrives in modern America. American penal facilities seem clearly anachronistic—clearly out of some earlier, less civilized, less enlightened, less humane time. As Dr. Karl Menninger has recorded his impression of prisons, "An atmosphere of monotony, futility, hate, loneliness, and sexual frustration pervades the dark dungeons and cold hangers like a miasma, while time grinds out weary months and years."

A recent book based on a long-term research study in an Ohio Training school for boys documents in a painfully clear fashion how such an institution socializes young people to values exactly counter to those we would wish. The institution described and all too many of our other institutions holding juveniles and adults are institutions of terror, violence, and victimization. Individuals sent there by society must choose whether to victimize others or be victimized or suffer some of both. Such institutions breed violence and disrespect for human life. They subvert rather than serve societal interests. (See Juvenile Victimization: The Institutional Paradox, by Bartollas, Miller, and Dinitz)

Construction of newer, more modern prisons, but prisons based on the same bankrupt concepts as the old, is not an answer to our prison problems. Witness the federal prison system which is spending the taxpayers' money for new prisons for youthful offenders in locations like Lake Placid, New York; Bastrop, Texas; and Talladega, Alabama. These new prisons will open with a guarantee that meaningful contact with family and friends will not be possible for the prisoners.
Designed to hold 500 persons for "economies of scale", the new prisons will share the many defects inherent to such a scale, no matter how well they are managed.

The very concept of caging large numbers of persons in penal institutions must give way to better means of responding to criminal acts.

Federal Judge James Doyle has been much quoted in saying, "I am convinced that the institution of prison probably must end. In many respects it is as intolerable within the United States as was the institution of slavery, equally brutalizing to all involved, equally toxic to the social system, equally subversive of the brotherhood of man, even more costly by some standards, and probably less rational." (Morales v. Schmidt, 340 F. Supp. 544, 548-9 (W.D. Wis. 1972), rev'd 494 F. 2d (7th Cir. 1974).)

The conclusions reached by Judge Doyle and the facts that underlie them are by no means secret. It has recently been out of favor to discuss humanity, decency, and acceptability of criminal sanctions. The cry has been for getting "criminals off the streets" and keeping them locked up longer. However, recent polls show fear of crime no longer increasing. The pendulum of public opinion seems to be coming back toward a more reasonable, moderate position and as unemployment declines, crime and fear should decrease even more. (Both crime and prison admissions are highly correlated with unemployment rates.) Now is the time for Congress to lead the country in an unprecedented move away from conventional confinement.

As important steps in establishing new directions, a number of fundamental changes in S. 1437 are required. Perhaps most fundamentally, the bill fails to declare a coherent philosophy to guide development of sentencing policy.

NEED FOR CLEAR STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

There are deep and continuing conflicts about the proper philosophy upon which sentencing and dispositional decisions should rest. In the past, legislators have tended to leave the important issue of what philosophical base should be used for sentencing decisions to the discretion of criminal justice personnel. Recodification of the federal criminal code provides an opportunity to establish and declare national public policy and purpose in regard to criminal sanctions. This opportunity is about to be missed.

S. 1437 evidences a belief that the criminal code can be all things to all persons or reflects that no one has been able to decide or agree on what purpose is to predominate in criminal sentencing or which purpose is to govern on a specific occasion. The statement of sentencing purpose lists all of the commonly proposed purposes—deterrence, protection of the public, punishment, and correction or rehabilitation. Retention of such a blanket statement of allowable purposes in effect means that the legislature has refused to decide what should be accomplished. How is an individual judge, or the proposed sentencing commission, to balance these complex and perhaps conflicting purposes in making individual dispositions or establishing sentencing ranges? How do the various sentencing alternatives, sentence lengths, sentencing factors, or offender categories relate to these purposes?

In considering an appropriate sanction for a given crime, how is the decision to be made among the sentencing options? If incarceration is chosen, how long should the term be? If a fine is selected as the appropriate sanction, how much should it be? Clearly, the answer to these and many other questions will vary depending on whether the goal is to make an example of this offender as a deterrent to others, to protect the public from this offender, to promote this offender's rehabilitation, to "make the victim whole" by ordering restitution, or to serve some other purpose.

S. 1437 provides virtually no guidance on how a choice should be made among all of the allowable purposes. It specifies that the sanction, and perhaps the purpose, may vary depending on the absence or existence of a number of subsidiary factors related to the offender and the offense, but it does not specify in what direction. There is no indication of an order of importance among the factors to be considered nor any indication of how they should be weighted against one another. Does the bill intend that "physical condition, including drug dependence", would result in a harsher sentence or a more lenient one? Does it envision prior unemployment as grounds for confinements as evidence of risk of future criminality or grounds for imposing probation with assistance in finding employment?

Since the bill would codify virtually all popular purposes of sentencing as allowable, it is not clear that the Commission would have the authority to disallow any of them. The Congress should either address these vital issues directly or delegate them completely. It would be better to say nothing at all as to purpose or characteristics of the offense or the offender and simply delegate the entire job to the Commission than to provide a laundry list of vague and questionable factors that must be considered. Defendants should not be penalized in sentence severity or length based on such factors as education, vocational skills, previous employment, community ties, already punished criminal activity or alleged criminal activity. Many of the other factors, such as community attitudes, current incidence of the offense, likely effect on commission of the offense by others are also inappropriate matters for the Commission or a judge to consider. The inclusion of such factors in such numbers is simply reflective of the failure of the bill to come to terms with what it is designed to accomplish.

The legislative branch bears the responsibility for developing a coherent public policy to govern the criminal sanctioning process. This is a difficult and controversial process, but far from an impossible one. Some existing alternative bills, such as S. 204, the Hart-Javits Bill, go a lot farther toward fulfilling this important legislative role than S. 1437. There are a few specific concerns which the National Moratorium on Prison Construction wishes to address.

AUTHORIZED SENTENCES

As indicated above, NMPC regards Section 2001, concerning Authorized Sentences, to be too narrow. The only sentences authorized are probation, fines, and imprisonment. Other sanctions, such as day fines, community service orders, curfews, restitution orders, and other penalties should be authorized as sentences. Some of these punishments are included in the bill as possible conditions of probation or as additions to other sentences. They should be sentencing options in themselves.

Also as indicated above, the sentencing options delineated should reflect an order of preference for their use, from least drastic to most drastic. For example, Section 3502 which concerns release pending trial, specifies that a person charged with an offense shall be released pending judicial proceedings unless a specific finding is made. The section further specifies that if an individual is not released on his or her own recognizance, the first of a list of factors, which is ranked from less to more severe, that will assure the appearance of the person for trial is to be imposed. A similar approach should be taken in regard to imposing sentence following conviction. In addition and as stated above, a sentence to incarceration should be explicitly disfavored generally. Incarceration should be prohibited for most offenses—certainly for misdemeanors and infractions. Conversely, probation should not be prohibited for any offense as Section 2101 would do. In the December 1976 issue of Judicature, Senator Kennedy states in an article that he “suspects” that sentences of imprisonment would be reserved for the more serious crimes. The matter of offenses for which an offender may suffer deprivation of liberty should not be a matter of speculation. NMPC joins the other witnesses, including Judge Lasker, Mr. von Hirsch, and the National Prison Project, who recommended that a presumption against incarceration be written into the bill.

PROBATION

As stated above, and consistent with revising the bill to disfavor use of incarceration, probation should not be precluded as a sentence for any offense or offense class. Thus section 2101 should be revised to read that any persons found guilty of an offense may be sentenced to a term of probation.

As regards allowable conditions of probation, NMPC believes revision of the list of conditions allowed should be done in connection with refinement of the purposes to be served in sentencing. For example, some of the conditions might make sense for rehabilitative purposes, but not for purposes of deterrence or punishment. If rehabilitation were rejected as an allowable basis for sentence selection, such conditions should be deleted.

NMPC endorses inclusion in the bill of punishments heretofore used rarely including restitution payments, residence at a community facility, and work in community service, but would favor making these punishments discrete sentences which need not be tied to probation.

Just as no offenses should preclude probation, there should be no minimum probation terms set by law nor any durational restrictions on early termination of probation. If as NMPC and others have urged, the sentencing provisions of the criminal code were based on a preference for use of the least drastic suitable alternative, no restrictions on the implementation of this principle should be allowed in the law.

The notion that a term of probation may be extended at any time prior to expiration if less than the authorized term was originally imposed is contrary to the need to make criminal penalties definite, an espoused objective of sentencing reform. Reductions of term or early termination are a form of mercy or forgiveness or of responding to new information and are desirable in that they reduce the exercise of state power over individuals. Provisions allowing extension of a sentence once set remove the individual's assurance that the punishment will be over when promised. As in Mr. Lowenstein's analysis of June 27, 1977, regarding appeal of a sentence by the government, possible extension of a sentence late in a term constitutes double jeopardy and cruel policy. All such provisions which allow enhancing a sentence in length or severity once imposed should be deleted.

IMPRISONMENT

As previously stressed, S. 1437 now authorizes excessively long periods of confinement for excessively broad categories of offenders. By eliminating good time, adding contingent parole terms, and allowing terms of parole ineligibility, yet authorizing long periods of incarceration, the bill would help inflate the already excessively large federal prison population. Such an impact would be highly undesirable economically and socially. The authorized terms of imprisonment should be substantially lower and the set of offenses for which incarceration is allowable should be limited. Furthermore, the bill should specifically prohibit extra-added, but illegal, punishments common to the typical prison.

Mr. O'Donnell urged a fifty percent reduction in maximum sentence lengths. Judge Frankel endorsed a general lowering of sentences as did the National Prison Project and Mr. von Hirsch. The Director of the Bureau of Prisons, Mr. Carlson stated that, "By increasing the certainty of the punishment rather than its length or severity, I believe we can be more effective in deterring crime." Mr. Dershowitz postulated that for every increase in severity of sentence there is a corresponding decrease in certainty.

The National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals and S. 204, the Hart-Javits bill, both call for an authorized maximum sentence of five years for most offenders, but even that is too long although clearly preferable to the terms in the existing bill. The statute should incorporate a presumption against incarceration and limit use to a very small number of serious offenses. Consistent with the philosophy of utilizing the least drastic suitable alternative, incarceration for a minimum term should not be required by law. Similarly, if parole is to be retained, periods of parole ineligibility should not be allowed. Furthermore, if parole is retained, the total length and severity of punishment should not be increased by contingent terms of imprisonment.

NMPC endorses three separate recommendations made by Judge Tjoflat. The first recommendation would preserve the court's option to prescribe a sentence of unconditional discharge. The second recommendation would give the court authority to set aside convictions of successful probationers upon their termination (as is presently provided for by the Youth Corrections Act) and also the convictions of offenders not originally sentenced to either imprisonment or probation two years from the date of conviction. The third recommendation would delete the phrase "for extraordinary and compelling reasons" from Section 2302(c), which gives authority to the court to reduce the original term of imprisonment or parole ineligibility to time already served on the motion of the Director of the Bureau of Prisons.

As regards the type of prison facility or the place of imprisonment, the bill should be modified to allow and encourage execution of the deprivation of liberty in facilities other than conventional prisons and jails. The provisions of S. 1437 that address juveniles authorize the Bureau of Prisons to designate as the place of official detention a suitable public or private agency or foster home (Section 3603). The bill also authorizes the Director of the Bureau of Prisons to contract with a public or private agency or foster home for the custody, care, subsistence, education, and training of juveniles. The Bureau of Prisons should be similarly authorized and encouraged to enter into a wide variety of arrangements, including contracting with private and public agencies and individuals, for the housing, care, custody, and supervision of adult offenders. At present, when the Bureau of Prisons experiences temporary population increases, institutional overcrowding tends to result. The bill should make clear that most offenders in the federal system do not require confinement in an institution with a high level of security and that development of alternative arrangements is preferable to overcrowding in federal facilities or continued use of inhumane facilities. The requirement in the bill that the Bureau of Prisons shall commit a juvenile to a home or agency near his home community if possible should also be applied to adult offenders.

Sections of the bill that address juveniles also specify that a juvenile who has been committed shall be provided with adequate food, heat, light, sanitary facilities, bedding, clothing, recreation, counseling, education, training, and medical care, including any necessary psychiatric, psychological, or other care or treatment (Sections 3602 and 3603). Similar specifications of requirements and minimum standards should be incorporated in the bill to apply to adults.

EXCLUSION OF AGENCIES FROM APA AND FOIA

Sections 3825 and 3837 would exempt the Bureau of Prisons and the Parole Commission from the Administrative Procedures Act, the Freedom of Information Act, and the Privacy Act. NMPC finds that there is no justification for such exclusions other than historical tendencies to keep the affairs of these agencies out of the sunlight of public scrutiny and input. The profound effects that these two agencies have on the lives of prisoners warrant access of prisoners to the information and processes that these laws concern. The decision made by the Bureau of Prisons and the Parole Commission are also a major concern of organizations like the National Moratorium on Prison Construction and the National Prison Project and such organizations should not be cut off from the processes by which they are made nor be unable to learn what the decisions are.

PAROLE

NMPC favors in principle the abolition of parole, but believes that parole abolition should not be attempted in isolation from other major criminal justice system changes. In the context of the bill as it now stands, elimination of parole would simply serve to further increase terms of incarceration and insure that disparities would not be corrected. However, we believe that the parole system is fatally flawed conceptually, based as it is on prediction of future individual conduct. Parole has often served to increase, rather than decrease, arbitrary and inequitable treatment of prisoners. Thus, a few recommendations regarding parole are offered here assuming that parole will not be immediately abolished, although such patching will not overcome some of the major flaws of the parole system.

Under present law, one of the primary methods of insuring against unreasonably harsh sentences is by the limitation in Title 18 Section 4202(b), which prohibits a judge from imposing a minimum sentence establishing parole eligibility at greater than one-third of the statutory maximum. The proposed bill would virtually eliminate this prohibition by allowing a judge to impose parole ineligibility for up to nine-tenths of the statutory maximum, subject only to the as yet non-existent guidelines of the proposed sentencing commission. Given the excessively long prison terms authorized in the bill, such terms of parole ineligibility should not be allowed. Certainly such terms should not exceed the current one-third limitation unless sentence lengths are drastically reduced.

As regards the criteria for release on parole, some modifications are in order. Sections 3831(c) (2) and (3), should be eliminated. Subsection (c) (2), "there is no undue risk that he will fail to conform to such conditions of parole as would be warranted under the circumstances," requires prediction of individual conduct and is therefore unreliable and unfair. Subsection (c) (3), "his release at that time, in light of his conduct at the institution, would not have a substantially adverse effect on institutional discipline," would punish an individual for the presumed effects such punishment would have on other persons and is hence unfair even if it could be accurately assessed. Criteria for release on parole should be designed to serve the objectives of reducing disparity, reducing undue harshness or deprivation, and promoting equity, consistent with the objectives of the sentence imposed. Section 3831 should be revised in this light.

The authorized parole terms offer the potential for undue extension of state control over individuals lives. Under sections 2303 and 3834, a prisoner could be subject to a period of up to five years on parole, regardless of the fact that she or he had already served a complete term in prison. Terms in excess of three years would serve little purpose and would be unnecessarily restrictive. In line with the general orientation of NMPCs recommendations, even shorter terms of parole should be preferred.

APPELLATE REVIEW OF SENTENCES

NMPC applauds S. 1437's inclusion of appellate review of sentences falling outside the guidelines provided by the sentencing commission. However, we consider it essential to the ends of justice to provide for appellate review of sentences within the guidelines, and also for affording review of challenges made as to the validity of the sentencing guidelines. NMPC concurs with Judge Lasker that the as yet non-existent guidelines will not be so perfect as to eliminate any need for appellate review. Judge Frankel, Mr. O'Donnell, and the National Prison Project all urged availability of appellate review within the guidelines and NMPC concurs.

As stated above, NMPC is opposed to the provision allowing the government to appeal for the purpose of urging more severe sentences due to the chilling effect on prisoner appeals and the constitutional prohibition of double jeopardy.

SENTENCING COMMISSION

NMPC supports the establishment of a sentencing commission and concurs with those witnesses, including Senators Hart and Javits, Judge Lasker, Dean Gottfredson, Mr. von Hirsch, Mr. Dershowitz, and the National Prison Project, who have supported Presidential appointment of the members, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members of the commission should include persons from inside and outside of the criminal justice system including ex-offenders. Representation from diverse ethnic backgrounds and from both sexes should be required. The concerns with which the commission will be dealing are relevant to, and their implementation will effect, all sectors of the public and the criminal justice system, making a broad range of backgrounds and perspectives desirable on the commission.

A sentencing commission offers a means to refine, implement, monitor, and evaluate legislatively created sentencing criteria. Given legislative failure to develop clear statements of sentencing purpose and means of accomplishment, a sentencing commission offer an alternative means of carrying out these functions if not excessively constrained by law. As stated above, NMPC finds many of the "factors" listed as allowable for inclusion in the commission's development of categories of offenses or offenders to be vague or undesirable and recommends their deletion.

Finally, NMPC finds the importance and consequences of the guidelines to be supplied by the sentencing commission of such magnitude that we recommend that both houses of Congress be required to approve them before they are put into use.

Ms. HARRIS. My name is Kay Harris. I am very pleased to appear here today on behalf of the National Moratorium on Prison Construction, which is a project of the Unitarian Universalist Service Committee and the National Council on Crime and Delinquency.

The National Moratorium on Prison Construction was established in February of 1975 to work toward achievement of a halt to construction of new penal facilities and jails in this country. Such a moratorium on prison and jail construction would allow time and a technique for forcing an unprecedented analysis and critique of our entire criminal justice process as well as time to develop and implement a variety of alternative programs, procedures, policies, and philosophies.

The national moratorium office cooperates with individuals and groups throughout the country who are interested in stopping the proliferation of prisons.

There is one major concern that I would like to address before this subcommittee today. It is a concern that has been raised repeatedly before the subcommittee, but it is of such fundamental importance that we believe that we must add our voices to the chorus.

The National Moratorium on Prison Construction urges that S. 1437 be revised to drastically limit the use of incarceration as a criminal sanction.

Professor Dershowitz testified yesterday to the effect that if Criminal Code reform resulted in construction of more prisons, it would be a failure. The National Moratorium on Prison Construction would assert that unless comprehensive Criminal Code reform significantly reduces use of conventional imprisonment in this country, it will be a failure.

Senator THURMOND. May I interrupt you for a minute?

We have just put your statement in the record. I thought you might want to emphasize certain points or bring out something that is not in your statement. Otherwise there is a duplication in the record.

Ms. HARRIS. OK.

I would like to emphasize one point. We feel very strongly that this country needs to move away from its practice now of caging many thousands of people in massive congregate institutions where those people are deprived of a number of rights in addition to the deprivation of liberty. They are put in fear of their lives. They live in constant fear for their personal safety. They are deprived of the opportunity to associate meaningfully with friends and relatives. They are deprived of many opportunities to read or to engage in activities that they choose to engage in.

We believe this country must stop the practice of not only depriving people of liberty, but also adding many other punishments to the deprivation of liberty as a sanction.

Senator THURMOND. May I ask you a question here?

Ms. HARRIS. Certainly.

Senator THURMOND. As I understand your testimony, you are opposed to sending people to prison; is that correct? What do you have in mind?

Ms. HARRIS. What we are opposing is the confinement of people in the modern American prison as we know it today.

Senator THURMOND. What do you suggest as an alternative to sending people to prison?

Ms. HARRIS. We suggest as a major first step we should turn away from use of confinement by using a broad range of alternatives involving such things as fines, curfews, restrictions, community service orders, restitution, and a whole range of penalties that are punitive but not so drastic as the deprivation of liberty in a massive institution with hundreds of other people far from family and friends.

We think that the idea that incarceration protects the public is, in fact, a myth. There are no good reasons to continue to incarcerate people in the manner that we do. We do it because we are so accustomed to doing it. We believe as Americans we have the spirit and opportunity to develop more humane, more sensible kinds of alternatives.

When I say that it is a myth that incarceration protects the public, if you look at common estimates of what happens to 100 major crimes—felonies—you will see that of 100 major crimes that are committed only 50 are reported to the police. For the 50 crimes reported to the police, approximately 12 people are arrested. Of those 12 people, 6 are convicted; out of those 6, about 1½ go to prison.

In fact, LEAA's victimization surveys indicate that an even smaller percentage of crimes are reported to the police, so probably the percentage of crimes that end in imprisonment is even lower than 1.5 percent. Yet at the same time we have in our midst at any given time a number of people who will someday commit a violent act. In any practical sense these people are undetectable. Also, in a constitutional sense they are undetectable or unpredictable. Our inability to predict human behavior, especially something such as a violent act, has been well documented by a number of authorities, some of whom have testified before this subcommittee.

For example, there was a recent study done in Columbus, Ohio, by the Academy for Contemporary Problems. The study was designed to look at the idea that incapacitation in penal institutions protects society.

They were interested in the serious crimes of homicide, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault. They were interested in how many of those crimes could be prevented by a policy that would involve incarcerating everybody convicted of the felony for a flat term of 5 years. Using statistical means, which has some definite limitations, they found that out of all those violent crimes that I listed which were committed in 1 year in that given county, only about 4 percent of those could have been prevented if all felons who had been convicted of felonies in the previous 5 years had been incarcerated for a flat term of 5 years. They concluded from the study that more cells for more criminal will not reduce crimes enough for the community to notice a change.

In fact, another author, Gilbert Canter, whom I would like to quote has said:

If our entire criminal justice apparatus were simply closed down, there would be no increase and there would probably be a decrease in the amount of behavior that is now labeled criminal.

We are indeed saying that incarceration as we know it is not necessary. In fact, there is quite a bit of evidence that incarceration breeds violence in our society. When you consider the cost of incarceration today, that is another factor.

The Congressional Budget Office has recently reported that the cost of maintaining a Federal prisoner for 1 year in one of our new Federal institutions is over $17,000. This is on top of the cost of constructing one prison bed, which is now about $43,000, in the Federal system.

If this Criminal Code reform does not do something to move away from use of incarceration, if it does not specify a preference against incarceration—a very strong preference—if it does not decry and speak out against the unauthorized, unjustifiable and brutal counterments of incarceration in this country today, it will have a negative impact.

There is one other particular point I want to make. One of the primary activities of the National Moratorium on Prison Construction has been working to stop the proliferation of the Federal prison system. Every year since at least 1969 the Federal Bureau of Prisons has come to the Congress and asked for more Federal funds for construction of new prisons and jails.

Every year the National Moratorium on Prison Construction joins other witnesses before the Appropriations Committees opposing this expansion of the Federal prison system and opposing the addition of more and more Federal prison beds. Each year the Appropriations Committees tell us that we really are before the wrong committees. They tell us we need to be addressing the committees which establish the criminal laws and develop the criminal sanctions in this country.

Despite such reluctance to interfere with the jurisdiction of other committees, the Appropriations Committees on both sides of the Congress have expressed strong dissatisfaction with the continued demand for more Federal prison beds. Last year the Senate Appropriations Committee stated that the current range of alternatives to incarceration is clearly unsatisfactory. They directed the Justice Department in the strongest possible terms to pursue development of additional alternative sanctions.

This year the House Appropriations Committee, has disapproved funds requested by the Bureau of Prisons for planning and site acquisition of two new Federal prisons on the grounds that the facilities have not been well justified and on the grounds that the prison officials should be pursuing more fully alternative means of housing offenders.

We feel very strongly that this subcommittee needs to reassess the impact that this bill might have on prison populations. Incarceration should be reserved for the most serious of offenses, as it is the most serious sanction we have other than execution. Where we do resort to deprivation of liberty as a sanction, it should not be carried out in what we have come to know as the typical modern American prison.

With the recent emphasis by President Carter on human rights, the spotlight of the world will surely fall on America's prisons and jails. Given the fact that we have the highest incarceration rate in the industrialized nations—in fact, among reporting nations that we know of—and given the fact that there is such a disproportionate share of racial minorities behind our bars, there is much that we should not want to come into world view. We would not stand up very well.

Let us acknowledge the inhumanities that exist in our present system and move affirmatively toward their prompt elimination.

Thank you.

Senator THURMOND. We are pleased to have you here. Thank you for your thoughts.

Our next witness is Mr. John Cleary. I believe he has Mr. Roger Lowenstein with him. They are here on behalf of the National Legal Aid & Defenders Association.

If it is agreeable, Mr. Cleary, we will put your entire statement in the record. Then we will give you 15 minutes to say anything in addition to that. During the 15 minutes you may explain anything about your statement or bring up new points not already in your prepared statement.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JOHN J. CLEARY, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, FEDERAL DEFENDERS OF SAN DIEGO, INC., THE FEDERAL COMMUNITY DEFENDER ORGANIZATION FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL LEGAL AID & DEFENDER ASSOCIATION

I. INTRODUCTION

A compromise has been made to remove some defects of S. 1 (94th Cong. 1st Sess.) which has not only reduced the size of the proposed revision of the Federal Criminal Code (title 18) but has also allayed public criticism. This reduced version still needs further study and review so as to provide a better integration and comparison with existing Federal practice. Although as a Federal defender I find many aspects of S. 1437 repugnant to the concept of limited federal police jurisdiction (i.e. the expansion of Federal jurisdiction, the creation of new offenses (solicitation etc.), and the redefinition of offenses to broaden the scope of criminal statutes), the most dangerous provisions deal with Federal sentencing.

Existing Federal laws on sentencing need substantial revision and reform to eliminate arbitrary action and unduly long-term confinement, but the sentencing provisions of S. 1437 are worse than existing law. S. 1437, in the guise of reform, exercises present protection for the convicted defendant.

S. 1 and S. 1437 have been drafted with a clearly prosecutorial slant, and it is obvious that the judiciary has but little involvement in the drafting of such legislation. Chief Justice Burger has very validly criticized the action of Congress in adopting legislation without considering its "impact" on the judiciary. This wholesale revision and expansion of Federal criminal law will deluge the Federal courts with new criminal cases and increased litigation, and yet there has been little and late response in Congress to the needs of the judiciary for more judges. It is anomalous that in our Federal criminal justice system we will spend $2 billion for the Federal investigative and enforcement agencies to prosecute criminal laws in the Federal courts, but provide less than $400 million (one-fifth) for the total operation of the Federal judiciary that must consider civil as well as criminal litigation.

Criminal litigation is tolerably processed with the aid of such dubious features as "plea bargaining," and the use of Draconian penalties, presumptive mandatory minimum sentences, and high possibility of parole ineligibility, coupled with limited flexibility of the district judge at sentencing creates an awesome response. The observer has the feeling that the new increased penalty provisions were designed to use long-term confinement as a threat to avoid the possibility of litigation, so that the average American faced with a Federal accusation would sacrifice his fundamental right of his "day in court" to avoid threatened long-term confinement. Ironically, the "upping" and crystallizing of the penalties may not induce guilty pleas but increase trials. The person faced with a relatively certain penalty will have nothing to lose by presenting the case to a jury. Litigation will proliferate under this system, and yet the prosecutor still maintains the ability to manipulate this system by the nature of charge that he files so as to have absolutely unfettered discretion at sentencing. Again, the irony of the system is to restrict the discretion of the judge but to provide the potential for serious abuse on the part of the prosecutor. It is self-evident that those practicing on the behalf of persons charged with crime have had little input, and although a few may be given a limited opportunity at this late date in these hearings, the very drafting should have included the input of the defense bar.

Federal courts have resorted to the principle of lenity favoring the imposition of a lesser penalty in construing penal statutes. To the contrary S. 1437 is confinement oriented. Arbitrary abuses in the imposition of penal servitude should be removed but not in a manner that would preclude the trial judge from individualizing the sentence to fit the offense and the offender.

In an effort to save this legislation a rather novel and apparently reform concept of a Sentencing Commission (P 28 U.S.C. 991<sup>1</sup>) is added. This Sentencing Commission without any specific standards is to establish guidelines for sentencing to imprisonment, ineligibility for parole, and other dispositions of offenders. The concept had the support of those seeking to reduce the harshness to an alternate concept espousing the other extreme. The provisions of S. 1437 do not abolish the Parole Commission, which uses a set of similar guidelines pursuant to Congressional authority, but creates a competing agency without insuring that a new one would have any better chance of success than the Parole Commission. The creation of the new agency (Sentencing Commission) in addition to the old agency (Parole Commission) both without specific congressional guidelines almost predicts failure.

Congress has made revisions in recent years of various parts of the Federal criminal code, but S. 1437 has the effect of obviating this recent congressional action. Much of it is in the form of a "word massage" by the artistic hand of those interested in increasing the opportunities for prosecution or in achieving greater opportunities for confinement. Last year the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act of 1976 was enacted, but now a new concept is introduced without a fair evaluation of legislation only one year old. In 1974 there was a revision of the Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act, and instead of S. 1437 adopting the law less than 3 years old, there is again a clear effort to dilute and eliminate many of the ameliorative and reform provisions contained in that legislation. Our only expungement law for first offenders (21 U.S.C. 844) has also been modified with slight word changes so as to denigrate the rights of the individual. The work of the Congress in recent years should not be so easily discounted.

S. 1437 is too much too soon. Although the effort to reduce its bulk has been achieved, the magnitude of this proposed legislation staggers understanding and comprehension which is necessary to provide adequate feedback on these revolutionary legislative proposals. It is strongly urged that legislation be redrafted to focus on some particular aspect of the Federal criminal justice system (i.e. sentencing, jurisdiction), and after careful study and evaluation from those practicing regularly in the field, that legislation be considered by this Congress.

II. GENERAL PURPOSE (P 18 U.S.C. 101)

S. 1437 provides in section 101(b) general standards for prescribing sanctions, but neither in this section nor in the later sections dealing with sentencing is there any orientation concerning the predisposition toward the use of confinement. It is urged that section 101 be amended to include the following principles:

1. The sentence imposed in each case should call for the minimum amount of custody or confinement which is consistent with the protection of the public, the gravity of the offense, and the rehabilitative needs of the defendant.<sup>2</sup>
2. A sentence not involving confinement is to be preferred to a sentence involving partial or total confinement in the absence of affirmative reasons to the contrary.<sup>3</sup>

III. IMPRISONMENT

Our prisons are often placed where a life of crime is encouraged rather than deterred. The prison should be the last resort. Although it may be necessary for those who cannot otherwise be restrained, the use should be limited rather than expanded. Efforts at prison reform and the opportunities for rehabilitation and vocational training should be increased, but today there is an attitude common among prison authorities, including the Bureau of Prisons, that they are little more than warehouses. Ultimately, the people serving in those institutions return to our community and are often embittered by the experience. The needs of society would be best served by a general orientation in any federal criminal code to avoid confinement unless necessary.

Existing laws provide statutory maximums that are ameliorated by the actual sentences imposed by judges in the reasonable exercise of their discretion. Sometimes that discretion is abused. Long-term confinement (more than 3 years) is reserved for the minority of serious offenders, and it must be remembered that in the Federal criminal justice system we are faced with the Federal criminal defendant who is only rarely charged with those common law offenses that give rise to more serious offenses prosecuted within State court (i.e. murder, robbery, burglary). Even then the sentences meted out by American courts have been known to be excessive. Prof. Daniel J. Meador, now Special Assistant Attorney General, prepared a report in 1965 entitled "The Review of Criminal Sentences in England." In that report he offers this commentary on American sentencing practices:

"Another point to be noted is that criminal sanctions are imposed less heavily in England than in the United States. Observation suggests that English judges give probation or a fine in cases where imprisonment would be imposed in America. English prison sentences are shorter. A 3-year term is considered substantial, and 7 or 8 years a very long term. The 30 year sentences given in the train robbery case are almost unheard of." "ABA Standards Relating to Appellate Review of Sentences," appendix C 97-98 (approved draft 1968).

This disproportionate affinity for long-term confinement should be abated. The "ABA Standards Relating to Sentencing Alternatives and Procedures," standard 2.1(d) provides: "For most offenses, on the other hand, the maximum authorized prison term ought not to exceed 10 years except in unusual cases and normally should not exceed 5 years."

Since the Federal jurisdiction is a limited one, it might gain guidance from the largest state in formulating new statutes for sentencing. Effective July 1, 1977, California has completely revised its sentencing scheme. Except in capital cases, the maximum range of a sentence is 5, 6 or 7 years with the possibility of enhancements up to 3 years and the possibility of consecutive sentences.<sup>4</sup> The California Judicial Council on May 13, 1977 promulgated sentencing rules to implement this new Uniform Determinate Sentencing Act of 1976. Cal. Stats. 1976. CH 1139. This system too has a tack-on parole provision of not more than three years. The length of confinement is substantially less for a jurisdiction that has to deal with the common occurring criminal offenses which would more often involve violence or other danger to society than the type of offenses that are ordinarily the fare of federal courts. A range of sentences under California law that will take effect within a month are far less than the zones outlined in S. 1437.

Under existing law the judge at sentencing can grant probation or impose a sentence of confinement which is tailored to the circumstances of the offense giving credit to the extenuation or mitigation presented by the defendant. The abuses from the system come from the imposition of disproportionate or long-term confinement not justified by the circumstances surrounding the offense or the background of the individual. The existing ameliorative procedure for this is our Parole Commission, even though it does have a history of malfunctioning. The defendant facing a criminal charge must be advised of the maximum penalty. That is a question asked of the defendant at the time the plea of guilty is taken (rule 11, Federal rules of criminal procedure). When a lawyer advises a client, he would be remiss in his professional responsibilities if he did not state the maximum, and although counsel may miscalculate in his professional estimate the actual sentence imposed by the judge, his responsibility is to make clear that which is the outside limit for confinement. The maximum penalty, therefore, can provide some reasonable degree of certainty. Hopefully, it is not used in most instances. Under existing law, defense counsel states the statutory maximum, but into it he must also consider two essential factors: reduction for good time credit, as well as parole eligibility. The first is a "top"; the second is a minimum. On a 20-year sentence, a prisoner would only have to serve 13 years, 1 month, and there is a possibility that the prisoner could acquire "earned good time" which would make the sentence served approximately 11 years or less. A 20-year sentence under existing law might result in service of less time than on a 12-year sentence (class C felony) under S. 1437.

Bail-jumping might serve to point out the disparity. If a person is charged with bail-jumping on a class A-D felony, he is subject to 6-years confinement. (P 18 U.S.C. 2301(b)(4)). He has an add-on parole term of one to 2 years (P 18 U.S.C. 3834(b)(3)) and a contingent term of confinement of 90 days (P 18 U.S.C. 2303(b)(1)). Under a bail-jump offense under S. 1437, the defendant has the maximum term of confinement of 6 years 90 days plus a total exposure to confinement and parole to a maximum of eight years 90 days. Under existing law, the 5-year offense for bail-jumping (18 U.S.C. 3150), with good time deduction, has a mandatory release (18 U.S.C. 4163, 4164) after 3 years 8 months service of his sentence with a maximum parole period at that release of 10 months. Under existing law, the total exposure to confinement is 3 years 8 months with an overall exposure to confinement and parole of 4½ years. The difference between existing law and the proposed law is startling.

IV. PAROLE INELIGIBILITY

Under existing law, the trial judge may designate a period of up to one-third of the total sentence as a period of parole ineligibility. 18 U.S.C. 4205(b) (1). On a sentence of 6 months to 1 year, the judge may designate one-third of the sentence as time for release on parole but need not do so. 18 U.S.C. 4205(f). A person serving a sentence of 1 year and 1 day is eligible for release on parole after serving 4 months (18 U.S.C. 4205(a)), and if the judge imposes sentence under 18 U.S.C. 4205(b) (2) the person is eligible for parole at any time. S. 1437 inordinately favors a concept of parole ineligibility. The Parole Commission has not been abolished, but now the trial judge has the discretion to discount their potential undue generosity in releasing a meritorious prisoner by determining at sentencing that such future conduct will not in any way accelerate release from confinement. Under S. 1437 the prisoner must first serve 6 months before he is eligible for parole (P 18 U.S.C. 3831(a)), and the district court may impose the term of parole ineligibility up to 90 percent of the total term of confinement (P 18 U.S.C. 2301(c)). After the 120-day period has expired for a motion to reduce (rule 35, Federal rules of criminal procedure), only the Bureau of Prisons may suggest the removal of a term of parole ineligibility. (P 18 U.S.C. 2302(e) (1)).

V. PAROLE

Existing federal law provides for parole as an integral part of the overall sentence. If a prisoner is sentenced to 10 years confinement and released after 4 years, he has a 6-year parole period. The recent revisions of our parole system permit early termination at any time, a file review by the Parole Commission after 2 years, and a presumptive termination of parole after 5 years which, unless terminated must give the parolee an adversary hearing with counsel to determine the reasons for extension of parole. (18 U.S.C. 4211). Under S. 1437 parole is an add-on feature to the term of confinement, which extends out the overall period of federal control and supervision. Even though the prisoner may have served his sentence, during the period of parole there is a provision for contingent confinement up to 90 days which will serve as a punitive sanction in the event of some misstep on parole even though the total term of confinement has been served. If the individual has been required to serve every day of his sentence to confinement, then the sentence should be terminated. This type of parole after complete service of confinement is not a legitimate governmental control, and this type of parole provision only further strengthens the consideration that service of every day of confinement will literally be possible under S. 1437.

VI. SENTENCING COMMISSION

The duties of the Sentencing Commission include the formulation of guidelines for sentencing and parole (P 28 U.S.C. 994), but only the most general guidelines are used to suggest what standards should be achieved. The Parole Commission and Reorganization Act of 1976 provide authority to promulgate rules and guidelines for parole (18 U.S.C. 4203(a)(1)), but the use of the Salient Factor Score and the guidelines on sentencing ranges leave much to be desired. The fact that the person might have used an automobile in his offense (i.e. in bribery) would reduce his Salient Factor Score, and the arbitrariness of the sentencing ranges has also generated much criticism. Although it has been suggested that the Sentencing Commission will devise specific sentencing ranges, there is nothing in the proposed legislation for the duties of the Sentencing Commission that would preclude them from coming up with the very same standards now used by the Parole Commission. If the Parole Commission was functioning properly, the Sentencing Commission would not be necessary. S. 1437 does not even have the governmental efficiency/integrity to establish one or other as the agency, and it is somewhat inefficient and impractical to expect a separate federal agency to follow guidelines promulgated by another in its daily work, especially where those guidelines might have conflicted with prior practices of that agency. The principles sought in the reform of sentencing could now be achieved by an enlightened and renovated Parole Commission.

Congress should establish sentence ranges if they are to be used. California has set the example of one procedure, but it would be doubtful that the California legislature could be induced to transfer their responsibility of setting some sentencing guidelines by leaving the specific range of sentences up to the Sentencing Commission (i.e. Judicial Council of California to promulgate rules which only general maximum ranges). Whether or not such delegation of legislative powers is constitutional, it is improper without some specific standards to avoid the situation that has developed with the Parole Commission.

One of the examples Senator Kennedy has suggested that might be used by the Sentencing Commission dealt with the offense of bribery. A government officer holding the position of high public trust who solicits and/or receives something of value knowing its illegal purpose but enters into no specific agreement with the briber about how the payment will be earned is to receive 2 to 3 years, but if he had a particular agreed upon action as part of the bribe then the sentence would be 3 to 4 years. Who determines the actual basis for the sentencing range—the jury or the judge? As a defense lawyer, I feel that the precedent is such that it would require the jury, the trier of fact, to determine the specific allegations that might be considered at sentencing. Instead of the general issue of guilt, the jury will now have to find the specific degree of involvement. If the jury did not consider that factual controversy, then the present sentencing scheme would have to be substantially expanded to include due process guarantee so that the actual determination may be made openly and fairly.

The Sentencing Commission would undermine judicial integrity and responsibility. Sensitive to the import of his decision, the judge must tailor the sentence to fit the offender and the offense. Although the guidelines will permit deviation, deviations could be appealed. The judge recognizing promulgation of guidelines from upon high would take the easy course by merely accepting a range provided by the guidelines. Now the judge must accept responsibility for the sentence, but the use of guidelines would permit "the passing of the buck." Those judges who might be the "offenders" would still be able to "end-run" the guidelines, and even with appellate review it will be difficult to reverse their determination based upon a face-to-face confrontation with the defendant.

The Sentencing Commission and S. 1437 do not eliminate Rule 35, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which provides for a motion to reduce sentence 120 days after the original sentence is imposed with the period tolled during an appeal. Especially where there is an appeal and the defendant confined, the district court often gains an advantage from an institution report on the progress of the defendant in prison. The judge has the second meaningful chance to evaluate his sentence. The potential of Rule 35 should be expanded to provide later reevaluation in light of actual performance, but the Sentencing Commission with its "freeze-dried" sentencing guidelines effective at the time of sentencing are the product of pure prognostication giving little advantage to hindsight review.

The Sentencing Commission not only duplicates the work of the Parole Commission but does inefficiently that which could be more readily handled by the Court of Appeals. A defendant may now appeal his conviction, and if he files a motion to reduce, he may appeal the denial of the motion to reduce for sentence. Although the appellate review of a motion to reduce sentence is extremely limited, the vehicle is there. If a conviction were reviewed, it would add little to include the sentence imposed by the judge. If the sentence were reviewed, the circuit would have insight into the range of sentences and the performance of the district judges, and the circuits would be better able to ameliorate arbitrariness in sentencing in those rare cases. Further, the arbitrariness occurs in the excessive cases, not in the case where the defendant receives a light sentence.

The Sentencing Commission in formulating its guidelines will consider the background of the defendant (P 28 U.S.C. 995(b)) which would include the defendant's criminal history. The offense should be the key in imposing punishment (confinement), and the background on the individual should only be used to alleviate, not aggravate the sentence. The background of the individual is important in determining the grant of probation as an alternative to confinement (confinement), and the background on the individual should only be used to alleviate, not aggravate the sentence. In achieving some uniformity in sentences, the offense should be the "polar star" for the duration of confinement. However, the proposed legislation (S. 1437) is extremely ambiguous and permits new standards ranging from those now used by the Parole Commission to those suggested by the LEAA Denver Project which allowed some type of cross-reference or point system to allow mechanical computation of the actual sentence. Even the guidelines permit variation, and that is only due recognition to the inherent discretion a judge must have. If discretion is allowed, what objective factors or criteria are to be used by the sentencing judge? If the LEAA Denver Project is to be used, then it should be spelled out in the statute. If the Parole Commission guidelines are proper, then the statute should so state.

For the Sentencing Commission guidelines to have any effect, the judge will have to state more than his reasons at the time of sentencing (P 18 U.S.C. 2003(b)). He will have to state the factual considerations placing the defendant in a particular category. There is no provision for a statement of these requisite factual findings, and they are highly important in light of the fact that any type of evidence may be considered at sentencing (Federal Rules of Evidence 1101(d); P 18 U.S.C. 3714).

The guidelines proposed by the Sentencing Commission would be national guidelines, but such guidelines discount regional and other variances. The federal jurisdiction is a limited one, and it does not have the day-to-day criminal justice experience of a state. Although I am not suggesting "local community standards," I think that sentencing patterns geared to a region such as the size of a Circuit would be more appropriate. The type of federal offenses might vary with the region, and guidelines might be more accurate along those lines.

The purpose of the Sentencing Commission is to limit the broad discretion of the trial judge, but what limitations are placed upon the unbridled discretion of the prosecutor? May a prosecutor, by his form of charging or factual allegations, limit the range of sentencing by the district judge? The district judge now may consider any evidence at sentencing, and will the district judge be able to go beyond the actual charge and characterize the offense so as to fit within the guidelines? For example, the offense originally charged was a 4-6 year offense under the guidelines, but the offense to which the plea of guilty is under permits probation or a sentence of up to 2 years. Would the trial judge still be able to impose the 4-6 year sentence even though there has been no formal finding of that degree of criminal liability. It would be suspected that if the prosecution and defense counsel agreed either upon a particular characterization, the trial judge would most likely acquiesce. If so, the whole working of the Sentencing Commission could be avoided. This would give the prosecutor a powerful tool to induce guilty pleas to offenses of lesser liabilities to avoid the more serious liabilities set forth in a sentencing schedule. If district judges did not permit this type of device, the only alternative would be increased jury trials on the issue of criminal liability to avoid the foregoing sentence predicted by the guidelines of the Sentencing Commission.

The Sentencing Commission will have a difficult time taking into consideration different districts charging practices. In one district a charge of possession of 20 kilos of marijuana may rate a misdemeanor with reasonable expectation of probation, but in another district would be treated as a felony, (21 U.S.C. 841 (a) (1)) with reasonable expectation of a penitentiary sentence. The Sentencing Commission will have a difficult time comparing these two because of the disposition—one a misdemeanor, and the other a felony. The resolution of this by guidelines would seem to be impossible.

VII. SENTENCING OF PROBATION

Under existing law, probation is an alternative to a sentence of confinement, but under S. 1437 it is referred to as a form of sentence. Under existing law, if the defendant is sentenced to a sentence of more than 6 months, the court may require that the defendant spend up to 6 months in a jail-type institution and suspend the execution of the remainder of confinement and place the defendant on probation. This provision would require characterization of the offense at the time of sentencing so that the defendant would be aware of the maximum he was facing if there was a later violation of probation. Under S. 1437 the 6 month condition of confinement is available for a sentence of probation, but the defendant would not become aware of the maximum until the time of final sentencing after a possible revocation of probation. The danger with this procedure is that the misconduct giving rise to the probation revocation might influence the court in determining the nature of the sentence of confinement for the original charge. Mandatory supervision and probation should not be required (P 18 U.S.C. 3801). The qualification for a probation officer should include at least a college degree in a social science (P 18 U.S.C. 3802), and it does not seem appropriate that federal statute should authorize a probation officer to carry a firearm (P 18 U.S.C. 3016). One of the most serious deficiencies of S. 1437 is its failure to give some preferred status to probation as an alternative to confinement.

VIII. FEDERAL YOUTH CORRECTION ACT

In 1950, Congress initiated an experiment for youthful offenders which focused on "treatment and supervision" rather than imprisonment. (18 U.S.C. 5026). See also Dorszynski v. United States, 418 U.S. 424 (1974)). This sentencing alternative is available for youthful offenders up to 26 years of age. (18 U.S.C. 5006(e), 4216). Although the Bureau of Prisons has not responded well to the treatment for youthful offenders (they have been placed in penitentiaries and treated as regular adult prisoners), the purpose of the legislation should be continued and not abandoned. The principal asset of this legislation is a provision for a certificate to set aside conviction upon completion of the expiration of the sentence or completion of probation. (18 U.S.C. 5021). Although the ramifications of the certificate have not been legally clarified, its beneficial effect has been compared to being better than a pardon. (Tatum v. United States, 310 F. 2 854 (D.C. Cir. 1962)). No equivalent remedy is found in S. 1437. The failure to make any distinction from those under the age of 18 up to age 26 for a felony offense, which exists only as an option, is a serious deficiency.

IX. FEDERAL JUVENILE DELINQUENCY ACT

In September 1974 Congress passed a comprehensive revision of the federal criminal law relating to juveniles, persons under the age of 18 years at the time of the offense. Federal jurisdiction was ordinarily evoked only if the state could not assume jurisdiction, and this new law emphasized lack of restraint prior to adjudication and treatment if the juvenile was adjudicated delinquent.

A line by line comparison of S. 1437 against existing law will point out the efforts to modify the recently enacted legislation for juveniles. For example, jurisdiction will be assumed over juveniles for Class A, B, and C felonies but now only occurs only after a hearing (P 18 U.S.C. 3601; 18 U.S.C. 5032). An existing mandatory duty is to notify juvenile's parent, guardian, or custodian if he is taken into custody is now modified that the government shall "make reasonable efforts" to notify such persons. (P 18 U.S.C. 3602(a)). If the juvenile wishes to be treated as an adult which is his existing right, he may be treated as an adult under S. 1437 only if he waives the defense of immaturity. If the juvenile was too young to be criminally responsible, he should not be forced to be treated as juvenile and denied the possible right to trial by jury. Under existing law, the detained juvenile cannot be confined in an institution where he has regular contact with adult prisoners (18 U.S.C. 5035), but this is reduced to an "insofar as possible" condition under S. 1437 (P 18 U.S.C. 3602(b)). A careful word-by-word review of the Proposed Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act will reveal many variations from the recently promulgated law that inured to the advantage and convenience of the Attorney General. If Congress has spoken so recently on the issue of juvenile delinquency and S. 1437 is a neutral compilation of the law, these changes should be carefully scrutinized and weighed. They are not restricted to the laws relating to juveniles but permeate the entire proposed federal criminal code. These slight word modifications that exist throughout the entire legislation are grounds enough that the matter should be put over for several years to provide adequate review of the impact of existing legislation and the needs or reasons for these changes. The careful reading of the entire S. 1437 will clearly demonstrate a prosecutorial bias that should not be tolerated under the guise of some type of "neutral" codification.

X. PRESUMPTIVE MINIMUM MANDATORY SENTENCING

After a long and tortuous history, Congress finally abandoned the minimum mandatory sentencing that grew up under our old narcotics laws with the adoption of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Control Act of 1970. Prior to 1 May 1971, if a person possessed a drug (i.e. heroin, cocaine, marijuana) they could be charged either with an unlawful importation count (21 U.S.C. 174 or 21 U.S.C. 176(a)) or with a tax count (21 U.S.C. 4705(a) or 4744(a)). With the provisions of old 26 U.S.C. 7237(d) a person convicted under 21 U.S.C. 174 or 176(a) would be ineligible for probation and parole. The alternative charging counts available to the prosecutor permitted gross discrimination, for if the defendant did not accept the "deal" of the prosecutor to a "soft count," he would be prosecuted with the "hard count" with the minimum mandatory of 5 years imprisonment. The plea to the "soft (tax) count" had no minimum mandatory sentence, and the defendant was eligible for probation. The defendant would surrender his day in court to litigate criminal liability, because if there was a chance that he lost, the penalty was too great. Under existing laws, the maximum penalties available are severe. Federal judges are strict and stern in punishing serious drug offenders, but for the weak addict involved in a criminal case, an adjustment is possible.

S. 1437 in response to the opposition of many including the American Bar Association<sup>5</sup> changes a mandatory minimum for trafficking in an opiate (P 18 U.S.C. 1811) and use of a weapon in a crime (P 18 U.S.C. 1823) to a presumptive minimum mandatory of a term of two years and a parole eligibility of not less than two years with such sentence to run consecutive. However, S. 1437 grants an exception to the imposition of the mandatory minimum sentence if the court expressly finds at the time of the offense that the defendant was less than 18 years old: the defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired, although the impairment was not sufficient to constitute a defense of the prosecution; the defendant was under unusual and substantial duress although not such duress that would constitute the defense of prosecution; or the defendant was an accomplice and the conduct constituting the offense was principally the conduct of another person and the defendant's participation was relatively minor. This exceptional language is not unique for it tracks the very language used to permit a jury to avoid the imposition of the death penalty for aircraft piracy. 49 U.S.C. 1473(6). In a sense, the comparison of a death penalty with the minimum mandatory is appropriate, for both should not be part of any reasonable sentencing scheme. Trial judges do adhere to the law, and it is possible in meritorious cases (i.e. a 20-year-old first offender) the judge would be forced by virtue of the statutory guidance to impose a two-year minimum mandatory and two-year parole ineligibility which would insure confinement for a period of two years. A minimum mandatory should be avoided both directly (S. 1) and indirectly (S. 1437).

XI. EXPUNGEMENT

The only federal statute that recognizes and authorizes deferred sentencing and expungement of criminal records is 21 U.S.C. 844, adopted in 1970, which is part of the federal provisions prohibiting possession of a controlled substance. No other federal law permits expungement. Under 21 U.S.C. 844(b)(1) after a guilty plea or a trial, the court may defer further proceedings without entering a judgment of guilty. If the person obtains a dismissal and was "not over 21 years of age at the time of the offense," the record may be formally expunged. (21 U.S.C. 844(b)(2)).

The corresponding provision in S. 1437 (P 18 U.S.C. 3807) does not use the language of deferring proceedings but refers to the withholding of the entry of the judgment of conviction. Implicit is a finding of guilty which is not the intent of 21 U.S.C. 844(b)(1). The expungement provisions are restricted to persons who are "less than 21 years of age at the time of the offense." The advantages of deferred sentencing and expungement are unfortunately limited under present law to drug offenses, and any meritorious revision would consider the expansion of this to other misdemeanor offenses especially those involving youthful offenders. S. 1437, in its traditional nature, with a prosecutorial gloss, defines and restricts the language of recently adopted legislation by Congress so as to restrict its import. This action is symptomatic of the total revision which should cast in doubt those sections that cannot be so carefully scrutinized against existing law.

<sup>5</sup> ABA standards relating to sentencing alternatives and procedures, standard 3.2(a) which states: "Because there are so many factors in an individual case which cannot be predicted in advance, it is unsound for the legislature to require that the court impose a minimum period of imprisonment which must be served before an offender becomes eligible for parole or for the legislature to prescribe such a minimum term itself. It is likewise unsound for the legislature to condition parole eligibility upon service of a specified portion of the maximum term."

XII. THE APPELLATE REVIEW OF SENTENCES

Under existing law, there is no practical federal review of a sentence. "If there is one rule in the federal criminal practice which is firmly established, it is that the appellate court has no control over a sentence which is within the limits allowed by a statute." Gurera v. United States, 40 F.2d 338, 340 (8th Cir. 1930). Cited with approval in Dorszynski v. United States, 418 U.S. 424, 440 (1974). In some rare cases, the federal reviewing courts have granted some partial relief in extreme cases. However, the exceptions prove the general rule that there is no practical review of a federal sentence.

Appellate review of a sentence is available under S. 1437 (P 18 U.S.C. 3725), and this concept of appellate review of sentences is integrated with the guidelines established by the Sentencing Commission. Now there would be three reviewing authorities of a sentence: the Parole Commission, the Sentencing Commission, and now the Court of Appeals. Appeals are allowed only if the sentence would be outside of the guidelines and was "clearly unreasonable." The test should be "reasonableness" if one is seeking to establish a form of justice, for with such a high standard as "clearly unreasonable" it would be difficult for any court as a matter of law to override the factual considerations that would be primarily within the evaluation of the district court. Also, the fact that the sentence of confinement, and even a short sentence that might not fall outside of the guidelines where clearly probation was expected, should be reviewable. An important discrepancy and inconsistency is the fact that under Section 3725 a defendant who receives a six month sentence of imprisonment for a felony might have appellate review, but a defendant who receives a year confinement before the Magistrate on a misdemeanor would have no appellate review. The existence of an appeal by the government for a sentence is totally inconsistent with the spirit of the principles underlining the Former Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment and the professional responsibility of the prosecutor to defer to the court at the time of sentencing rather than being an advocate for "stiff sentences."<sup>6</sup> It is a radical departure to expand the power of the government to appeal to include the self-initiating right to appeal the sentence if it is lower than the Sentencing Commission guidelines.

Appellate review of federal sentences is necessary. The judges resist it, and the prosecutors claim that if it exists they wish to have a similar opportunity. It is interesting to note that the experience in England dating to 1906 did permit the defendant an appeal of sentence, and when the defendant did so the appellate court had the right to increase the sentence on appeal. Obviously, this is much less than the situation that the government has the right of appealing lenient sentences. The 60-year experience in England resulted in the statutory modification to deny to the reviewing court that considered the sentence of the defendant, the power to increase the sentence. This experience should serve as a valuable lesson for us. See Report of then-Professor Daniel J. Meador, ABA Standards Relating to Appellate Review of Sentence, Appendix C (Approved Draft 1968). The right of appeal to the defendant would obviate the claim of the existing disparity in sentences. As mentioned above, it would be best handled by the Court of Appeal which already has existing apparatus to handle it. The right of appeal should extend to any term of confinement, whether imposed by the district court or the Magistrate, but the appeal from the Magistrate could be fashioned to the district court.

The Judicial Conference of the United States, through its appropriate committee, is now considering a proposed Rule 35.1, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The judges do not seek appellate review of sentencing, but they recognize the necessity of it and ultimately the fact that the merit of such review will ultimately be a fact. Since the judiciary, albeit reluctantly, is involved in such a proposal, it would be advisable to await the outcome of that judicial action, if it is not unreasonably delayed, prior to formulating guidelines for appellate review of federal criminal sentences.

XIII. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

S. 1437 provides for substantially increased fines, expanded forfeiture proceedings, and new techniques such as notice to the victim. Some of these pro-

<sup>6</sup> ABA standards relating to the Prosecution Function, standard 6.1(b) states: "Where sentence is fixed by the judge without jury participation, the prosecutor ordinarily should not make any specific recommendation as to the appropriate sentence, unless his recommendation is requested by the court or he has agreed to make a recommendation as a result of plea discussions."

visions are overly broad and need to be limited. Some are designed for meritorious purposes, but they might be subject to serious abuse unless legislative amendments are made. All of these provisions, as well as many other provisions of S. 1437 need additional review and study, and let us hope that sufficient time will be allowed to permit a careful review of all the sentencing provisions of S. 1437 which could have a decided impact on federal criminal practice.

XIV. CONCLUSION

In 1971 the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws (Brown Commission) filed its final report. Although that proposed revision introduced innovative concepts, to a substantial degree it tracked the existing federal criminal practice at the same serving as a comprehensive codification.

S. 1 (1975) was a substantial reconstruction of that first attempt, but it offered so much that its size and bulk defied analyses by even those regularly practicing in the field. S. 1437, the "son of S. 1," has removed those provisions which were subject to the greatest public notoriety. Those provisions, although deserving of careful review, overshadowed the serious neglect on other important passages of this legislation. One of the most important aspects of the legislation was the provision that would radicalize existing sentencing practices. S. 1437 offered modifications to the original sentencing proposals of S. 1, but when S. 1437 is compared to existing law, clearly existing law is to be preferred. To choose the continuation of existing federal sentencing practices, which defects have been publicized, should seriously indicate the inherent weaknesses in S. 1437. There is a superficial appeal to a concept of liberal reform to provide some aura of "certainty" at sentencing, but in the process discretion of the impartial judge, which in a few cases has been abused but in more cases has offset the abuses of unbridled prosecutorial discretion, has now been limited and handicapped. No comparable provision is offered for control of prosecutorial abuse in the charging process. Relief from long-term and protracted incarceration, one of the most serious aspects of American criminal penology, is not addressed. The opportunity to evaluate a substantial experiment in sentencing in California is discounted in a mad rush to pass S. 1437 during this Congress. Although Congress must give reasonable attention to those that must enforce the federal law, defense should be provided an opportunity, more than a pro forma appearance in a hearing on a bill that might be already "cast in concrete," to participate in the formulation of such a comprehensive overhaul of the federal criminal laws. Failure to do so will only wreak havoc, for a bad law generates needless litigation and will produce mountainous remedial legislation occupying the time of one already over-taxed Congress. In Ranger School, I learned the principle of the Five "P's" (Prior Planning (or preparation) Prevents Poor Performance). S. 1437 is a clear violation of that fundamental principle, and it should be sent back to the drawingboards.

STATEMENT OF JOHN J. CLEARY, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, FEDERAL DEFENDERS OF SAN DIEGO, INC., ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL LEGAL AID & DEFENDER ASSOCIATION

Mr. CLEARY. Thank you very much, Senator.

I am John Cleary, on behalf of the National Legal Aid & Defender Association.

I would point out also that the California Attorneys for Criminal Justice have endorsed the position we have taken pertaining to S. 1437. Further, they would like the right to submit a supplemental statement.

Since in the short time I have had to prepare this statement I have focused on sentencing, I would also reserve the right on behalf of the National Legal Aid & Defender Association to file a supplemental statement, if that is permissible.

Senator THURMOND. Without objection, that will be received.

Mr. CLEARY. At this time I would just like to discuss one of my major concerns. It is that S. 1437, the son of S. 1, has not really ever considered in the formulation and drafting the role of the defense attorney. This is not to show some type of undue consideration for a defense lawyer, but those persons who may come through the judicial system should have a voice.

The role that we have as Federal defenders—and Mr. Roger Lowenstein, the Federal public defender from New Jersey, and myself, the Federal defender from San Diego—is to offer some substantial experience in dealing with the criminal justice machinery.

Unfortunately, S. 1437, designed to achieve what I would call relative certainty, has caused serious deficiencies. Compared against existing Federal criminal law, S. 1437 is worse.

The problem has been that the drafting of this legislation from its onset has been the work of the prosecutors—for the prosecutors, by the prosecutors, and of the prosecutors.

A recent example is section 3835(b). Under existing law, section 4214 of title 18, you are entitled to counsel at a preliminary hearing on revocation of parole. That has been eliminated.

If you look at the Juvenile Delinquency Act established by this Congress in 1974, less than 3 years later substantial reservation and dilution exists. The wasting away of the rights of the juvenile is present in this substitute form.

We have also, for example, in the only Federal expungement statute a further erosion of the rights of the individual.

Confinement is the order of the day. S. 1437 oozes confinement. Its whole attitude is to put people in jail.

We like to think that the ABA articulates a simple premise of penology: that is, the least confinement necessary should be the orientation. The avoidance of confinement might not be appropriate in every case, but it should be the general orientation. The ABA standards on sentencing, 2.2 and 2.3, articulate these points. Is that anywhere stated in section 101 or the sentencing provision of S. 1437? Certainly not.

Imprisonment in S. 1437 is for ever and ever. We have the ABA standard which talks about 10 years in abnormal cases being the top and 5 in the ordinary case. This starts off with class A, life imprisonment; class B, 25 years; and then it goes down to 12, 6, and 3.

It is hard to bring home the difference in existing law, but I would like to use as an example bailjumping—18 U.S.C. 3150 is the present bailjumping statute.

Under S. 1437, bailjumping has for a class A through D felony a 6-year confinement provision. Add to that the tack-on parole of 1 to 2 years, and that would give you 8 years with the tack-on contingent period of incarceration of 90 days. That is 8 years and 90 days of exposure to confinement and Federal parole. That is 6 years and 90 days of confinement.

Under existing law, the maximum for bailjumping is 5 years. Given a person's mandatory release date, which is 3 years and 8 months, the maximum period of incarceration would be 3 years and 8 months followed by a 10-month parole. You have to compare 3 years and 8 months confinement against 6 years and 90 days in this new reform that "lessens."

Class D offenses are the substitute for existing 5-year offenses, a common penalty, but this code has an overwhelming tendency to double confinement over existing law. The trend of socking it to people permeates this piece of legislation.

Parole ineligibility, by which the sentencing judge now can only give up to one-third under 4205(b) (1), under this parole ineligibility up to 90 percent of the sentence. Instead of thinking in terms of being eligible for parole—existing law—the converse is true.

Under existing law, if you get a year and a day sentence, you are eligible for release at any time, even though many of us know that to be illusory. You might get out in 4 or 5 months and you will certainly get out by 9 months. Under this, you cannot get out, once you go in, for a period of 6 months.

The Sentencing Commission is a nice exercise, I think, in futility. If you can consider what the Parole Commission has accomplished, you might find much criticism. However, I think what you have to compare is what the Parole Commission has been authorized by this Congress to do.

Under 4203(a) (1) they can set up guidelines for prison sentences. That same general authority is given to the Sentencing Commission but there are no further guidelines.

I think a very easy and warranted charge is that this delegation to a sentencing commission would be unconstitutional. The theory is that by giving this authority to the Sentencing Commission they will come up with reasonable zones. With that concept there is the portent for fantastic litigation.

Once guidelines are established, the Sentencing Commission will create a de facto form of minimum mandatory sentences. It will allow what I think is the one thing that is not addressed adequately in this bill. The bill attempts to impede and restrict judicial discretion. What about the prosecutorial discretion?

We now have a new code that adds on literally hundreds of charges not otherwise existing.

Before this, a bank robber could only face one charge, 18 U.S.C. 2113 (a) and (d). Now he could face criminal entry, use of a gun, and robbery—three counts. Of course, the provision is that you cannot go more than double the sentence, more than 24 years straight time, under S. 1437.

This is a mockery. This has no regulation of the prosecution. Of course, given the tone of its drafters, I doubt that it would have such limitations.

The problem is what is the effect of this type of certainty in sentencing. Chief Justice Burger asks us to consider the impact of legislation upon the courts. The impact would be, given a certain sentence, the prosecutors may think that you would deal out to a lesser sentence, which is common every day, although you will avoid your day in court, and sacrifice your opportunity to have your innocence established or the guilt not proven to avoid penalty that will be controlled by the prosecutor. That is coercive plea bargaining.

How do you control this variation in the prosecution? In one district, 20 kilos of marihuana might be a misdemeanor with probation while in another district it might be a felony with a jail term. How do you regulate that?

The presumptive minimum mandatory sentences are absolutely terrible. I think the example there is that the only exceptions—and it is ironic—are the same exceptions as to the death penalty. Death penalties and minimum mandatory sentences should be treated in the same fashion.

I would have liked to have said a little bit about appellate review of sentences. This is a mockery for it provides prosecutorial review.

With the remaining time, I would like to have Mr. Roger Lowenstein speak to sentencing and any other portions of the bill on which he cares to comment.

STATEMENT OF ROGER LOWENSTEIN, ON BEHALF OF NATIONAL LEGAL AID & DEFENDER ASSOCIATION

MR. LOWENSTEIN. I am the Federal public defender in New Jersey. Our office represents people in Federal court who are charged with Federal crimes and who are too poor to afford an attorney. It is a very tough job. It is probably as difficult as being in Congress. It is very hard.

One of the hard things, I imagine, about being an elected official is that crime as a problem in our society gets put at the doorstep of our elected leaders. What do we do about crime? What do we do about people who cannot leave their homes because they are afraid and are worried about being attacked?

The problem with S. 1437 and with Federal approaches is that we are a very limited jurisdiction. The Federal system does not begin to incorporate all the crime and all the criminal offenses. In fact, more than 90 percent of crimes are handled in State courts, as they should be.

The crime that scares us, the stranger-to-stranger violence, that is mostly State crime.

What do you do when constituents write you hundreds and hundreds of letters saying, "What are you doing about crime?" In fact, all that Congress can do is really approach crime in the Federal system, which is a very small percentage of all crime.

The general reaction has been, unfortunately, to take that small area of Federal law which is largely nonviolent and to overcriminalize that. I guess this was partly a reaction to the depression era and the worry about spreading interstate crime.

We have now on the books a tremendous disparity of Federal offenses, most of which are overly punished and, therefore, greatly in need of some codification.

Codification is a good idea. It is something that has never been done in a good way. So the general effort is to be applauded.

However, if the codification results in continuing the overcriminalized, heavy sentences for crimes which do not really deserve that kind of heavy attention, then the codification effort will not be successful.

When Chief Justice Burger talks about sentencing disparities, I think he means not only disparities from one Federal judge to another Federal judge, but I think he also worries about disparities between State courts and Federal courts.

The very same kind of offense, an armed robbery, if it is in a bank, might very well result in a 20- to 25-year sentence in Federal court and 8 to 10 in a State court. These are disparities which have to be resolved.

One of the real good provisions in S. 1437 is section 205 which suggests that in concurrent jurisdiction where a crime could be handled either in State court or in Federal court, it might very well be the best idea to prefer State prosecution in all but certain particular Federal kinds of crimes.

Federal courts have limited jurisdiction. I think that it would be worthwhile to analyze where Federal prosecutors' priorities are and carve out those particular kinds of special Federal cases, focus on those, and really let the States handle the bulk of the criminal prosecutions and spend a lot of time getting more money to State prosecutors so that they can do the job.

The problem I have with the sentencing part of the legislation is this. I am absolutely in favor of appellate review of sentence. We have it in New Jersey.

In the State courts, which are far more crowded than the Federal courts, every sentence, if the defendant wishes, may be appealed. The appellate judges have handled it expeditiously. It has been no burden. I think in the Federal system it would work extremely well.

Instead of appellate review of sentencing, in S. 1437 we have a Commission, which worries me greatly. I worry that the Commission is going to set guidelines which will result in extremely harsh penalties. Once again, I feel that the penalties are far too harsh at the moment.

I would like to suggest that there is one real problem with the appeals by the Government of the sentence. I am submitting a legal memorandum on that issue to the committee and I ask that it be incorporated in the record. I will not go into it.

When the Government is allowed to appeal a sentence, what occurs to me is that at the point where plea bargains, if any, are discussed, that is one more hammer used by the Government to obtain a favorable plea from the defendant.

For instance, they might say, "You plead guilty here or else we are going to appeal your sentence if it is too lenient; if you plead guilty, we promise we will not appeal."

It is a kind of tool that may be abused in the prosecutorial process. I worry about that.

I further worry in the presentence investigations, which are now opened up in S. 1437 to all evidence regardless how lawfully obtained, people are going to be subjected to harsh sentences not for the crime they committed, but for rumors and allegations of other crimes which have no real business being in a presentence report.

I appreciate the opportunity of being here and representing the National Legal Aid & Defender Association.

Senator THURMOND. Thank you very much. We thank you for your appearance here and your contribution to this hearing. Your statement will be printed in the record.

[The statement follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ROGER A. LOWENSTEIN, FEDERAL PUBLIC DEFENDER FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY ON BEHALF OF NATIONAL LEGAL AID & DEFENDER ASSOCIATION

I thank this Subcommittee for the opportunity to share my views on some aspects of S. 1437, representing the National Legal Aid and Defender Association. Ours is the only national organization of public defenders, and among our membership are hundreds of defense attorneys who practice regularly in the federal courts. S. 1437, if enacted into law, will become the major working document for those attorneys who practice regularly in the federal courts.

It is our position generally that federal criminal statutes are overcriminalized. Sentences are far too long, giving rise to widespread sentencing disparities. There are far too few misdemeanors which would allow lesser offenders to have their cases disposed of in magistrate's courts. Too many unsubstantial prosecutions are disposed of by means of a felony prosecution in district court. S. 1437 does not go nearly far enough in reducing maximum penalties and providing for lesser-included offenses which may be disposed of in magistrate's courts.

Little mention has been made of § 205 of the bill. That section would permit federal prosecutors to refer the bulk of routine cases to state courts, where there is concurrent jurisdiction. This would be a commendable technique for reducing the disparities in sentencing between state and federal offenses, as well as removing the routine case from federal court dockets. Federal courts are specialty courts by virtue of our Constitution. The bulk of crime and therefore the bulk of law enforcement is on the State level. Unfortunately, the public outrage on the crime problem demands action from our federal legislature. The wisest response to the public outcry would be to provide more adequate funds for state law enforcement efforts. An unwise response would be to continue the overcriminalization of federal offenses.

With regard to sentencing, we recommend specific statutory provision for appellate review of sentencing in all cases, but limited to the ability of the Court of Appeals to reduce a sentence upon appeal by the defendant. In the State Court system in New Jersey, the judge's discretion in imposing sentencing is merely one more issue to be determined by the appellate court. For quite a number of years the state appellate courts carefully developed a "common law" of sentencing and have succeeded in eliminating gross disparities statewide.

A similar system would work well in the federal system, if each circuit would gradually develop its own careful standards in reviewing district court sentencing determinations. The proposed Sentencing Commission in S. 1437 does not provide an adequate appeal, and there are strong indications that defendants would suffer from even longer sentences under the new system. The Parole Commission has been severely criticized for keeping extreme numbers of non-violent defendants in prison long after the Bureau of Prisons and the sentencing judges indicate the incarceration should be terminated. The Parole Commission justifies its decisions upon "guidelines" which would be identical to the proposed Sentencing Commission's guidelines. An overly cautious judge might defer automatically to harsh guidelines rather than mitigate the sentence and risk reversal on appeal.

At a minimum, if there are to be sentencing guidelines, they should completely replace the parole system which should be eliminated. Any move in the direction of increased certainty would be appreciated by our clients who are too often confused and disappointed by the current system.

With regard to the government's right of appeal in proposed § 3725 of the bill, I attach a memorandum of law which raises grave constitutional questions concerning that "right." The government should not be permitted to have one additional weapon in coercing guilty pleas from defendants who may have defenses to the crime charged. A criminal trial is not an even contest. Introducing the notion of symmetry into the criminal justice process is misleading and unfair. The defendant should be able to challenge the abuse of discretion by a judge. Notions of double jeopardy prevent the government from having an equal right to re-litigate a case against a particular defendant.

We appreciate the opportunity to provide this information to the Subcommittee and to participate in this important work.

MEMORANDUM OF LAW CONCERNING SECTION 3725 OF S. 1437

Section 3725 of proposed bill S. 1437 presents grave questions of constitutional considerations and public policy. Specifically, § 3725 (b), (c), and (e) provide for review in the court of appeals of a final sentence imposed for a felony if the sentence includes a fine or a term of imprisonment lower than the minimum established in guidelines issued by the Sentencing Commission. If the court of appeals determines that the sentence is "clearly unreasonable" and too low, it may remand the case for imposition of a greater sentence or for further sentencing procedures, or impose a greater sentence.

The most serious defect in this provision is that the defendant whose case is appealed by the government is exposed to double jeopardy in violation of rights guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. That guarantee protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and multiple punishment for the same offense. North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1968). The right of the government to seek an enlarged sentence on its own appeal has never been litigated. However, the Supreme Court has held that a second punishment proposed on the same facts for the same statutory offense violates the prohibition against double jeopardy. Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163 (1873). Also, in United States v. Benz, 282 U.S. 304 (1931), the Court noted that a court action to increase the punishment of one serving a criminal sentence is illegal. Although under the appeal provisions of S. 1437 a defendant could receive an increased sentence before actually beginning to serve the one imposed, the same prohibitions against double jeopardy apply. "The prohibition is not against being twice punished, but against being twice put in jeopardy." United States v. Bell, 163 U.S. 622, 669 (1896).

Once a specific sentence has been imposed upon a defendant, he has been in jeopardy as to the possible greater sentence. He risks the maximum permissible punishment when first tried. That risk having been faced once need not be faced again. North Carolina v. Pearce, supra at 746, Douglas concurring. In Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1954), the Court held that a defendant who had appealed a conviction of second-degree murder could not be convicted upon appeal and retrial for first-degree murder because of double jeopardy. The Court found an "implicit acquittal" of the higher charge. Justice Harlan, in his opinion, in North Carolina v. Pearce, supra at 746, states that this concept applies equally to the imposition of a greater sentence. Since the defendant's offense had been found to be of a certain limited degree of "badness" or gravity only, only a certain limited punishment was merited. Imposition of a greater sentence would thus be constitutionally prohibited.

The specific holding of Pearce is not to the contrary. The Court held that an increased sentence could be imposed at retrial after an appeal by the defendant when based upon objective information concerning identifiable conduct on the part of the defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing proceeding. This narrow scope for the permissible imposition of a greater sentence does not apply to the provisions of S. 1437. First, the government's appeal under § 3725(b) would presumably be based not on the defendant's conduct occurring after the original sentencing, but on an opinion that the sentence below the suggested guidelines was too low. Second, the majority in Pearce based its holding on the rationale that where a first conviction has been successfully set aside at a defendant's behest, the conviction has been wholly nullified and the "slate wiped clean." Supra at 721. This clearly does not apply to a government appeal of a sentence under § 3725. In this instance, the first conviction still stands, so the defendant is exposed to double jeopardy. Further, the appeal is not at a defendant's behest, but at the government's.

Some cases have advanced the theory that a defendant taking an appeal waives his constitutional protection against double jeopardy. Waiver represents some form of knowing and intelligent relinquishment of a right. This waiver concept cannot apply to a defendant who helplessly stands by while the government appeals his sentence. Such a defendant has patently not "assumed the risk" of an appeal.

That the Double Jeopardy Clause proscribes the imposition of a harsher sentence upon resentencing where there has been either a new trial nor a conviction was affirmed in United States v. Durbin, 542 F. 2d 486 (8th Cir. 1976). In that case the defendant sought to vacate a sentence on the ground that a subsequently reversed conviction for an unrelated offense had been taken into account in its imposition. He received a greater sentence upon resentencing. The Court found that since Durbin had neither sought nor acquired a nullification of his conviction, the ban against double jeopardy prohibited imposition of an increased sentence. Pearce was specifically distinguished in that "the guarantee against double jeopardy does not restrict the length of the sentence upon reconviction." United States v. Durbin, supra at 488 (emphasis added). A defendant therefore may not receive an enlarged sentence based on the original conviction as would be the case with government appeals of sentencing under § 3725.

In addition to constitutional problems with § 3725, several questions of public policy must be carefully examined as well. First, defendants may be forced to engage in plea bargaining with prosecutors who promise not to take an appeal as one of the bases of the bargain. It is true that there is a societal interest in efficient criminal administration in having guilty defendant plead guilty, thus avoiding unnecessary trials. However, it is detrimental to society to have innocent defendants plead guilty because they fear the government will appeal their sentences if they refuse to engage in plea bargaining. A conviction founded on an involuntary guilty plea is constitutionally void, and coercion, whether physical or mental, vitiates voluntariness. Machibroda v. United States, 368 U.S. 487 (1962).

The Supreme Court in Pearce clearly stated that due process requires that vindictiveness against a defendant for having successfully attacked his first conviction must play no part in the sentence he receives after a new trial. (at 725). Accordingly, vindictiveness must play no part in the government's appealing a defendant's sentence because the defendant had declined to cooperate in plea bargaining.

Similarly, the danger exists that the defendant who has the right under § 3725(a) to appeal a sentence which is above the suggested guidelines will be the victim of a retaliatory appeal by the government (in the event of imposition of a sentence which is lower than the guidelines), unless he previously has promised not to appeal. The defendant would thus be denied a free and independent assessment of the choice of whether to appeal or not.

Finally, proponents of the government's right to appeal may argue that society's interest in avoiding too lenient sentences and great disparities in sentencing justifies the provision. As to the first, the societal interest must yield, as compelled by the Double Jeopardy Clause. North Carolina v. Pearce, supra at 750, Justice Harlan's opinion. As to the second, uniformity of sentencing is not necessarily a desirable goal in all cases. The prevalent modern philosophy of penology is that the punishment should fit the offender and not merely the crime. Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241 (1949). A judge may well determine that the circumstances of a particular offense and an individual offender warrant a sentence below that of the guidelines. The Supreme Court in Dorsznski v. United States, 418 U.S. 424 (1974), noted the traditional powers and unfettered sentencing discretion of a federal district judge.

In conclusion, considerations of both a constitutional and public policy nature require that the government not be permitted to appeal sentences which are below the suggested guidelines. Defendants must not be coerced, even subtly, into plea bargaining or giving up their rights to appeal. Further, having once faced the jeopardy of a higher sentence, the Double Jeopardy Clause protects them from being exposed again to the risk of a harsher sentence. "For of what avail is the constitutional protection against more than one trial if there can be any number of sentences pronounced on the same verdict?" Ex parte Lange, supra at 173.

Senator THURMOND. Our next witness is Mr. Jack Landau, on behalf of the Reporters Committee on Freedom of the Press, Washington, D.C.

Mr. Landau, we will put your entire statement in the record, if that is agreeable. Then we will give you up to 15 minutes, if you want that much time, to comment on the statement or make any additional points you care to make.

[The material follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE REPORTERS COMMITTEE FOR FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, on behalf of the Reporters Committee, we should like to thank you for this opportunity to express our views on the new S-1.

As you may remember, The Reporters Committee testified before this Subcommittee in 1973 on the 1973 versions of S-1 and S-1-100, and in 1975 on the 1975 version of S-1.

In our previous appearances, we strongly disapproved of a number of provisions which we thought would have undermined the First Amendment rights of the press to report and the public to receive information about the government.

Subsequent to that testimony, Senators McClellan and Kennedy and their staffs reworked the bill. The result is that a few of our suggestions—and the suggestions of other press groups—have been heeded, mainly with the elimination of the espionage sections. We, of course, appreciate that effort.

But unfortunately, the bill today remains what it was in 1973. The New S-1 is an Official Secrets Act which would give the government wide-ranging new criminal powers to severely restrict First Amendment rights of the press to report—and the public to receive—the news.

Here we are, five years after Watergate and the Pentagon Papers, with a bill making a frontal assault on the First Amendment by giving the Justice Department and the courts new or expanded criminal authority to jail news reporters and news organization executives—

- (1) For “improperly” criticizing government officials.
- (2) For publishing news in violation of illegally issued “gag orders.”
- (3) For protecting confidential news sources in violation of illegally issued disclosure orders.
- (4) For publishing “stolen” government reports without government permission, regardless of content;
- (5) For possession of original government memos without permission, regardless of content.

The bill also makes it a crime for government employees to leak to the press any “private” information which the government has from oil, auto, drug and defense contracting firms and other nongovernment organizations.

We would have hoped that Congress would have proposed a bill which maintains the status-quo or would offer more protection for press coverage of governmental affairs. But the New S-1 tightens the legal noose around the flow of government news to the public by authorizing jail sentences and fines for collecting and publishing information about the government.

It retains the same basic philosophy and most of the same provisions of 1973 and 1975 versions of S-1 (and S-1400), except for the espionage act provisions.

This Official Secrets Act philosophy—conceived mainly by the Nixon Administration—was and is that government should have the power to protect itself from public criticism and embarrassment by having criminal conviction powers to intimidate and harass the press into silence; and, if the press refuses to be intimidated, then to send reporters and editors to jail.

The liberal and conservative supporters of this bill argue that the Justice Department will never use the provisions of this bill against the press.

We are, they say, in a “new era”—“an era of good feelings.” Therefore, despite the plain language of the bill—authorizing criminal prosecution and jail against the press for reporting news to the public—we are asked to believe that the recent unpleasantnesses between press and the government will never happen again.

We, most respectfully, dissent for five reasons:

First: We were told when we first appeared here in 1974 to oppose S-1 and S-1400 that we were being too protective of the First Amendment when we classified this bill as an “Official Secrets Act.”

We were told, in 1976, again that we were wrong. We think time and events justified our past criticism and will justify this criticism.

Second: We are in an era of good feelings between the press and the government at the national level—at least much better than it was.

But the moods of politicians change quickly and dramatically. We are trying to assure that the public will be protected in its rights to know the news, regardless of whether the administration is friendly or hostile.

Suppose the situation changes and prosecutions do ensue? What are we to tell the public “Yes . . . we knew this could happen. Yes, we saw the danger. We’re sorry. We closed our eyes to the First Amendment?”

Third: This is supposed to be reform of the criminal law to and I quote . . . “take recognition of the problems that have arisen” recently.

There are new provisions for the protection of convicted criminals, for example, in the sentencing area.

But what about the free flow of news to the public? We find no new protections there. What we find is a net of new laws and of changes in old laws tightening the legal noose around the press.

Fourth: This will be a model for the states and will encourage similar official secrets acts to be passed by state legislatures.

Fifth: Certainly, when the major news organizations are faced with these provisions—if they are—they will spend thousands of dollars (millions if they have to) to keep their reporters and editors out of jail.

But the small weekly or daily, the independent radio station, the aggressive individual reporter and freelance writer do not have the resources to hire legal help, especially when you remember it may cost as much as $35,000 to fight a subpoena.

This bill gives a federal prosecutor the clear power to threaten these reporters with jail—and if they read the law, they might well conclude that they have no defenses available. They may stop publishing or they may give the government back the report without publishing it or they may disclose their news sources.

The First Amendment and the federal law is not only for the rich and influential who can defend themselves, if need be. It is also to protect the small news organization and individual reporter and editor who can't defend himself very well. Given the already unlimited legal and law enforcement resources of the federal government, this bill would now add the additional powers to harass and intimidate the news organization and news persons of modest financial resources with the threat of bankruptcy if they attempt to fight back.

For all these reasons, as more fully explained in the following section-by-section analysis,* we urge this Subcommittee to decline to approve the Official Secrets Act

I. CRIMINAL SEDITION

Criticizing a public servant (section 1358).

It would be a crime for a news organization or news reporter to publish a news report or editorial which “improperly attacks” a government employee, causing him any financial damage, such as suspension, reassignment or job termination. Maximum penalty: One year in jail and/or $100,000 fine.

1. This provision is entirely new to the federal criminal code. It is a criminal libel and sedition law and was specifically designed to protect government officials from “improper” criticism even for “illegal” acts.

The bill achieves this result by making it a crime for any “person”—including a news reporter or news organization—to take any action which “improperly subjects” any government employee or private citizen “to economic loss or injury to his business or his profession . . . because of an official action performed by a public servant or because of the status of a person as a public servant.”

This means that a newspaper or news organization which “improperly” criticizes government officials can be prosecuted on a showing that the person criticized was damaged in his “business or profession.”

The language of this bill is similar to the Alien and Sedition Act of 1798, which said it shall be a crime:

“[I]f any person shall . . . publish . . . any false, scandalous and malicious writings against the government of the United States . . . with intent to defame . . . the government . . . or to bring them . . . into contempt or disrepute.”

In fact, in the Alien and Sedition Act, the government, in order to jail one of its critics, had to prove that the publication was “false, scandalous and malicious.” In the New S. 1 version, all the government need prove is that the criticism was made “improperly.”

The Congress, it appears, is not alone in wanting to resurrect criminal sedition. The Supreme Court of Virginia has just upheld the constitutionality of a law used to convict the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot for reporting that a local judge was under investigation for allegedly improper behavior.<sup>1</sup>

Thus, this new S. 1 provision gives the federal government the authority for the grossest type of censorship aimed at the press.

2. Congressional supporters of this legislation argue that this provision was intended to protect government employees from retaliatory actions by business firms and others critical of the government employee's conduct.

We answer that the bill already has a provision punishing a person who “uses

*The Reporters Committee wishes to thank Charles Sennet, of George Washington University Law Center, for his help in analyzing this bill and preparing the written testimony. force, threat, intimidation, or deception with intent to influence a public servant.”<sup>2</sup>

3. To understand the scope of this provision against the press one need only refer to the legislative history which states, that the action in “retaliation is unjustified against a public servant, irrespective of the legality of the public servant’s acts.”<sup>3</sup>

That is to say, a publisher who “improperly” decided to engage in “retaliation” editorially against a government official for his illegal acts could be convicted and jailed for one year if he succeeds in getting the public official fired.

Under New York Times Co. v. Sullivan<sup>4</sup> and Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.,<sup>5</sup> the government official can sue for libel if he can prove that the statements were false and reckless.

This bill would send an editorial writer or publisher to jail even if the statement is truthful.

The example given in the legislative history speaks for itself. This criminal provision “would reach, for example, the case of an employee of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice who is attacked (‘by non-physical acts’) because of his employment in such agency.”

“This is intended to reach non-physical acts such as effecting the discharge or transfer of a person from his employment.”<sup>6</sup>

4. It is the position of our Committee that the First Amendment guarantees to the public and the press the right to criticize government officials as often and as abrasively as they wish, calling for dismissal or resignation or whatever other action the citizen thinks is warranted. That is the essence of a free society. “Retaliation” by words against government officials is every citizen’s right. Who is to decide whether the criticism is “improper”—a jury? The government official? The Congress? We urge this Subcommittee to eliminate this criminal sedition provision designed to protect the government from being “improperly” criticized.

II. PRIOR RESTRAINTS ON PUBLICATION OF NEWS

Violations of illegal gag orders (sections 1331 and 1335).

This bill would make it a crime for a news person or news organization to publish a news article or editorial in violation of a court order later declared void. Maximum penalty: For a news person, six months in jail and $100,000 fine (more at the judge’s discretion for ignoring this illegal order) and for a news organization, a $500,000 fine (more at the judge’s discretion). This would be a new law.

1. This bill permits the fining and imprisonment of news persons or new organizations who violate prior restraint orders illegally issued by judges. Two separate criminal contempt sections can be used.

The bill achieves this result by making it a crime for any “person”—including a news person or news organization—to “disobey(s) . . . a(n) . . . order . . . or command of a court,” even if that order is subsequently declared void (Section 1331); and makes it an additional crime for any “person” to disobey(s) a temporary—or final order” of a court, even if the order is subsequently declared void (Section 1335).

The bill offers a purported defense to the press: the news organization or news person must be able to obtain a decision that the order is not only void, but is also “clearly invalid”; and that the news organization or news person must show there was no “reasonable opportunity” to appeal.

There is no question that the contempt provision is aimed at the press. As Senator Kennedy said when he joined Senator McClellan in introducing this bill, “New defenses are added to protect the press from ‘gag orders’.”<sup>7</sup>

2. It is our position that this provision, if passed, will violate the First Amendment, offer less protection than current law, and will encourage federal judges all over the country to issue gag orders and therefore to decide what the public will read.

We are facing a plague of gag orders issued by both federal and state judges barring the press from publishing court news—either by ordering the press not

3. We believe, in general, that the principles of the First Amendment never authorize any agency of the federal or state governments to issue a prior restraint on the publication of news unless—as the New York Times and Washington Post argued in the Pentagon Papers case<sup>25</sup> the government can prove “clear and present danger to the national security of the United States.”

Following this principle, it is our position with reference to this bill, that it can never be a federal crime for a news person, or news organization, acting in good faith under the First Amendment, to publish news in violation of a court order—except for the “clear and present danger” situation.

At an absolute minimum, it can be no federal crime to publish in violation of an illegal gag order.

Therefore, we oppose these new criminal contempt provisions because they do authorize the jailing or fining of news reporters and news organizations who ignore an illegal “gag order” and publish.

4. Congressional supporters of this legislation argue that current law now permits the criminal conviction of a news organization for violating a prior restraint order subsequently declared void. We disagree.

While it is conceivable that this might be the law at some future time—especially if this bill is passed—no news organization or news reporter we know of has ever been held in criminal or civil contempt on appeal for violating a prior restraint order, except for one case in the Fifth Circuit.

That case was United States v. Dickinson,<sup>26</sup> in which two news reporters from The Baton Rouge Morning Advocate and States Times, who were sitting in court, were ordered not to publish information elicited during the open court proceeding. The reporters ignored the order, published their articles, were convicted of criminal contempt and fined.

The United States Court of Appeals ruled the order was invalid. But relying on the doctrine of Walker v. Birmingham,<sup>27</sup> the Court of Appeals also ruled that the news reporters should have obeyed the order, suppressed the new article, and appealed—for however long that might have taken.

The Supreme Court declined to review the Dickinson case, an action which indicates neither approval nor disapproval of the Fifth Circuit decision.

No other Court of Appeals so far has followed Dickinson. Two State Supreme Courts—the Supreme Court of Washington<sup>28</sup> and the Supreme Court of Arkansas<sup>29</sup>—have ruled the other way and have voided criminal contempts against news reporters who violated illegally issued prior restraint orders.

The Nebraska Supreme Court in Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart<sup>30</sup> indicated that it did not believe that the press was required to pay any attention to an illegal prior restraint order, even when, as in Dickinson, reporters were present in the courtroom when the order was issued. The United States Supreme Court took note of the problem, but did not offer any guidance.<sup>31</sup>

The only other case we know about involves the Rockford, Illinois, Gazette, which was ordered not to publish any editorials criticizing the local court system. The newspaper ignored the order and was held in criminal contempt. The order was subsequently declared invalid. The criminal contempt conviction is now pending before the Illinois Court of Appeals.<sup>32</sup>

Therefore, we believe that this provision, authorizing criminal contempt for violation of an invalid gag order, is clearly not the law today, with only one conviction in 47 years from one Court of Appeals, and with two recent state supreme court decisions in opposition.

5. Congressional supporters also argue that this bill offers “new defenses” against gag orders because the news reporter or news organization can escape jail by obtaining a ruling that the illegal order was also “clearly invalid”, and that there was not a “reasonable opportunity” to appeal.

We disagree. A criminal law, the Supreme Court has said, must be specific enough so that a person subject to its jurisdiction has a reasonable opportunity to evaluate whether he will be convicted; or as this bill itself states, he must be given adequate "notice of conduct" which will send him to jail<sup>33</sup>

For a wire service, on deadline every minute all over the world, or for a radio or television station, one minute may be "reasonable" from a reporter's or editor's point of view, but a judge may disagree. For a newspaper with a daily press run, it might be decided that 20 hours is reasonable. And for a monthly magazine, it might be a month.<sup>34</sup>

The injunction against the New York Times in the Pentagon Papers case lasted 18 days. The injunction against the Nebraska press in Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart lasted 3½ months, while Justice Blackmun indicated that 30 days might be acceptable. The injunction against the Oklahoma City media in Oklahoma Publishing Co. v. District Court lasted five months before the Supreme Court reversed it. And last week, the Supreme Court said that prior restraint orders must be given an "immediate" appeal, citing Justice Blackmun.

We think it is intolerable that a news person and news organization, in order to exercise constitutional right to publish in violation of an illegal order, are to be subjected to the discretionary decision of some judge or some jury as to whether there was "reasonable" time to appeal.

The second requirement, which the news organization must show, is equally unconscionable. A newspaper cannot require an appeals court to rule that an order is "clearly invalid". This means that the newspaper is at the mercy of an appeals court in deciphering whether a ruling of invalidity is also "clearly invalid."

6. The Supreme Court said in Nebraska Press Association—an opinion without dissent—that there is a "presumption against prior restraint"<sup>35</sup> on the publication of news. There is no substance to a constitutional presumption when a reporter may be jailed for violating a court order which is not only presumptively invalid, but also is declared to be totally invalid. But that is the result this provision authorizes.

The bill imposes a chilling effect on the free exercise of the First Amendment rights by the requirement that every publisher and reporter must take a calculated risk of imprisonment by gambling on whether an illegal prior restraint order is also "clearly invalid" and whether he also has a "reasonable time" to appeal or seek a stay before going to press.

When the order is issued, the press has two choices. It can obey the order and appeal, or it can ignore the order and publish. If it publishes, and the order is declared void, no punishment can attach. But this bill would have two pernicious results: first, it would force a newspaper to appeal an illegal order and submit itself to the jurisdiction of the courts if there was "reasonable" time. Second, by giving the federal courts a new prior restraint weapon against the press, it would encourage federal judges to issue these orders. Certainly, by expanding the existing power to issue gag orders, Congress would appear to be both approving of these gag orders and suggesting that the gag order power be exercised.

III. DISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL NEWS SOURCES

Contempt (section 1331).

The bill would make it a crime for a news reporter to refuse to obey an illegal court order requiring the disclosure of confidential news sources by testimony or by revealing notes and out-takes. Maximum penalty: 6 months in jail and/or unlimited fine.

1. The bill's criminal contempt section authorizes fines and imprisonment for violating an illegal court order calling for the production of confidential news sources, because it would be a crime to "disobey(s) . . . a(n) . . . order . . . or command of a court," even if the order is declared void.

The contempt section has the same almost useless defense for the press as the prior restraint-contempt section. In order to escape jail for disobeying the illegal order to disclose confidential sources, the reporter must convince a court that the order was not only void, but was also "clearly invalid," and that there was not a "reasonable" time to appeal.

<sup>34</sup> In the field of libel law, the Supreme Court has indicated that First Amendment Standards may vary, based on the degree of news organization's need to disseminate the news rapidly. See Associated Press v. Walker and Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 157-9 (1967).

This means that if reporters who broke stories such as Watergate, the Huston Plan, the Korean gifts scandal, the CIA mail openings, etc., were ordered to disclose their confidential news sources and their notes, and then refused, and the order was subsequently declared illegal, they would still go to jail unless they could also convince a court that the illegal order was "clearly invalid," and there was time to appeal.

2. We are at something of a loss to suggest a situation where a reporter held in contempt would have a reasonable time to appeal, because the refusal to testify is always contemporaneous with the contempt order.

Perhaps what is meant by this section is that the reporter is required to litigate the subpoena before he is asked any questions, or that he is required to make a motion for a stay of the illegal order prior to being held in contempt. This would create an absurd requirement—that a person must arrange for an appeal of an order before there is an order.

We have discussed earlier the problems associated with obtaining a ruling that an illegal order is also clearly invalid.

3. The contempt section is equally applicable to a court order to turn over notes obtained in interviews with confidential sources, or "out-takes" of news film which would lead to identification of such confidential sources. Orders for the production of newsgathering materials, as well as for the compulsion of testimony can also be punished under Section 1333, Refusing to Testify or to Produce Information, which will be discussed below.

4. The section raises an even more fundamental question. News reporters and news organizations are not agents of the government. They obtain information for dissemination to the public.

Unlike other persons who raise privileges—such as attorneys—the reporter generally has no direct interest in the news source. He does not get paid to protect the legal or financial interests of a client. He gives the assertion of confidentiality in order to bring news to the public about government crime or other matters of public interest.

Without the promise, the public would be severely damaged because it would be deprived of the information. What Congress would, in effect, be doing by retaining criminal contempt for a good-faith refusal to produce information is to punish the public for reading the news as much as punishing the reporter for collecting it. Confidential sources, fearing discharge or prosecution, would not inform the public about crime. Reporters, fearing jail, would not give the promise and most likely would not obtain the story.

5. In Imbler v. Pachtman<sup>36</sup> and Zweibon v. Mitchell<sup>37</sup> respectively, the Supreme Court and the U.S. Court of Appeals both said that there can be no federal liability for government officials who violate the laws and the Constitution of the United States if their illegal behavior was a good faith assertion of what they thought were their rights, as law enforcement officers, to protect the public welfare.

We suggest giving the same protection to the public's right to know the news. Why should two reporters in Baton Rouge be convicted for properly informing the public about current news if federal and state officials are immune when in good faith they violated the law?

6. Supporters of this legislation argue that current law in the federal courts provides that mere silence under a good-faith constitutional claim of privilege justifies a criminal conviction.

We can find but one case in the federal courts where a news reporter was held in criminal contempt for a good-faith assertion of a First Amendment privilege, and in that case, at least, the order was upheld.<sup>38</sup> We can find no case in the federal courts where a news reporter was held in criminal contempt for violating an illegal disclosure order. In fact, we know of only one Supreme Court decision where any citizen was held in criminal contempt for a good-faith assertion of a constitutional privilege.<sup>39</sup>

7. Despite the complete lack of authority for this new S-1 approach, there is one institution which believes that reporters should be held in criminal contempt and jailed for refusing to disclose confidential news sources. It is the Department of Justice.

The Justice Department is currently attempting to jail for six months on criminal contempt charges two reporters from the Charleston, West Virginia Gazette, who have refused to disclose news sources pursuant to an order of the U.S. District Court in a case involving a dispute between coal operators and the United Mine Workers.<sup>40</sup>

The coal dispute has long since been resolved. Even if the reporters were to testify now, there are no proceedings in which their testimony could be used. But the Justice Department, relying on the Shillitani case, wishes to send these reporters to jail for six months to punish them for the exercise of their First Amendment privilege not to disclose the information.

8. This bill would condone such efforts by the Justice Department to criminally punish news reporters for their silence—completely misconceiving the difference between criminal and civil contempt.

Criminal contempt, going all the way back to the Gompers case,<sup>41</sup> is a penalty for disrupting judicial proceedings or for intentionally affronting the dignity of a court. It is meant as a punishment.

Civil contempt is an effort by the court to obtain compliance with its orders. It seeks a remedy—such as the disclosure of information.

9. We believe that a news reporter has an absolute right under the Constitution to refuse in good faith to disclose confidential and other unpublished information obtained during the course of newsgathering, except, perhaps, if the government can show that the refusal would result in a “clear and present danger” to the national security of the United States, and was intended to harm the United States or to help a foreign power.

Much as we oppose it, Caldwell does give the courts some powers to hold a news reporter in civil contempt for refusing to obey a valid disclosure order.<sup>42</sup>

If courts are interested in obtaining the information—rather than interested in punishing the reporter—we find it an unconscionable assault on First Amendment values to jail a reporter for up to six months because he asserted his good-faith privilege and lost.

Refusing to testify or produce information (section 1333).

The bill would make it a crime for a news reporter or news organization to unsuccessfully challenge an order issued by a court, a legislative proceeding or an agency, seeking testimony or unpublished notes or film identifying confidential news sources. Maximum penalty: 3 years and/or $500,000 fine.

1. The bill makes it a crime for a reporter to “refuse(s) to answer a question” or to “produce a record” about confidential news sources when asked to do so by the “presiding officer” of a congressional proceeding, a federal judge, or an executive branch “hearing examiner, administrative law judge, . . . notary,” or any other officer conducting an official proceeding before a “government branch or agency.”

Here, again, we have a provision which subjects a news person to imprisonment for the unsuccessful good-faith assertion of a First Amendment privilege to protect confidential news sources.

2. Unlike the criminal contempt provision, the reporter does not go to jail under Section 1333 if the disclosure order is illegal, since this section states that a reporter may plead that he should be “legally privileged” to maintain his silence under the First Amendment.

Yet, if the reporter asserts his First Amendment privilege, he may be indicted, tried and convicted for refusing to testify or produce information. If an appeals court then ruled that his claim of privilege could not prevail, the reporter could volunteer to provide the information that had been sought.

But the reporter's decision to test his claim of privilege in the courts, and wait until the issue is resolved by the courts of appeal, would do nothing to mitigate his jail term. Under this section, if the reporter decides to testify on the day after an appeals court finds his claim of “legal privilege” invalid, he could provide the information and still serve a three-year sentence, based on his conviction for his earlier refusal to testify.

3. We suggest that the civil contempt power described in Caldwell—allowing the courts to imprison the reporter until they obtain the information they seek—is more than sufficient as a means of obtaining this confidential information from news persons. A criminal statute is unnecessary.

Hindering law enforcement (section 1331).

This bill would make it a crime for a news reporter or news organization to refuse to give information, notes or news film out-takes to law enforcement officials, grand juries or courts, if the information involved confidential sources who were known to have committed a crime or to be criminal suspects. The bill specifically prohibits the news reporter or organization from raising any first amendment privilege. Maximum penalty: 6 years and/or $500,000 fine.

1. The bill achieves this result by making it a crime if a news reporter or news organization “delays, or prevents, the discovery, apprehension, prosecution, conviction, or punishment of” a confidential or named news source, if the reporter or news organization knows that the news source “has committed a crime, or is charged with or being sought for a crime.”

Among the acts which the bill specifies is “concealing . . . a record” of the interview which would help “the discovery . . . (or) prosecution” of the news source.

The bill further provides that “it is not a defense to a prosecution under this section that the “record” of the interview “would have been legally privileged” under the First Amendment.

This means that a reporter or news organization executive will go to jail if he “conceals” a reporter’s notebook or news film involving a confidential source who has admitted a crime or a named news source wanted or being tried for a crime.

This provision would also apply to television “out-takes” or other news film of violent political demonstrations, for example, if law enforcement authorities thought they could apprehend the persons by identifying them through the film.

2. This section authorizes almost unlimited “fishing expeditions” by law enforcement officers and courts into the files of news reporters and broadcast and print news organizations. There is virtually no major crime which occurs any place in the nation which is not intensively covered by local press organizations. Frequently it will be the press, through confidential news sources, who uncover the stories.

To give you some recent examples :

The Providence newspapers, based on confidential news sources, reported that city officials were tampering with odometers on city vehicles in order to defraud the city in relation to auto mileage repayments.

A Washington television station recently reported that illegal drugs were being sold in the District Building.

CBS Reports recently disclosed after an extensive investigation that anti-Castro Cubans from Florida were planting bombs both here and abroad.

A newspaper in North Carolina reported that police were receiving illegal kickbacks from towing operators.

Reports of these crimes—most notably white-collar crime and official corruption—generally come from confidential news sources who admit to the crimes or who know others who commit crimes. The bill would give government authorities carte blanche to raid the files of the news media, shortcut their own investigative efforts, and annex news persons as government investigators.

3. To compound this unrestricted search and seizure power against news organization files, notes and film, the news organization is helpless to protest because Congress has told the federal courts to ignore a First Amendment claim that the information is “legally privileged,” and the reporter or news editor can be sent to jail.

4. Furthermore, the bill prohibits the act of “concealing . . . (the) identity” of a person who is known to have committed a crime or to be under suspicion. This section could be used against the news person who declines to tell an F.B.I. agent the name of a suspect whom the reporter had interviewed. Again, the First Amendment privilege is specifically rejected by this section.

Supporters of the legislation say that the 1975 committee report makes clear that this provision does not apply to news reporters who, in the course of their work, interview persons on a confidential basis. They say that the committee report limits the offense to “affirmative acts” of the defendant, and that a reporter who answers the government agent’s questions with silence cannot be prosecuted.

Our reading of the act is somewhat different. Confidential news sources who disclose their own crimes or the crimes of others ask for confidentiality precisely because they fear "apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment."

The news reporter generally agrees to keep the news source's identity a secret as the price the public must pay in order to be informed of crimes. It does not take any stretch of the imagination to assume that a prosecutor would say that the news reporter and the source entered into a conspiracy to conceal the source's identity in order to "delay(s) or prevent(s) the discovery, apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment" of the news source.

As we have said, it is our position that a news organization or news reporter can never be convicted of a crime for refusing, under a good-faith assertion of the First Amendment, to provide the government with the identity of confidential news sources or other unpublished information.

5. While the other efforts in this bill to obtain confidential information from news persons (i.e., contempt, and refusing to testify or produce information) at least require an appearance before a court, this provision imposes an affirmative duty on the press to cooperate with law enforcement officials.

It is our belief that news organizations and news reporters collect news to disseminate it to the public. They do not act as agents for the courts, for the police, for the defendant, or for prosecutors and plaintiffs.

These sections, authorizing criminal penalties for good-faith attempts to protect confidential news sources will, we think, encourage judges to issue even more subpoenas to the press.

The situation here is as threatening as with gag orders. Subpoenas, which were once limited to disputes between the Justice Department and the news media, are being obtained by state prosecutors and even civil litigants all over the country.

We know of a total of about 400 subpoenas to news reporters and news organizations for confidential and other unpublished information between 1970 and 1977. Of these, about 300 came from the Justice Department, and about 100 from the states.

We know of 21 reporters who have been held in contempt of court, and 14 of these reporters were jailed. We don't know how many reporters disclosed information rather than become entangled in long and expensive litigation.<sup>43</sup>

The New S. 1, by giving the government some new powers and expanding some old powers, can only serve to encourage more federal and state judges to seek to force reporters to disclose their sources.

IV. GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT CRIMES AGAINST THE PRESS FOR RECEIVING OR PUBLISHING GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

Publishing "Stolen" Government reports (section 1733).

The bill would make it a crime for a news reporter or news organization to publish a "Stolen" Government report if the reporter or news organization derived any profit from the publication of the report. Maximum penalty: 3 years in jail and/or $500,000 fine.

1. This new provision is the classic Official Secrets Act. The bill achieves this result by making it a crime for any person, including a news organization or news reporter, to "receive" or "possess" any "stolen" government "property" if the news reporter or organization disseminates it to the public for profit.

2. Supporters of the bill maintain that, cognizant of the press' problems with this section in the 1973 and 1975 versions of S. 1, the drafters purport to protect the press in the new S. 1 by stating that intangible property owned by the Government is not covered.

We find it hard to believe that 42 volumes of the Pentagon Papers were "intangible," and we would remind the Subcommittee that the Justice Department argued privately that it was possible to prosecute The New York Times and its reporter Neil Sheehan for having possessed the Pentagon Papers; and that, in fact, Dr. Ellsberg was prosecuted for, among other things, criminal conversion of government property under the current law.

Leslie Whitten, an associate of Jack Anderson, was arrested for possessing stolen government property—reports and memos taken from the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Arthur Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, claimed that an employee of the Federal Reserve had illegally given to Consumer Reports a Federal Reserve report on consumer interest rates at various banks.

Was the Huston Plan "intangible"? Was the White House Enemies List "intangible"? Was the CIA report obtained by Mr. Schorr "intangible"? We saw Mr. Schorr standing on television, holding something in his hand, and it was not intangible.

3. Next, the congressional supporters of the bill suggest that the press is exempted because it would be a defense that the reporter "obtained or used the property solely for the purpose of disseminating it to the public, and did not derive anything of value from obtaining, using or disseminating it."

Clearly, this bill authorizes prosecution against the free-lance reporter, writer or author who publishes an article based on a stolen government report in a magazine and receives in return "anything of value," such as money; or, publishes the report in a book and receives royalties.

In addition, regularly employed news reporters are paid salaries and, despite their modesty, we consider them "something of value," given in return for such journalistic enterprise as obtaining reports which the government does not want published.

News organizations, which publish these reports, obtain money for their newspapers, magazines and air time. If the report is on an extremely important topic, they may put it on their syndicates for regular subscribers, who give something "of value," or they may syndicate it specially.

In short, one would have to search far and wide to find a situation where a news reporter, news organization or free-lance writer disseminated a government report to the public free of charge.

Therefore, this defense is quite useless.

4. Furthermore, by specifically singling out the press as one of the institutions to be covered by this new provision, Congress, by implication, is authorizing its use against the press.

5. It is our belief that government information belongs to the people. If the Congress wishes to be true to the whole concept of the First Amendment—that the people have a right to know what their government is doing—then it can never be a crime in a free society for a news person or news organization to possess and publish a government report without the permission of the government, unless the government can show that the information contained in the report is a "clear and present danger" to the national security of the United States, and was obtained or published with intent to harm the United States or to aid a foreign power.

If the document is an original, the government should make a demand for its return, and the news organization should be given a reasonable period of time to copy it and return it.

If the document is a copy—which is also considered to be "property" of the government—one supposes that the government could make a claim for the value of the photocopy paper.

In short, this provision, allegedly showing such solicitude for the press, is almost as bad as its predecessor in S. 1. It is an Official Secrets Act because it punishes the possession of government information regardless of content.

This bill would make it a crime for a news reporter or news organization to possess any original Government memorandum or document. Maximum penalty: 3 years in prison and/or $500,000 fine.

1. This is an Official Secrets Act provision because it penalizes the possession of government reports, regardless of content.

The bill achieves this result by making it a crime if anyone, including a news reporter or news organization, "impairs the . . . availability of a government record . . . document, or other object . . . kept by a government for information or record purposes . . ."

This means, quite clearly, that reporters could be convicted if their mere possession of a government record—as it must—"impairs the . . . availability" of the government report to the government.

2. Once again, our position is that it can never be a crime for a news organization or a news person to receive or possess government information with the intention of disseminating it to the public, except for national security reasons mentioned above.

3. Supporters of the bill appear to concede that this criminal provision covers the possession of an original memorandum or report, even if the government has copies of it.

The supporters argue that its application to the press, in this day of the Xerox machine, is merely hypothetical because copies of original documents are not covered.

We would suggest, at least, that the plain wording of the statute does cover photocopies of original documents possessed by the press. The bill defines a government "record" as being "a record, document, or other object . . . kept by a government for information or record purposes . . . or required to be kept pursuant to a statute, or a regulation, rule, or order . . ."

It would not be unreasonable to assume that a prosecutor could claim that a photocopy of an original was being "kept . . . for information or record purposes" and that its mere possession by the press impaired its "availability" to government.

If, in fact, the Congress does not intend this section to cover either originals or copies of government records obtained by the press with the intention of disseminating them to the public, it might be helpful to simply say so.

Obstructing the Government's purported information control function (section 1301).

The bill would make it a crime for a news reporter or news organization to publish any Government information without permission. Maximum penalty: 6 years in jail and/or $500,000 fine.

1. To explain the application of this Official Secrets Act provision against the press, it is necessary to go back to the Department of Justice's prosecution of Dr. Ellsberg. Dr. Ellsberg was indicted on a charge that he did "defraud the United States . . . by . . . obstructing (the) lawful government function of controlling the dissemination of . . . government . . . reports."<sup>44</sup>

This was a new and novel use of the fraud section to punish a citizen for the dissemination, without permission, of government information, regardless of its content.

The new bill perpetuates this new "information crime" theory of the Ellsberg prosecution.

This means that, under the theory of the Ellsberg indictment, as interpreted by the Justice Department, a newspaper or news organization which published any government information without permission—from the Enemies List to a confidential H.E.W. or H.U.D. report—could be prosecuted for defrauding the government of its "lawful government function of controlling the dissemination of government reports."

2. There is no specific reference to the Ellsberg prosecution problem in the legislative history—despite the fact that our committee has brought it to the attention of this Subcommittee twice before. But congressional supporters of this bill argue privately that everyone realizes that the Justice Department was wrong when it indicted Dr. Ellsberg.

They say to us "Don't worry, it won't happen again," and we say to you—we agree; let's make sure it doesn't happen again and make it an absolute defense that this provision shall not apply to news persons or news organizations who obtain government reports without permission with the intention of disseminating them to the public.

That is what the First Amendment requires.

V. OTHER GOVERNMENT CENSORSHIP PROVISIONS

Government employees cannot leak "Private" information to the press (section 1525).

It would be a crime for a past or present Government employee to tell the press about Government or non-Government crime or other news based on "Private" information submitted to the Government in confidence. Maximum penalty: One year in jail and/or $100,000 fine.

1. The bill achieves this result by making it a crime for a "present . . . or former public servant" to "disclose(s) information . . . to which . . . he has or had access . . . in his capacity as a public servant" if the information is not supposed to be released under any "statute . . . regulation, rule, or order . . ."

As you know, every agency in the government has a network of regulations, rules and orders requiring its information to be kept confidential—from the much-abused classification systems in the Departments of Defense and State to the hundreds of regulations covering domestic agencies, such as the Departments of Health, Education and Welfare, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Labor.

Under this bill, any time a government employee leaks to the press any information “provided to the government by” car makers, drug companies, housing contractors, defense contractors, hospitals, etc., in confidence, he can be criminally prosecuted and jailed for one year.

2. Supporters of the legislation argue that much of the information covered in this new provision is already covered under current law. We would agree that current law, in an effort to protect trade secrets, patents and competitive financial information, does impose a crazy patchwork of criminally enforceable silence on government employees.

In view of Watergate, the C.I.A. and F.B.I. scandals, the disclosures about the Immigration and Naturalization Service, payoffs to foreign and domestic officials by contractors, the Medicaid scandals and the welfare scandals, etc., the Congress ought to encourage federal employees to step forward with information indicating crime, mismanagement, and deception in the operation of government.

3. It has been suggested that a government employee cannot be convicted under this section if the information he releases to the press could be released under the Freedom of Information Act. But the Freedom of Information Act—and the interpretations of its exemptions—are confusing at best.

Furthermore, much of the information involved in recent investigative reporting efforts—such as the C.I.A. mail openings, the F.B.I. break-ins, the poor ratings of some major banks, etc.—would clearly have been kept secret under the Freedom of Information Act and punished under this section.

4. It is our position that, except for some narrow categories of information such as trade secrets, patents and atomic energy information, a government employee, as a citizen, should be free to give to the press government information even if it is in violation of departmental regulations.

The government has been very successful in keeping secret 99 percent of the information it wants to keep secret. It has at its disposal the ability to fire or re-assign employees who break its regulations, as witnessed by the case of the Defense Department employee who informed the press about cost overruns and found himself virtually jobless.

Government employees have reputations to protect and mortgages to pay and we think firing remains an effective gag. Except for information which is a “clear and present danger to the national security”, we think that any government employee who, as a good citizen, wishes to disclose government crime and mismanagement, should not be sent to jail for his efforts.

5. It would be our position that, at a minimum, a government employee prosecuted under this act could not be convicted if the government information he disclosed raised a reasonable presumption that there was a violation of the Constitution, laws, regulations, or stated public policy of the government and if the information was disclosed in order to be disseminated to the public.

The only exception should be for information which is a clear and present danger to the national security of the United States, and was released with the intent to help a foreign power or harm the United States.

We oppose making it a crime to release the official secrets which any government agency says it ought to have by its own self-serving rules and regulations.

Sealing conviction records (section 3807)

The Federal courts are authorized to permanently seal public arrest, indictment records of first-offenders under 21 years of age convicted of possessing heroin and other drugs, if they are placed on probation.

This section of the bill is part of the overall reform for probation involving drug offenders. It already exists in current federal law. We oppose this section because we believe that the criminal justice system must remain open and publicly accountable.

The only way for it to remain publicly accountable is for its key documents—arrest, indictment and conviction records—to be permanently available for any member of the public or the press to inspect.

We recognize that frequently innocent persons find their reputations damaged because they are improperly arrested, indicted and tried, and are then acquitted. Occasionally, innocent persons are convicted. Frequently, innocent third-party witnesses suffer embarrassment and humiliation as the result of being involved in criminal proceedings.

Unfortunate as this may be in individual cases, this is the price we must pay under our criminal justice system. But this provision does not attempt to protect the innocent. It seals the records of a person "found guilty" of drug possession.

We see this provision as a dangerous first step to sealing information about the courts and the administration of justice, and we oppose it.

STATEMENT OF JACK C. LANDAU, ON BEHALF OF REPORTERS COMMITTEE ON FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, ACCOMPANIED BY CHARLES SENNET, GEORGE WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY LAW CENTER

Mr. LANDAU. Senator, I would like permission for Mr. Charles Sennet, from George Washington University Law Center, who helped us with this testimony, to sit at the witness table with me, please.

Senator THURMOND. That will be fine. We are glad to have you with us, Mr. Sennet.

Mr. LANDAU. My name is Jack C. Landau. I am a director of the Reporters Committee and a reporter for the Newhouse papers and an attorney.

As I said previously, this is Mr. Sennet, who is a law student who works with us.

On behalf of the Reporters Committee, we would like to thank you for this opportunity to testify, Senator.

As you may remember, the Reporters Committee testified in 1973 on the 1973 version of S. 1 and S. 1400 and again we testified in 1975 on the 1975 version of S. 1.

In our previous appearances here before this subcommittee, we strongly disapproved of a number of provisions which we thought, if passed, would have undermined the first amendment rights of the press to report and the public to receive news about the Government.

Subsequent to that testimony in 1975, Senators McClellan and Kennedy and their staffs worked very hard on the bill. The result is that a few of our suggestions—and the suggestions of other press groups—have been heeded, mainly with the elimination of the espionage sections. We, of course, very much appreciate that effort.

But, unfortunately, from our point of view, the bill today remains basically what it was in 1973. The new S. 1 is an official secrets act which would give the Government wide-ranging new criminal powers to severely restrict first amendment rights of the press and the public.

Here we are 5 years after Watergate and 6 years after the Pentagon papers with a bill making a frontal assault on the first amendment by giving the Justice Department and the courts the authority to jail news reporters and news organization executives for improperly criticizing Government officials; for publishing news in violation of illegally issued gag orders; for protecting confidential news sources in violation of illegally issued disclosure orders; for publishing stolen

Government reports without Government permission, regardless of content; and for possession of original Government memos without permission, regardless of content.

The bill also makes it a crime for Government employees to leak to the press any "private" information which the Government has from oil, auto, drug, and defense contracting firms and other nongovernmental organizations.

We would have hoped that, especially in view of the controversy in the previous bill, the Congress would have proposed a bill which at least maintains the status quo or would have offered more protection for press coverage of governmental affairs. But the new S. 1 tightens the legal noose around the flow of Government news to the public by authorizing jail sentences and fines for collecting and publishing information about the Government.

It retains the same basic philosophy and most of the same provisions of 1973 and 1975 versions except for the espionage classification violations.

This official secrets act philosophy—conceived mainly by the Nixon administration—was then and, unfortunately, still is in this bill that Government should have the power to protect itself from public criticism and embarrassment by having criminal conviction powers to intimidate and harass the press into silence; and, if the press refuses to be intimidated, then to send reports and editors to jail.

The liberal and conservative supporters of this bill argue that the Justice Department will never use the provisions of this bill against the press.

We are, they say, in a "new era"—"an era of good feelings." Therefore, despite the plain language of the bill—authorizing criminal prosecution and jail against the press for reporting news to the public—we are asked to believe that the recent unpleasantnesses between press and the Government will never happen again.

We most respectfully dissent for a number of reasons, and I will just touch on a few, Senator Thurmond.

First we were told we were wrong in 1973. We were told we were being too protective of the first amendment. Again, in 1975 we were told we were wrong and being too protective. I think time and circumstance justify the testimony in 1973 and the testimony in 1975. I would hope that time eventually, perhaps with more study by the subcommittee, might justify the criticisms we make today.

Second, while it is true that we are in a better atmosphere today than we were 3 years ago, we have to remember that the moods of politicians change quickly and dramatically.

I think that our job in terms of analyzing the reasonable use of this bill should the circumstances change again is to insure that the public will be protected under its right to know the news, regardless of whether the administration is friendly or hostile.

Third, and I think this would be most important for the subcommittee, this is a model law. It is going to be a model to the States. It is the first major reorganization in 170 years. The States are going to look at the provisions in this bill, especially the provisions which are designed at least to be used against the press because of the legislative history or which can clearly be used against the press. I fear we will face many State official secrets acts, relying on the wisdom of Congress in having passed this bill.

Last, for the major news organizations, when faced with some of the threats that this bill authorizes, I think if history is any guide they have the adequate legal resources to fight these types of criminal prosecutions. However, I do not think we should design a law which perhaps is going to eventually result in an acquittal only because a news organization has thousands or millions of dollars to spend on legal defense. I think we should have a law that is clear enough and in areas of doubt errs on the side of the first amendment rather than erring against it.

We have done an analysis of about 10 sections of this bill, which I will skip over very briefly. Because of the time limitation, I will not have much time to go into any analysis.

I would be happy to answer any questions in the middle of this if you would like to stop me.

We do have some footnotes in the back for you.

One provision which I think warrants an enormous amount of worry is section 1358 which says that it shall be a crime to improperly take any action which results in professional or financial damage to a Government employee or official as the result of his status or action.

This is a new provision. It is a criminal sedition law. It penalizes criminally "improper" criticism which results in damage or "improper retaliation," as it is worded in the heading of the bill.

I think that it is very clear that a newspaper and news organization which some jury thinks "improperly" took an action with damage to Government employees professionally could be prosecuted under this bill.

For your study we quoted the provision of the Alien and Sedition Act of 1798, which made it a crime to publish any false, scandalous, and malicious writings against the Government. At least they had to prove it was false, scandalous, and malicious. Here they only have to prove it is improper.

We would oppose the section. I think the legislative history gives a marvelous example. The example they use is this provision would reach, for example, the case of an employee of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice who is attacked by nonphysical acts because of his employment in such agency.

This provision is intended to reach nonphysical acts. This provision is intended to reach words. It is intended to send people to jail for criticizing the Government. It is a sedition provision.

Senator THURMOND. Would you enumerate the provisions in the bill which you feel affect freedom of the press which impose more onerous burdens than now exist under current law?

Mr. LANDAU. This does not exist in current law.

Senator THURMOND. I thought you might point them out without elaborating.

Mr. LANDAU. This does not exist in current law. There is a provision in current law which was designed to protect Government employees from physical intimidation and that type of thing—obstructing them from performing their Government services. There is nothing that I know of in current law which extends it.

I believe the committee report says that this is an expansion of it. As I understand it, this was designed to protect Government officials from lobbyists, say, circulating petitions against them and trying to get them fired.

I think it would be our position that anybody, including the lobbyist, has the right to stand on a street corner and scream his head off about anything a Government officer does. That is the essence of a free society—letting him talk.

Senator THURMOND. Where is the section that prevents that?

Mr. LANDAU. Which section prevents that?

Senator THURMOND. Which section in the bill would prevent a lobbyist from doing that?

Mr. LANDAU. I believe that this section was intended to stop an act or make illegal an act damaging a Government official in his employment. If you intend to get him fired or intend to cause him damage, it would seem to me that that would be perfectly proper.

Senator THURMOND. On page 81 of the bill—

Mr. LANDAU. Yes; 80 and 81.

Senator THURMOND [continuing]. It says, "Improper subjection of other persons to economic loss or injury to his business or profession." Is that the section to which you refer?

Mr. LANDAU. That is right. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. What do you suggest we change—"improper" to "willfully"?

Mr. LANDAU. I think it can be willful, Senator. I think a newspaper or a private business organization can stand out on the street corner and say, "We want John Jones fired because he banned our product. We want him out of Government." I think that you have the right to willfully criticize a Government official for his acts. That is the price you pay.

There is one other thing that is rather curious in the committee report. It says it also applies to improper criticism of an illegal act by a Government official. It says it does not make any difference whether the act is legal or illegal.

Senator THURMOND. What page is that on?

Mr. LANDAU. That is page 448 of the 1975 committee print report.

Senator THURMOND. What page of the bill is that?

Mr. LANDAU. It is an interpretation of the bill in the 1975 committee report, it says:

The committee considers that retaliation is unjustified against a public servant irrespective of the legality of the public servant's acts that may have prompted the retaliation.

Senator THURMOND. On that point would you draw a line between violent and nonviolent acts?

Mr. LANDAU. Yes, sir. In the committee report it says it extends to nonphysical acts. That is precisely what it says. I do not know any nonphysical act except talking or publishing.

Mr. SUMMITT. I just wanted you to distinguish between subparagraphs (a) (1) and (2).

Mr. LANDAU. Subparagraph (a) (1) is the recodification of the existing statute, which basically was passed in the 1930's to protect the revenue officers.

Senator THURMOND. There would be no objection to (a) (1), would there?

Mr. LANDAU. No, sir.

Senator THURMOND. What you object to, as I understand it, is (a) (2); is that correct?

Mr. LANDAU. Yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. "Improperly subjects another person to economic loss or injury to his business or profession because of an official action taken or a legal duty performed by a public servant because of his status as a public servant."

Do you suggest rewriting that or just to eliminate it entirely?

Mr. LANDAU. I certainly think if the committee has some particular type of behavior in mind that it wants to try to protect against that will not restrict the free dissemination of ideas by people who want to criticize the Government, perhaps the staff could work something like that out.

I understand what the intent is. It is just like so many other provisions of this bill. What they have done is thrown out the baby with the bath water.

Senator THURMOND. Do you have any suggestions for rewriting?

Mr. LANDAU. We might be happy to submit something to you after the hearing.

Senator THURMOND. All right. You may proceed.

Mr. LANDAU. The second section that we feel rather strongly about is both sections 1331 and 1335, which basically would subject a news organization to a criminal conviction for violating a prior restraint order that was void.

What has been done in this provision, as your staff knows, is to enshrine the Dickinson case into Federal law. We feel very strongly that we have two State supreme courts which say that if a news organization violates an illegal order that no penalty can attach. We have no Supreme Court decision saying that in the area of just pure speech. We have one fifth circuit decision which says that and it was cert. denied. You can read that, I suppose, one way or the other.

Certainly there is nothing in current law that we can see that clearly authorizes the criminal conviction of a news person or a news organization for violating an illegal prior restraining order. That is precisely what this would do. It was intended to do that.

There was a statement in the most recent legislative history that this was designed as a new protection for the press. Since I think that the law at this point is either against this point of view completely or certainly not clear, what the bill does is in effect have Congress telling the Federal court, one, issue gag orders and, two, throw them in jail even if the gag orders are illegal.

Mr. SUMMITT. Isn't this a codification of a U.S. Supreme Court decision?

Mr. LANDAU. There are some who think that Hague v. the CIO and Walker v. Birmingham have applied this doctrine or have extended this doctrine out to the area of prior restraint of pure speech.

In the Walker case, as you know, what the State was seeking to enjoin was not Rev. Martin Luther King and Shuttleworth talking about civil rights, but they were seeking to enjoin their parade. They were seeking to enjoin physical acts. They were not seeking to enjoin words.

I think we have a very strong constitutional presumption against prior restraints to begin with. The New York Times and Washington Post, I think joined by almost everyone else in the press, have argued that you cannot issue a prior restraint in any area unless there is a showing that it is a clear and present danger to the national security of the United States.

This bill is considerably worse. This bill would authorize prior restraints in any area and jail even if you are right.

Mr. SUMMITT. Would you be satisfied if we took it out?

Mr. LANDAU. Yes; if you mean the entire contempt section, as it applies to publication, I think we would be.

The next section poses a double problem.

Senator THURMOND. Does your statement contain all that you are talking about now or is what you are saying in addition to what is contained in your statement?

Mr. LANDAU. What we tried to do, Senator, was to take up in the statement the explanations that were given by the staff members so that we could give people reading the statement the answer.

Senator THURMOND. Does the statement raise all of the points you have raised here?

Mr. LANDAU. In that section, yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. There is no use in duplicating what is already in your statement. Your statement is going to be studied very carefully. If you have any additional points, we want to hear those.

Mr. LANDAU. The one suggestion that was made at a meeting attended by some of the staff members which was more or less convened on an ad hoc basis by some members of the press was this. Perhaps rather than rewrite it, rather than rewriting these sections section-by-section, it might be possible to simply draft some type of general defense for the dissemination of news and ideas. I do not know if that is possible. It was the suggestion that many people at the meeting thought might solve the problem of having to go through every section and say, "Well, let's take this word out and remove that word. Let's put this defense in."

I do not know if it is possible, but if somebody could come up with a formula that would protect both the collection of news and the publication of news as the first amendment intended it, I think it might be an easier drafting job than opposing it on a section-by-section basis.

In addition to the criminal sedition problems, this thing basically falls down into three categories. One involves prior restraint. Two involves what we think is new authority to throw reporters in jail for refusing to expose confidential sources even if the order itself was illegal. The third involves the flow of information from the government.

Senator THURMOND. I believe your time is about up. Do you think you have covered everything that you had in mind?

Mr. LANDAU. I think we have in the statement, sir. Thank you.

Senator THURMOND. Thank you very much. We appreciate your presence. Thank you for the contribution you made to this hearing.

We will stand in recess until 11:30 a.m.

HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Committee on the Judiciary,

DEAR SENATOR: I was unable to attend the hearings on S. 1437 when Jack Landau, appearing for the Reporters Committee, delivered what to me was an intemperate, unjustified attack on the pending legislation.

I want you to know that this attack is in no way supported by the American Newspaper Publishers Association nor by me as its General Counsel. It is my belief, from a professional point of view, that the efforts made by you, Senator Kennedy and your staffs and the staff of the Justice Department to clarify and remove legitimate press objections to the proposed revisions of the Federal Criminal Code has been a good faith, outstanding effort.

We all know the difficulties faced in this matter. It is the American Newspaper Publishers Association's continuing intention, subject to yours and Senator Kennedy's desires, to continue to try to bring light to bear on matters of legitimate concern affecting the press.

There is no way that we can prevent things such as today's happening. It is our view, however, that reasoning people will be led to further support your's and Senator Kennedy's efforts rather than be driven away by this move which is little short of incredulous.

With my sincere best wishes.

Faithfully yours,

ARTHUR B. HANSON,
General Counsel, American Newspaper Publishers Association.

[Recess taken.]

Senator KENNEDY [acting chairman]. The subcommittee will come to order.

Our next witness is Rev. Virginia Mackey, chairperson, National Interreligious Task Force on Criminal Justice.

STATEMENT OF REV. VIRGINIA MACKAY, CHAIRPERSON, NATIONAL INTERRELIGIOUS TASK FORCE ON CRIMINAL JUSTICE, JSAC AND NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Reverend MACKAY. Senator and members of the staff, I am happy to be here to testify on this legislation.

Hopefully, in this Congress consensus will be achieved on a fair and comprehensive Criminal Code revision. Members of Congress wisely heeded public opposition to S. 1 and have drafted a vastly improved bill. But preliminary review of S. 1437 and the testimony already offered to this committee indicates that the present draft is not yet viable.

The task of this committee—indeed, of all of us—is of overwhelming magnitude. We commend this committee for holding open hearings. We commend you, Senator Kennedy, for encouraging dialog leading to continued improvement in light of critical questions such as those you outlined in remarks at the opening of the hearings on June 7.

Senator Kennedy, you asked if S. 1437 should be tightened in the area of the first amendment so that sections 1831 dealing with riot; 1302, obstructing a Government function; and 1328, demonstrating to influence a judicial proceeding, do not inhibit free speech and assembly. Our answer is a resounding yes, it must be tightened.

Sections 3101–3108 on wiretapping, 1843 on obscenity, 3111–3115 on immunity, 3614 and 3713 on evidence and confessions, 1331 on contempt are some of the additional sections which are unnecessarily repressive and undermine constitutional guarantees to rights of assembly, due process, press, privacy, and speech.

Senator KENNEDY. You do not question that the troublesome issues included in this legislation are current law, and that other sections are an improvement of current law; is that correct?

Reverend MACKAY. The questions we raise are in regard to specific language in those sections.

Senator KENNEDY. But you do not question that what we have in these areas in either recodification of current law or an improvement of current law, is that correct?

Reverend MACKAY. I would have to pass on that. I would have to discuss each specific section in order to answer that question. We are still very much concerned about some of the sections of this bill.

Senator KENNEDY. I am, too. But we are talking about what can be done in these areas. In the areas that you have mentioned here, there has been some improvement in most of them. Obviously balances must be struck. They do not always represent what I personally would like to see, but I think it is a question of what you are going to achieve.

Reverend MACKAY. That is true.

Senator KENNEDY. The Warren court made a decision on use immunity. What reasonable position can you expect from the Judiciary Committee in that area with the national representation we face here? Do you really expect to get something that might be what you want or what I might want? We are dealing with the reality of the situation here.

Reverend MACKAY. I think there are constitutional scholars who still believe that the language as it is now drafted violates constitutional standards and so there is still debate. We would like to see this committee structure it as tightly as possible within constitutional guidelines.

The Interreligious Task Force joins with those who have analyzed those sections and find them completely unacceptable in their present form. We also reiterate the contention that there is no reason why codification of the Federal criminal law cannot be accomplished in a manner that strengthens, rather than undermines, democratic institutions in America.
